500,000 get pay raise in postal arbitration

By David L. Perlman

More than half a million postal employees will get retroactive pay raises and continued cost-of-living protection in new three-year contracts. The accords were achieved through an arbitration process triggered when existing agreements expired last summer with both sides still far apart at the bargaining table.

The arbitration—record-setting in magnitude—covers employees represented by the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers. Separate arbitration panels are scheduled to act by Jan. 7 on contracts covering workers represented by the Mail Handlers, a division of the Laborers, and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

NALC President Vincent R. Sombrotto and APWU President Moe Biller expressed satisfaction that the arbitration award tilted closer to the position of the two unions than to the takeback demands of postal management. Management to the end had insisted on a pay freeze for existing employees, a cut in the cost-of-living formula, and reduced pay and benefits for newly hired workers.

Freeze rejected

Rejection of the pay freeze came despite management claims that postal pay had risen faster than the wage rates of other workers and in the face of the Reagan Administration's announced intent to seek a 5-percent pay cut for federal employees.

In the end, both union and management members of the arbitration panel joined the impartial chairman, educator Clark Kerr, in signing the award although voicing reservations about some of its provisions.

The arbitration panel expressed the strong hope that future contracts will be shaped at the bargaining table, as has been the case in the past. In added comments, the union members—Letter Carriers General Counsel Bruce Simon and mediator Theodore W. Kheel for the Postal Workers—strongly endorsed that hope. The management members of the panel—Peter G. Nash and Joseph J. Mahon—grumbled that they doubted whether the unions would be anxious to go back to bargaining in view of "the significant wage and COLA increases" obtained through the arbitration process.

The 1970 law establishing the U.S. Postal Service made strikes illegal but provided for fact-finding and arbitration in the event of a contract deadlock.

In the new agreement, postal management did obtain lower starting rates for persons hired after Jan. 18, 1985. They will eventually achieve parity with present workers, but the unions expressed dissatisfaction with the length of time required

National economy in shaky condition as new year opens

By James M. Shevis

Americans are staring at a "wobbly" economy that could fall into recession at some point in 1985, the AFL-CIO warned, citing a number of danger signs in the nation's economic structure.

Cautioning against the more optimistic forecasts of other economic analysts and rosy White House projections, Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said "the risks of substantially slower growth or a downturn cannot be ignored."

"While it is extremely difficult to predict the course of the nation's economy, there are a number of reasons for being more pessimistic than what many forecasters are predicting. Clearly, there are weaknesses in the economy."

In a letter to the research directors of AFL-CIO unions, Oswald noted that the consensus among forecasters is that the economy will grow about 3.1 percent in 1985. They also predict the consumer price index will go up about 4.5 percent, only slightly more than the rise from 1983 to 1984. The same analysts generally expect the jobless rate to remain virtually unchanged over the coming year, at about 7.3 percent.

"In essence, the soothsayers are predicting a rather uneventful year," Oswald observed. "In my view, however, several factors make the economic outlook far riskier than is indicated in these predictions."

Interest rates

Among these are the heavy impact of high interest rates resulting from the enormous federal budget deficit, the flood of imports stemming from an overvalued U.S. dollar which has created a record trade imbalance, the end of the Reagan tax cut for individuals, reduced capital spending by American business, and possible outside blows to the economy such as defaults by foreign governments on debts owed the United States.

Oswald said high interest rates will continue to dampen investment in new production facilities, housing, and other interest-sensitive sectors of the economy.

The high interest rates also will continue to have an adverse impact on the nation's trade with other countries growing out of the overvaluation of the dollar in relation to foreign currencies.

After hitting an all-time record of $60 billion in 1983, the trade deficit for 1984 is expected to be more than double that amount at about $130 billion when final figures are compiled. In contrast, four years ago the trade deficit was $25 billion.

"By the end of 1985, the deficit likely will hit between $150 billion and $175 billion," Oswald predicted, stressing that the mounting trade deficit "is a significant constraint on economic growth."

Mortgage costs

The recent lowering of major banks' prime lending rates, after the Federal Reserve Board allowed its key federal funds and discount rates to slide, really hasn't helped the housing industry much, Oswald noted. Mortgage interest rates in the industry—along with autos, a mainstay of the economy—are still historically high.

"We're still way above the long-term mortgage interest rates of less than 10 percent that existed at all times before 1979," he pointed out.

Look for the new label

Consumers will find it easier to identify American-made clothing and fabrics as a result of a labor-backed law that took effect with the new year.

The legislation, enacted last September, strengthens country-of-origin labeling requirements. Foreign-made apparel and household textiles such as sheets and towels will have to be more conspicuously marked than the labeling law previously required.

Especially important, unions and domestic manufacturers agree, is a new requirement that a product made in the United States must clearly say so. The mandatory "Made in the U.S.A." label will further lessen the possibility of a buyer mistaking a foreign-made article of clothing for a domestic product.

Another new feature is a requirement that mail-order catalogues specify whether their products are imported or of U.S. manufacture.

Both the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers had testified for the legislation at congressional hearings.

It will be some months before the impact of the new law is fully realized, since the labeling requirement applies only to goods manufactured after the law took effect, and the Federal Trade Commission has not yet issued regulations to implement it.

Freed unionists to join conference on South Africa

Eleven leaders of black trade unions from South Africa will be in Washington for a three-day conference that opens Jan. 10. The group includes Phiroshaw Camay and Philip Dlamini, who were recently freed from South African prisons.

They will meet with more than 100 U.S. union officials at a conference conducted by the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund and the AFL-CIO African American Labor Center.

Federation President Lane Kirkland will address the opening session.

Camay is general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa, which is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. He was released from prison last Dec. 7 during protests by American trade unionists at the South African embassy in Washington and joined Kirkland in Brussels for the ICFTU board meeting.

Dlamini is general secretary of the South African Black Municipality & Allied Workers and has spent a total of five years in South African prisons.

Others in the group of visiting South African trade unionists are:

1984 a mixed year for U.S. workers

For America's workers, a sluggish recovery brought the unemployment rate down from 8 percent in January to 7.2 percent in November. It would have to drop below 4 percent to achieve the elusive full-employment goal. Record imports of manufactured goods continued to wipe out industrial jobs.

There were some bright notes, nevertheless. The good and the bad are among the highlights gleaned from the 51 issues of the AFL-CIO News published in 1984:

January

Year opens grimly with U.S. Steel announcement of plant closings and permanent loss of jobs for 15,000. . . . President Reagan's State of the Union address portrays a nation "bursting with opportunities." . . . Prominent Americans from both sides of the bargaining table join in a call for labor-management-government cooperation in shaping an industrial policy to make U.S. goods more competitive. . . . Gulf Oil contract negotiated by Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers sets oil industry pattern of 55-cent hourly raises over two years. . . . National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, headed by Henry Kissinger and including Lane Kirkland, says military aid to El Salvador should be conditioned on observance of human rights and democratic principles. . . . Reagan-appointed majority of National Labor Relations Board continues to overturn established precedents. Latest policy reversal allows employer to lay off workers in a plant where a union had refused to take a mid-contract pay cut and to transfer the work to a non-union plant where wages are less. . . . First of seven AFL-CIO regional conferences is held in Seattle.

People: Edward J. Cleary succeeds Raymond J. Corbett as president of New York State AFL-CIO. . . . Richard A. Northrip named president of the soon-to-merge Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers as Thomas F. Miechur retires.

February

Reagan budget asks further cuts in domestic spending, additional rise in military funds. . . . Congressional study documents shift of Labor Dept. emphasis from probes of management violations to investigations of unions. . . . Supreme Court decision allows employers filing for bankruptcy to tear up union contracts. AFL-CIO mounts major campaign in support of bill by House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter Rodino, Jr., to close the bankruptcy law loophole. . . . Flight Attendants, formerly a division of Pilots, win wings as a chartered AFL-CIO affiliate. . . . Previously unaffiliated unions merge with AFL-CIO affiliates—13,000-member Federation of Telephone Workers of Pennsylvania into Communications Workers and 25,000-member Ohio Association of Public School Employees into State, County & Municipal Employees. . . . Earlier, the 90,000-member California State Employees Association had joined the Service Employees. . . . Kentucky Senate kills "right-to-work" attempt to outlaw union shops. . . . Democratic presidential campaign opens with anticipated Mondale victory in Iowa caucus, but upset Hart victory in New Hampshire has media smelling blood.

People: Two unions choose new secretary-treasurers—John M. Defee of the Paperworkers and Thomas J. McGuire of the United Transportation Union.

March

Grass-roots lobbying campaign to amend bankruptcy law to protect union contracts brings quick House passage of Rodino bill, but obstacles loom in Senate. . . . Coalition of Labor Union Women marks 10th anniversary at convention attended by 1,300 delegates. . . . Senate votes 70-20 to retain ban on export of Alaskan oil. . . . House passes labor-backed bill to stop purge of handicapped persons from social security disability rolls. . . . Beverly Enterprises, which had battled union efforts to organize its chain of nursing homes, promises Food & Commercial Workers and Service Employees to provide a "non-coercive atmosphere" during union election campaigns. . . . Redoubled efforts to get union members to polls helps Mondale regain momentum.

April

Strike by 17,000 hotel and casino employees in Las Vegas develops into a major confrontation that enlists the entire labor movement. Hotel security guards attack pickets, but it is strikers who get arrested—members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, the Musicians and the Stage Employes. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Tom Donahue uses a bullhorn to address a strike rally. Federation establishes strike assistance funds and President Lane Kirkland urges affiliates to contribute. . . . Supreme Court decision weakens ban on sex discrimination in educational facilities receiving federal aid and is viewed as setback to civil rights laws generally. Labor joins in call for remedial legislation. . . . House Banking Committee narrowly approves labor-urged industrial policy bill. . . . Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, with 29,000 members, merges with the Boilermakers.

People: Reagan nominates Rosemary Collyer to be NLRB general counsel. AFL-CIO sees it as "another step in turning the NLRB over to management agents."

May

Hilton chain breaks with Nevada Resort Association and joins with other independent hotels that earlier had negotiated union contracts. Other struck hotels start to follow suit, increasing pressure on the holdouts. . . . At Trade Commission hearings, Kirkland joins UFCW President William H. Wynn and ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman in warning against destruction of U.S. shoe industry, and with Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel in support of steel import relief. At House hearings, Kirkland and UAW President Owen Bieber testify for domestic auto content bill. . . . Coalition rallies opposition to new Administration bid for a subminimum youth wage. . . . Union-Industries Show in Memphis displays labor's skills. . . . House hearings spotlight Reagan Administration "dirty tricks" memo proposing to manipulate a study of pay inequities to cause dissension among unions and sow political mischief.

People: Bricklayers President John T. Joyce elected to AFL-CIO Executive Council on retirement of S. Frank Raftery. . . . Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.) presented with AFL-CIO's Murray-Green-Meany Award for humanitarian service.

Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow...

June

In Las Vegas, the month begins with a big strike support rally addressed by Kirkland and ends with nearly all of the struck hotels signed to union contracts. . . . Immigration bill narrowly passes House, but amendment allowing farm employers to bring in large number of foreign farm workers to harvest crops makes it unacceptable to AFL-CIO. . . . Phelps Dodge copper strikers fight attempts to evict them from their homes. . . . House passes bill to close Supreme Court's loophole in civil rights laws. . . . Reagan's NLRB says unions can't fine members who quit during a strike to cross its picket line. . . . Last round of primaries assures Mondale of a first-ballot nomination.

People: Steelworkers election confirms Lynn Williams as president; Edgar Ball succeeds him as secretary. . . . Deaths include AFL-CIO General Counsel J. Albert Woll and Chicago AFL-CIO President William A. Lee. Also Emma Lohrlein, 89, of Billings, Mont. The widow of a union carpenter, she had worked more volunteer hours for COPE than anyone else.

July

Congress gives final approval to labor-sought legislation that stops employers from using bankruptcy proceedings as a device to shred union contracts. . . . Mondale's choice of Geraldine Ferraro as vice presidential candidate brings applause from labor, unites Democratic convention. . . . International Labor Organization commission presses Poland to end suppression of Solidarnosc trade union federation. . . . 50,000 members of RWDSU District 1199 strike New York hospitals. . . . Typographical Union election rerun confirms victory of challenger Robert S. McMichen, who favors merger with an AFL-CIO affiliate, over a Teamster-backed incumbent. . . . AFL-CIO terms Reagan nominee Robert Rowland unqualified to head the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, but President's recess appointment bypasses Senate confirmation.

People: Deaths include Joseph D. Keenan, retired AFL-CIO vice president and IBEW leader.

August

Congress approves pension equity legislation based on bill introduced by Geraldine Ferraro. It knocks down barriers to full pension rights for women workers. . . . Republican platform brags that OSHA was "reined in" during Reagan's first term. . . . AFL-CIO General Board reaffirms federation's commitment to Mondale candidacy. . . . Congress bars U.S. Postal Service from imposing pay and benefit cuts on new hires before going to arbitration. . . . New York hospital workers win contract gains, ratify strike settlement. . . . Norfolk Shipyard workers rebuff raid, back Metal Trades Council. . . . U.S. trade deficit at all-time high.

People: Steelworkers President Lynn Williams elected to Executive Council. . . . House Education & Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins dies.

September

Labor Day parades and rallies draw 500,000 marchers in New York, 150,000 in Detroit and festive gatherings across the country. . . . Congress passes labor-backed bill protecting the social security benefits of disabled workers. Earlier a Social Security Administration task force had warned that the agency's credibility before the courts was "at an all-time low" because of its attempted purge of disabled beneficiaries. . . . Selective strikes at General Motors plants help bring contract combining pay gains and job security. . . . AFL-CIO charter presented to new National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees. New York's District 1199 chooses to stay with RWDSU.

October

Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan takes leave of absence following his indictment on fraud charges; Under Sec. Ford B. Ford minds the shop. . . . House report concludes workers can't rely on fairness of a "politicized" NLRB. . . . Senate Republican majority scuttles House-passed civil rights bill to remedy Supreme Court decision. . . . Kirkland makes nine-state tour by Solidarity Van to boost turnout of AFL-CIO members for Mondale and other labor-backed candidates. . . . Congress adjourns after passing labor-backed bills to protect tax-exempt status of workers' fringe benefits, promote steel industry modernization and tighten bars against racketeers who prey on unions.

People: Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, who received an honorary degree from Yale University last spring, is one of 434 persons arrested in a silent protest in support of Yale employees striking for pay equity. . . . Fabled Musicians leader James C. Petrillo dies at 92.

November

President Reagan wins "four more years" in the White House. . . . Democrats keep control of House, gain seats in Senate. Polls show 61 percent of members of AFL-CIO unions voted for Mondale, a near reversal of the vote of the electorate as a whole. . . . Kirkland welcomes draft statement by Catholic bishops urging major business-labor-government effort to create jobs "with adequate pay and decent working conditions". . . . Equitable insurance boycott lifted as SEIU District 925 wins a first contract for women clerical workers in Syracuse, N.Y.. . . . Big labor rally in Tucson, Ariz., tells Phelps Dodge strikers, "You are not alone". . . . Arrests of black trade unionists in South Africa brings strong AFL-CIO protests and labor joins with civil rights groups in anti-apartheid demonstrations at South African embassy. Union leaders and other prominent Americans submit to arrest in demonstration of concern.

December

South African protests expand and union members join demonstrations at consulates in other cities as well as at embassy in Washington. Union leaders arrested include AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Donahue. . . . Survey finds most recession victims still unemployed or in lower-paying jobs. . . . U.S. trade deficit tops $100 billion and growing. . . . Treasury Dept. proposes to tax fringe benefits. . . . Budget preview asks further slash in domestic programs, pay cut for federal employees. . . . Postal arbitration brings pay raise, keeps COLA, but lowers starting pay for new hires.

Sought by Congress

Administration stalls on plant-closing data

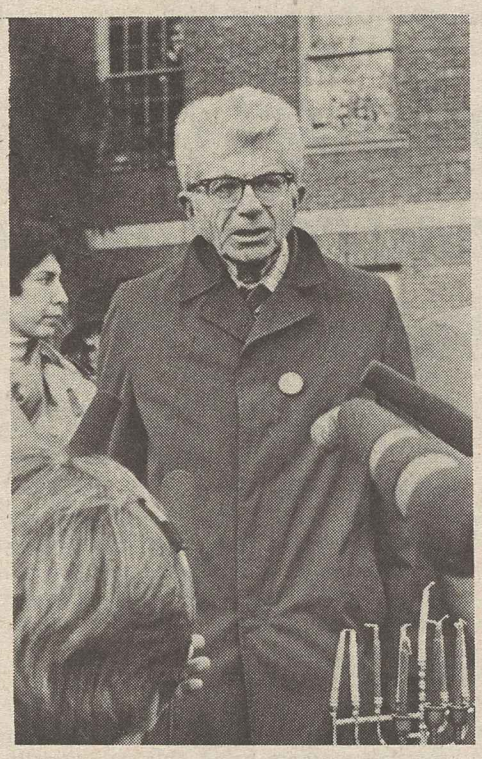
The Reagan Administration is balking at complying with a congressional directive to the Bureau of Labor Statistics to gather data on the impact of plant closings and large-scale layoffs.

Congress earmarked $5 million to get the program under way as part of a $152.9 million BLS appropriation passed last October. BLS officials said at the time that they would contract with the states to provide the data, utilizing the existing system for collecting unemployment insurance information.

But the White House has now informed Congress that it doesn't plan to spend the money during the fiscal year covered by the appropriation, which runs through Sept. 30, 1985. Most informed sources consider this a prelude to a formal request to Congress to rescind the appropriation.

The layoff and plant-closing reporting system would have replaced a more limited layoff report which the Labor Dept. Employment & Training Administration abandoned in 1983.

Under the anti-impoundment law, the Executive Branch is normally obligated to spend funds appropriated by Congress for the designated purpose. The President has two options to avoid carrying out a congressional funding directive:



- The President can defer an appropriation, so that the program doesn't have to be carried out in the current fiscal year. That's what the White House did in the case of the plant-closing and layoff reports. Either the House or the Senate can block a deferment by passing a resolution to that effect. Otherwise, the deferment stands and the obligation to carry out the program is delayed until the following fiscal year.

- The President can ask Congress to rescind an appropriation, an action that requires a resolution of approval from both the House and Senate.

The White House deferment notification to Congress said merely that the program was being held up because there was "inadequate time" for the Labor Dept. to put it into effect.

But Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), a principal sponsor of the move to expand layoff reporting, expressed concern that the action was a prelude to a formal rescission request. The Administration's budget being put together for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1985, does not contain funds for the BLS study, sources indicated.

Jewish vigil

Some 250 demonstrators from Jewish organizations picket the South African embassy in Washington on Christmas Day to protest the racist policy of apartheid. Hyman Bookbinder, Washington representative of the American Jewish Committee, lights a menorah as Democratic Congressmen Walter Fauntroy of the District of Columbia and Mel Levine of California look on. The vigil, sponsored by the AJC, the Jewish Labor Committee and other Jewish groups, gave Christians "a day off" from the continuing protest. At left, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman addresses demonstrators.

Congress gears up to face post-inaugural workload

The 99th Congress moved through its opening ceremonies, assembled for the formal counting of the electoral ballots that make President Reagan's re-election official, and prepared to go back into hibernation until Inauguration Day, Jan. 21.

Not until after the inaugural will committee appointments be completed and the legislative workload begun.

In a departure from past practice, President Reagan will send his proposed budget to Congress before he delivers his State of the Union address in a nationally televised appearance before a joint session of the House and Senate. The change suggests that the State of the Union message, now scheduled for Feb. 6, will focus heavily on budget issues.

Unresolved race

Reflecting the election returns, the House re-elected Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.), who had been renominated by the Democratic caucus. The party lineup in the House is 252 Democrats and 182 Republicans, with the winner in the Indiana 8th Congressional District still in doubt. With a controversial recount still incomplete, only a handful of votes separate incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey and Republican Richard D. McIntyre.

On a party-line vote, the House refused to seat McIntyre while the result was still in doubt.

There were no election challenges in the Senate where the new lineup, including holdovers, is 53 Republicans and 47 Democrats. Sen. Robert Dole of Kansas will lead the reduced Republican minority. The GOP leader in the previous Congress, Howard H. Baker, Jr., of Tennessee, retired from the Senate.

In the House, the Democratic caucus assured the election of Rep. William H. Gray III as chairman of the important Budget Committee. Gray, a black minister from Philadelphia, had a 97 percent "right" voting record by COPE standards during his previous three terms in the House. The outgoing committee chairman, James R. Jones (Okla.), was ineligible for another term under House rules.

The chief caucus battle was the challenge to the reelection of House Armed Services Committee Chairman Melvin Price (Ill.), who has served in the House since 1945. Price, vulnerable because of age, was replaced by Les Aspin of Wisconsin.

The party caucuses will not act on committee assignments until Congress reconvenes.

In the Senate, where Republicans hold the chairmanships, election returns and the choice of Dole as party leader brought important reshuffles. Sen. Bob Packwood, a moderate who has been out of favor with the Reagan White House, is the new head of the tax-writing Finance Committee.

The Foreign Relations Committee will be headed by Sen. Richard G. Lugar (Ind.), and Sen. John C. Danforth will chair the Commerce Committee.

Surge in imported footwear caused loss of 5,000 jobs

The unchecked surge of footwear imports caused more havoc in the American shoe industry last year as 89 more U.S. factories were forced to shut down, wiping out the jobs of 5,000 workers.

The Commerce Dept. reported footwear imports rose 27 percent during the first 11 months of 1984 and that foreign-made shoes now control a record 72 percent of the U.S. market.

"Animals on the endangered species list get better protection from the American government than do shoe workers, whose job and livelihoods are endangered by imports," President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers and President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers said in a joint statement.

The Commerce Dept. said that some 685 million pairs of foreign-made shoes entered the U.S. in the first 11 months of 1984, compared to 539.4 million pairs in the same period in 1983.

"Despite this torrent of foreign imports, which is drowning the American footwear industry, the U.S. International Trade Commission in an outrageous action last July found no cause to recommend relief for the domestic industry," Wynn and Finley said.

Since 1981, when President Reagan removed import restrictions on shoes, 34,000 shoe workers have lost their jobs and whole communities have been devastated as companies closed their doors, they observed.

New investigation

Reacting to the ITC's decision, the Senate Finance Committee has demanded that it reopen the case and conduct a new investigation of the impact of imports on the U.S. shoe industry. The ITC investigation is slated to begin this month.

"We hope and pray that 1985 will be a better year for American shoe workers," Finley and Wynn said.

"Unfortunately, little can be done for the hundreds of companies which have already closed or for the tens of thousands of men and women who have lost their jobs.

"But by prompt, effective action this year on behalf of the American shoe industry, the ITC can enable the remaining fragment of this once proud and strong industry to survive and prosper."

ILGWU to monitor homework 'experiment'

The Ladies' Garment Workers informed the Labor Dept. that if the government cannot effectively enforce fair labor standards in the home knitting industry over the next two years, the union will seek to reimpose an outright ban on industrial homework.

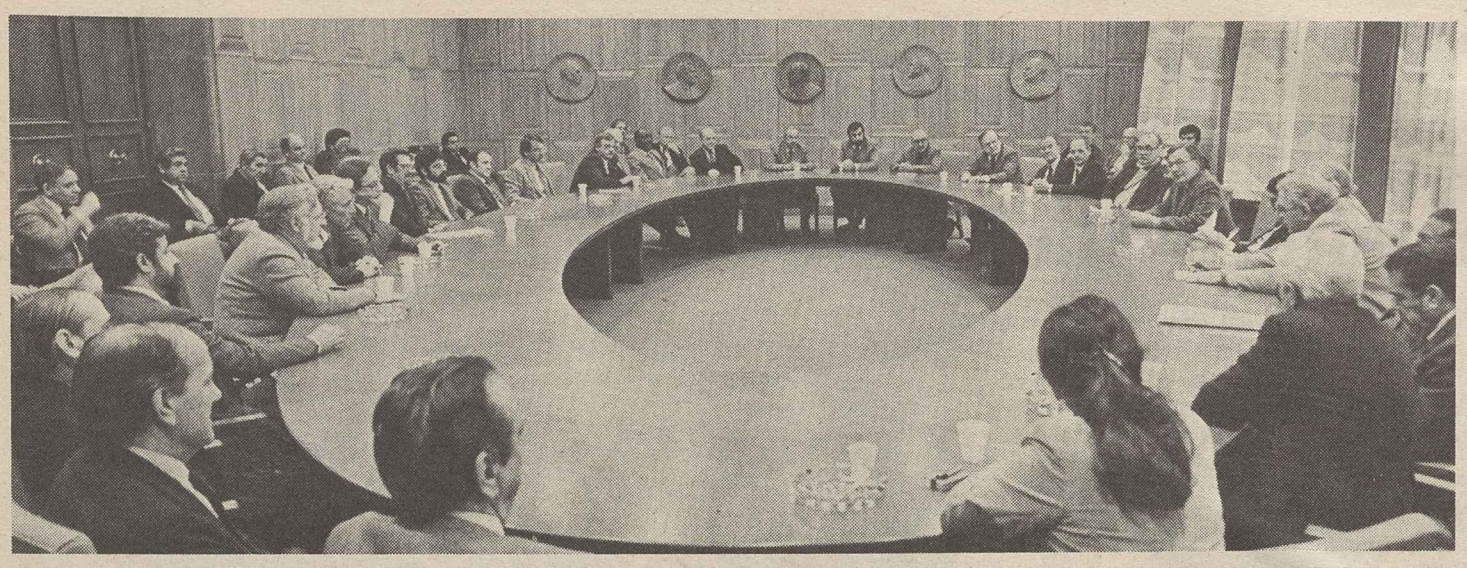
In a letter to Under Sec. of Labor Ford B. Ford, ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin said the union views the department's November decision to rescind the 42-year-old ban on homework in the knitted outerwear industry as an "experiment," and will withhold judgment on it for the next 12 to 24 months.

Under the new rule, employers who hire homeworkers must first obtain a certificate from the department and are subject to periodic inspections of wage and hour records.

Chaikin said the union would have challenged the new rule had not the Labor Dept. promised to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act among employers of homeworkers in the industry.

"If the commitments of resources cannot be kept, or if the rosy predictions of effective enforcement . . . are not confirmed by the quarterly reports from the regions and the record made," Chaikin said, "we will look to you to discontinue the new system."

Chaikin stressed the union's continuing concern that "the same impediments that precluded enforcement of the FLSA among homeworkers in the knitted outerwear industry in 1942 preclude its enforcement among these homeworkers today, and the results of the department's enforcement program since 1981 do not support the Secretary's contrary assessment."



During the two-year experimental project, the ILGWU will make periodic demands for all enforcement records, Chaikin said.

The union has actively fought the Labor Dept.'s three-year drive to rescind the ban on industrial homework. A November 1981 rescission of the ban was successfully challenged with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordering the ban reinstated unless modified by rulemaking.

ITU publications post filled by Clyde East

Colorado Springs, Colo. — Clyde East, organizing director for the Typographical Union, has been named to the union's public relations department where he will coordinate production of the monthly ITU Review. He replaces Horst Reschke.

East, a member of ITU Cincinnati Local 3, worked in the composing room of the Charleston, W.Va., Gazette and as editor of the weekly St. Albans, W.Va., Advertiser, before joining the ITU staff in 1960.

Overseas program report

Country program directors of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and Asian-American Free Labor Institute exchanged year-end views with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at federation headquarters. The directors reported on the status of programs in countries where AIFLD and AAFLI assist developing unions.

Unions seek court action to require tighter exposure limit on toxic gas

Four AFL-CIO unions are seeking an appellate court review of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's decision not to set a short-term exposure limit (STEL) for the carcinogen ethylene oxide (EtO), which is used by thousands of hospital workers.

The State, County & Municipal Employees, Service Employees, Clothing & Textile Workers and Hospital & Health Care Employees will join the Public Citizen Health Research Group in petitioning the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia for review of the agency's decision.

OSHA's issuance of the EtO regulation, the first health standard under the Reagan Administration, has been a game of cat and mouse featuring court orders and missed deadlines.

The nearly three-and-a-half-year court battle for a standard has resulted in a regulation that will do little to prevent adverse health consequences for those workers daily exposed to the substance, the unions charged.

"The action by OSHA is outrageous," said Jordon Barab, AFSCME's health and safety director. "The short-term exposure limit is one of the most important parts of the standard because of the way EtO is used."

EtO is used as a sterilizer in hospitals, and workers are routinely exposed to short-term blasts of the gas when unloading the sterilizing machines.

High levels

Barab noted that an AFSCME study of some 40 hospitals showed more than half reporting workers being able occasionally to smell EtO, indicating exposure levels approaching 500 parts of EtO per million parts of air. The new OSHA standard limits its EtO exposure to 1 ppm over a time-weighted 8-hour day.

Barab added, "We're fairly confident we'll win a good standard in court, but it will take a number of years and workers won't be protected during that time."

William Borwegen, SEIU's health and safety director, said this standard is a "typical example of the Office of Management & Budget gutting an OSHA standard, and it's additionally tragic because it's the only health standard released by the Reagan Administration."

OSHA delayed sending the OMB a copy of the standard to review until just two days before the rule was to be published last June. OMB's review questioned the need for a STEL, contending that there is no scientific evidence to support it.

Then OSHA, after having spent nearly three years developing a standard which concluded from available scientific evidence that a STEL is necessary, killed all references to the establishment of a STEL, explaining it would delay making the decision until it received more evidence.

The regulatory action on EtO began in August 1981, when the unions and the health group petitioned OSHA for a more stringent standard and an emergency standard for the interim period. OSHA denied that request and began step one of the regulatory process, projecting that a final standard would be developed by the fall of 1984.

An appellate court decision in March 1983 decried the projected delay and ordered OSHA to speed up the process because of the "grave danger" EtO poses to workers. The agency issued its partial standard on June 17, 1984, and completed its action on Jan. 2, 1985, when it published its denial of a STEL in the Federal Register.

Part of OSHA's objection to setting a STEL is the lack of research on specific high levels of short-term exposures. Existing studies, including one performed by Johnson & Johnson, show EtO is a health hazard, producing cancers and birth defects in workers exposed to certain levels. Because no specific studies have been done on the effect of high "dose-rate" levels, OSHA felt it could not conclude that high short-term exposures are more harmful. The current regulation will permit workers to be exposed to EtO at levels of 96 ppm for a five-minute period daily.

Callous attitude

Eric Frumin, health and safety director for ACTWU, declared that OSHA's refusal to issue a STEL "again demonstrates the Labor Dept.'s callous attitude toward worker health. The fact is that most workers are exposed to short bursts of EtO. This is precisely the kind of hazard for which STELs are best suited."

He noted that Johnson & Johnson, which employs many ACTWU members, has a STEL in effect in its plants and it has urged OSHA to adopt a similar one.

Drive opened for standards on VDT safety

Asserting that video display terminals pose potentially the worst safety hazard faced by office workers, the Service Employees and "9 to 5," the National Association of Working Women, have opened a nationwide campaign for legislation to protect VDT operators.

At a news conference launching the effort to win state laws and regulations, SEIU President John J. Sweeney warned that the health and safety problems faced by today's office workers "are no less serious than the problems faced by industrial workers in the 1930s."

They are even "more insidious because of their subtlety," Sweeney said.

The joint "Campaign for VDT Safety," Sweeney said, initially will concentrate on 18 states beginning with Massachusetts where a bill setting standards for VDTs was recently introduced. Other targeted states are California, Colorado, Connecticut, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Washington and Wisconsin.

10 million in use

Karen Nussbaum, president of SEIU District 925, the union's office workers' arm, noted that about 10 million office workers, mostly women, now use VDTs on the job, and by the end of the decade, the number could rise to 40 million.

Nussbaum, who is also executive director of the national association, said there is already evidence of safety and health problems among VDT users that raise "a very serious red flag for the safety of VDT workers."

The position taken by most VDT manufacturers and employers that precautionary measures are not necessary until there is further research into the hazards is "irresponsible," she charged.

Legislative effort

Sweeney said tactics used in the effort to gain protections will vary from state to state. In some states, the campaign will seek laws setting standards and design specifications for VDTs, while in others it will aim for regulatory action or purchasing guidelines.

The newest approach, Sweeney said, will be to seek "right-to-know" laws to help workers get answers to key questions about their VDTs, such as whether their machines have proper radiation shielding and glare reduction devices.

Sweeney said the union will continue its efforts to educate employers and workers on the issues. It also will continue to seek voluntary safety standards and will ask manufacturers to build in safety features.

Nussbaum reported that 9 to 5 set up a toll-free hotline in 1983 and "we fielded over 6,000 calls from VDT operators suffering from a wide range of health problems." She said the reports verified research studies that found a high rate of serious ailments among VDT workers.

3-year pact ends San Francisco's restaurant strike

San Francisco—A three-month strike against some of this city's best restaurants ended when the members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 2 ratified a new agreement with the Golden Gate Restaurant Association.

The three-year contract, covering 55 restaurants and 1,500 workers, was approved by a 376 to 45 vote. A series of selective strikes at 25 of the 55 establishments had allowed most members of the union to continue working while negotiations continued. The previous contract expired on Aug. 31.

HERE Local 2 President Charles Lamb said the restaurants will increase contributions to the health and welfare plan $60 a month per employee—$15 the first year, $20 the second and $25 in the third. The employers' pension contribution was increased by $5 per month to $47, Lamb said.

Vacation language was improved with workers now eligible for three weeks of vacation after five years of service instead of six years. The contract, however, cut two personal days off and relaxed the work rules on cross-craft "relieving and assisting," Lamb said.

Wages were improved by 3 percent in each of the final two years for those workers who do not receive tips. Those who do get tips will see increases of 2 percent in the second and third years.

Key to settling the negotiations was how to return the Local 800 members to work at establishments that had hired permanent replacements. Lamb said all strikers wishing to return to work must do so within 30 days.

OSHA seeks review of ruling on noise

Richmond, Va. — The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has asked for a full-court rehearing of the controversial appeals court decision that struck down the agency's hearing conservation rule governing noise in the workplace.

Prodded by labor and professional groups, OSHA petitioned the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for a rehearing. It cited the failure of the three-judge panel that issued the split decision to "evaluate the rulemaking record" and to "apply well settled legal standards" for evaluating whether OSHA sufficiently buttressed its presumption that hearing loss in workers exposed to high levels of noise is job related.

The court's Nov. 7 decision held that an employer cannot be required to take any measures to protect workers from exposure to noise hazards unless it can be proven that no non-occupational factors contributed to any hearing loss suffered by the workers.

The AFL-CIO, on Dec. 11, petitioned the appeals court for the right to intervene in the case and informed OSHA of its effort, citing concern that the agency might allow the decision to stand. Such a court ruling, if generally followed, "could well threaten OSHA's authority to promulgate occupational health standards that provide covered workers the protections Congress intended in passing the OSH Act," the federation said.

Protection measures

The hearing conservation provisions fall into two categories: those triggered by the level of noise in the workplace and those triggered by a worker's hearing loss. When the noise level exceeds an "action level" of 85 decibels averaged over an 8-hour workday, the employer must monitor exposures and provide the workers with annual hearing tests. If a worker experiences a 10-decibel hearing loss, the employer is required to provide hearing protection and training.

OSHA's petition pointed out that the appeals court vacated the entire hearing amendment, even though its objection centered on the provisions that are triggered by a worker's hearing loss. OSHA said, "The court's error in striking down the provisions linked to workplace noise levels is a very serious one, because these provisions by themselves would have afforded employees significant protections."

The AFL-CIO's petition to intervene in the case is still under review and will likely be ruled on when the court decides whether to grant a full-court review on the hearing conservation amendment decision, said George Cohen, an attorney for the federation.

Dropout rate deplored

Study stresses needs of Hispanic students

A "shocking" number of Hispanic teenagers are being "wasted" in our society because their educational needs are being ignored and their ambitions and promising potential are stunted.

That's the major finding of a study by the National Commission on Secondary Schooling for Hispanics, whose members include AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields.

The report warned that the high dropout rates and low school achievement levels of a "staggering number" of Hispanic high school students have a "devastating effect" on their communities today and pose a serious threat to society tomorrow.

But the damage can be avoided, the commission said, by changes in the way the educational system serves Hispanic students.

It urged better communications among students, teachers, parents and community groups, as well as curriculum changes aimed at the unique needs of Hispanic students. It called for more jobs at decent wages so Hispanic students in poor families can meet the urgent need to work without dropping out.

Teaching stressed

Language barriers are a handicap to many Hispanic students but not the entire problem, the panel noted.

It urged improvements in the teaching of both English and second languages to all students.

Commenting on the report, Shields pointed out that while many Hispanic students do well in school, the wide gap between the expectations of Hispanic students and their achievement rates convinced the commission that the nation's educational system has not been successful in meeting their needs.

"We learned that there is no one pat answer to the problem. A combination of solutions is needed that will, in the long run, benefit not only Hispanic teenagers, but all children in our schools," the AFL-CIO education director stressed.

The commission was formed in 1983 by the Washington-based Hispanic Policy Development Project. Its study was funded by the Atlantic Richfield Foundation, CBS, Inc., Time, Inc. and the Carnegie Corporation.

Growing population

The report points out that the educational achievements of Hispanic Americans is critically important to society because the Hispanic population is growing quickly and is increasingly "an integral part of the fabric of our society and the future work force available to business and industry."

Yet high rates of poverty and unemployment plague the Hispanic community, and these economic and social difficulties are an important factor in the problems Hispanic students face in school, the commission found.

As many as 45 percent of Hispanic students drop out of school before graduation, and about 40 percent of the dropouts leave school before the 10th grade, the study found. It noted success with projects involving better guidance counseling and other ways of helping students cope with "the personal stress and family stress that arise from the poverty, violence and isolation of inner-city life."

The commission opposed both the exclusive use of English in teaching and entirely bilingual education for Hispanic students.

English is the language of this country and should be taught "efficiently and effectively," the panel said. But Hispanic students who need transitional programs to help them attend English-speaking classes should get that special help, it urged.

Students also should be encouraged to become fully literate in Spanish, not only as part of their own cultural heritage, but also because it is becoming increasingly valuable in the work place to be bilingual, the report recommended.

Better work-study programs are needed to provide students with the chance to earn decent wages and job skills at the same time, the report urged.

Transit Union picks La Sala to succeed Rowland

Amalgamated Transit Union President John W. Rowland will retire May 1, and the ATU executive board has elected Executive Vice President James La Sala to succeed him and complete the term that expires in September 1986.

Rowland, 64, was first elected president in 1981 and re-elected in 1983. Earlier, he served as the union's executive vice president and as secretary-treasurer. He is the first person in the union's 92-year history to have held each of its three top offices.

Before becoming an ATU vice president in 1964, Rowland had held all elected positions in his home Local 788 in St. Louis.

La Sala, 57, was elected executive vice president at the union's 1981 convention after serving for 12 years as a vice president. Prior to joining the ATU staff as a special organizer in 1968, he held top offices in ATU Local 824 in New Brunswick, N.J.

The ATU executive board also elected Vice President Ellis Franklin, 56, to fill the post being vacated by La Sala. Before his election as a vice president in 1975, Franklin was president of the ATU National Council of Greyhound Locals in Phoenix.

Backing Yale strikers

A welcome and a pledge of continued support is extended by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at a reception at federation headquarters to raise money for the strike fund of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34 at Yale University. The 2,600 clerical and technical workers struck Sept. 26 over pay and racial discrimination issues. At the fund-raiser, sponsored by HERE Local 25 and Concerned Yale Alumni, are, from left, Rep. Charles Hayes (D-Ill.), a former Food & Commercial Workers vice president, Rev. Jesse Jackson and Debbie Chernoff of the Local 34 negotiating committee. The strikers went back to work in mid-December, but warned that they will resume the walkout if agreement is not reached soon.

HRDI's Mississippi project assists dislocated workers

Jackson, Miss. — Dislocated workers throughout Mississippi will be linked with jobs, skill training, and other re-employment assistance through a new AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute project.

Operated in cooperation with the Mississippi AFL-CIO, HRDI's Job Transition Services Project will also represent organized labor on a "rapid response team" working to identify potential plant closings in the state and providing early intervention services for the workers. The pilot project, to run through June 30, 1985, is supported by $57,401 awarded by the state under Title III of the Job Training Partnership Act.

"We are excited about the opportunity to work with the Mississippi AFL-CIO on this project," HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold said. "The jobless rate in Mississippi is the third highest in the country—and many thousands of the unemployed were displaced by mass layoffs and closings," he noted.

Project Coordinator Charlie Horhn, a member of the Electrical Workers, will work out of a Job Transition Services Center in Pearl, Miss., near Jackson.

In cooperation with the Mississippi AFL-CIO, the coordinator will survey all central labor councils, building trades council, and other local unions to identify dislocated workers in all parts of the state.

The project will assess the workers' needs for retraining, upgrading and other re-employment activities, and help them obtain appropriate services and new jobs.

Prime objective

All project activities will be coordinated with the state employment service, and survey findings will be reported monthly to the Mississippi Employment Security Commission and other agencies serving dislocated workers. A prime objective is to help the agencies target their services to the needs that labor identifies.

The project will also help Mississippi labor contribute its knowledge of growth occupations and assist in directing JTPA training for dislocated workers to these trades.

Horhn will also work with local unions to identify potential plant closings and mass layoffs and provide or arrange needed assistance for the affected workers. Key activities will include:

- Helping conduct Worker Assistance Workshops for workers losing their jobs in company closings and cutbacks.
- Counseling and assessing the marketable skills of dislocated union members and referring them to local employment service offices or other agencies for needed services.
- Working with joint apprenticeship committees for the building trades and other bona fide programs to arrange entry opportunities or preapprenticeship training for dislocated workers.

Follow up surveys will be made on dislocated workers identified through project activities to find out whether they are being adequately assisted by the state's dislocated worker programs and other available services.

Maryland studies program a memorial to Tom Bradley

College Park, Md. — AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged labor's full "support, encouragement and participation" in making the Thomas W. Bradley Program of Labor Studies at the University of Maryland a success.

Kirkland made the pledge at the dedication of the program honoring the memory of Bradley, who was president of the Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO when he died Oct. 27, 1983.

The labor studies program at the university will be expanded to include more courses and to make them available at locations throughout the state, Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Edward A. Mohler said. The program of labor studies is under the university's Industrial Relations & Labor Studies Center.

Kirkland told the audience of labor, state and university officials that Bradley had helped extend the labor movement's long commitment to education.

"On behalf of this university, he lobbied for more state and federal funding, and on behalf of working people, he lobbied this university itself to do a better job. Working people need and deserve more attention than they get from the schools and universities they support, including this one," Kirkland said.

American workers and their unions today face an array of problems, the federation president said, pointing to "toothless and maladministered laws, increasingly complex technology, cunning and ruthless assaults by so-called 'labor consultants' armed with the latest 'human engineering' tools devised by academic social-science researchers." To face these problems, Kirkland said, workers need education programs taught by teachers with experience in the real world.

Bradley's long fight to persuade the university to upgrade its labor studies program was grounded in his conviction that the better-equipped workers become to cope with the forces that affect their lives, the better Maryland would become for all its citizens, Kirkland said.

"Any institution that proposes to do business under the name of Thomas W. Bradley is setting for itself a very high standard," Kirkland told the audience. "This program, I assume, will be dedicated not only to Tom's memory, but to his principles, his vision and his hope for the future."

MEBA District 1 elects DeFries as new president

C. E. DeFries was elected president of District 1-Pacific Coast District of the Marine Engineers in a membership vote.

DeFries, 56, is currently executive vice president of the district. He will take office as president on Jan. 1, 1985, succeeding Jesse M. Calhoon, who has held the office since 1961.

Calhoon, who announced last September his decision to retire from the district presidency, continues as MEBA president. He was re-elected to a four-year term as national president at the union's convention last March.

Unions score extended cuts at Eastern Air

The three major unions representing Eastern Airlines employees may initiate legal action against the carrier to resolve problems posed by the airline's unilateral decision to extend wage concessions beyond the date set by their contracts.

The Machinists, representing 12,000 workers, the Transport Workers, representing some 6,000, and the Air Line Pilots, representing 3,900, were exploring other options also in the wake of the airline's announcement that wage reductions of 18 to 22 percent that were to end Jan. 1 would be extended indefinitely while talks on new contracts continued.

The concessions were agreed to by the unions in December 1983 to help keep Eastern solvent.

Under the agreement, employees gained stock worth approximately one-fourth of the company in exchange for the pay reductions. In addition, employees gained representation on the board of directors and access to company financial data.

No stock

Airlines President Frank Borman informed employees Eastern will continue to withhold 18 to 22 percent from their paychecks but will no longer buy Eastern stock with that money.

As the unions see it, that amounts to a unilateral pay cut.

A key to the dispute will be interpretation of the Railway Labor Act, which requires maintenance of the status quo in wages and benefits when parties in the airline and railroad industries bargain new contracts.

The Machinists pact came up for renewal at the end of 1984, the TWU agreement expires on Mar. 31, and the ALPA contract extends through May.

The airline contended that a so-called status-quo provision in the agreements requires that wages, benefits and rules remain in full effect until it files notice that it seeks to begin negotiations. The unions stressed that the status quo is what exists at the end of the contract term, and that the agreements call for restoration of pay cuts at the beginning of 1985.

Computer training

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue tries out the new personal computer that was donated to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. Jim Lindner, president of Philips Information Systems, right, presented that union-made computer to Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., director of the Meany center, second from right, and an identical machine was given to the Operating Engineers, represented by IUOE Research Director Ted Reed.

Metal Trades members ratify new Electric Boat contract

Groton, Conn. — The New London Metal Trades Council, representing some 12,000 workers at General Dynamics Corp.'s Electric Boat Division, signed a new 42-month contract providing improvements in pensions, pay and health care.

The agreement, ratified in an 8,606-to-786 vote by the members of the nine unions in the council, was settled six months before the prior contract expired.

MTC President Thomas Kiddy said the new contract includes a sign-up bonus of $150 which was paid before Christmas. A 4-percent lump sum payment to workers is scheduled for June 30, 1985, with general wage increases of 4 percent in June 1986 and 3 percent in June 1987.

Over the term of the agreement, monthly pension benefits will be increased from the present $14 to $18 per year of service.

A comprehensive medical plan for retirees and their dependents becomes available on Apr. 1, 1985, with the company picking up two-thirds of the cost of the

The Medical benefits improvements include a hospice care program for the terminally ill, limited to $5,000, a vision care program that provides for biannual examinations and a hearing care plan that will pay up to $400 per ear for hearing aids and $75 for triennial exams.

Sick and accident benefits are improved from a range of $105-$190 to $125-$230.

The nine unions in the council are the Boilermakers, Painters, Machinists, Office & Professional Employees, Carpenters, Electrical Workers, Laborers, Molders and Plumbers & Pipefitters.

Oklahoma IAFF wins key ruling

Oklahoma City, Okla.—Armed with a strong state supreme court decision on collective bargaining rights, Oklahoma City Fire Fighters are hammering out a new contract with the city that has important implications for public employees statewide.

The Oklahoma high court ruled unanimously in late October that the state's fire fighters' and policemen's arbitration law, which provides for collective bargaining and a non-binding arbitration, specifically covers high-ranking officers and supervisors the city had tried to exclude from contract protections.

The Oklahoma AFL-CIO called the ruling a landmark decision that not only expands the protections of the law, but also makes it tougher for cities to use bad-faith bargaining to force talks with their employees to an impasse.

The suit was brought by Fire Fighters Local 1524 President Charles L. Stone and Paul D. Taylor, president of Lodge 123 of the unaffiliated Fraternal Order of Police.

Stone said the unions turned to the courts last August after a series of bargaining sessions that began in May failed to resolve the issue of whether the high-ranking officers would be recognized as employees covered by the union contract and protected by grievance procedures. The existing agreement expired June 30.

The city's tactic, Stone charged, was to force the negotiations to an impasse and to the non-binding arbitration, which the city would then be free to ignore. Oklahoma law prohibits public employee strikes.

But in a key interpretation of the state public worker bargaining law, the high court's nine justices criticized that ploy as a "refusal to bargain in good faith."

Public employers and public employee unions in Oklahoma are obligated to bargain in the "highest standard of good faith" not only by the state law but also federal labor law, the justices held.

For the city to try to force the unions to "abandon" their obligation and duty to represent all members of the bargaining unit as spelled out in state law—because it knows it can get its way by forcing an impasse—is legally "untenable," the court said.

In its opinion, the court stressed that "this strong policy of requiring absolute good faith in bargaining is necessary to counterbalance the absence of the right to strike and the absence of the availability of binding arbitration."

Order lacking

While the court declared the top officers under the protection of the bargaining law, and found that the city had failed in its statutory duty to bargain in good faith, it did not issue a writ with specific orders to the city.

Stone said that the parties have been back to the bargaining table and have made some progress on language providing for recognition of the unions as representatives of the officers. But talks are stalled again over a grievance procedure, with the union asserting that the officers must be included in the union's procedure while the city is insisting on applying its own personnel policies.

New talks are scheduled for the end of January, and Stone said the unions are prepared to go back to court if a fair set-cover only non-monetary provisions of the two-year contract. Monetary items, which are renegotiated annually, were settled last May.

Stone said the negotiations had produced another key victory when the city council agreed to rescind its strict residency rule that required city employees to live in the city limits.

Social security payroll tax increased

America's workers will pay a higher social security tax this year, cutting deeper into take-home pay.

As of Jan. 1, the payroll tax rate rose from the 1984 level of 6.7 percent to 7.05 percent. That amounts to an $88-a-year increase for a worker earning $25,000 a year.

The maximum wage subject to the social security tax also goes up, from $37,800 to $39,600. That will not affect anyone whose earnings are below $37,800. But persons earning the new maximum or more will pay a total of $2,791.80 in social security taxes this year, up $259 from 1984. Their higher payments will entitle them to higher retirement or disability benefits.

Some 37 million social security beneficiaries received a 3.5 percent cost-of-living increase in checks delivered this month. They also will be able to earn more in 1985 before having social security benefits offset by earnings.

For recipients under 65, the earnings ceiling was raised this year from $5,160 to $5,400. For those 65-69, the cutoff was raised from $6,960 to $7,320. There is no offset for persons 70 or older.

Pay gain won in arbitration of postal pact

for the catch-up. They will seek to compress the timetable in future contracts.

Most letter carriers and postal clerks hired in the future will catch up to the pay levels of present employees in two steps, over a period of 140 weeks.

Employees covered by the arbitration will receive a 2.7-percent pay raise retroactive to July 21, with additional increases of the same percentage in July 1985 and July 1986. They will continue to receive cost-of-living provisions under the same formula as in the previous agreement. And the $1,643 in cost-of-living adjustments received under the expired contract will be rolled in at the end of the contract period, following the pattern of the previous three-year contract.

Management had proposed to buy out the accumulated COLA with a bonus instead of a roll-in to the pay scale and had sought to reduce the formula for future adjustments.

The unions also obtained an additional holiday, commemorating the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., despite management arguments that postal workers already have more holidays than most private-sector employees.

The average postal salary is about $23,000 a year and Kerr, the arbitration board chairman, described the contract wage adjustments as "moderate restraints." The COLA provision, he noted, offsets about 60 percent of the rise in the cost of living. The panel left the provision unchanged, denying both union attempts to increase the formula and a management proposal to apply it only to price increases in excess of 3 percent.

Nation's economy viewed as shaky

Also, the economy generally is losing the initial impetus generated by the huge tax cuts to individuals by the 1981 Reagan tax reduction measure and consumers are beginning to feel more cautious and less confident about the future. Fears of a recession are causing many to defer purchases.

Recovery from the long Reagan Recession of 1981-82 has been uneven, furthermore, and a number of industries are "in very substantial doldrums, particularly basic metals and machine tools, and there are continued problems in textiles and garments," Oswald observed.

While there has been substantial improvement in the U.S. auto industry since the early 1980s, production is still below the robust level of 1978 when domestic output totaled 9.2 million units. Production in 1983 reached 6.8 million units, and climbed last year to about 8.2 million.

"Significantly, there are still 50,000 auto workers on indefinite layoff," Oswald noted.

Some present

The company provoked the bitter strike by members of 13 unions when it refused to agree to an industry pattern settlement and instead demanded deep wage and benefit cuts. Phelps Dodge had been trying to keep its struck mines and smelters open using scabs and supervisors.

Axing the Civil Service

CONGRESS ESTABLISHED the federal civil service 102 years ago this month, and the Reagan Administration appears to be doing its utmost to demolish it.

The most recent episode is the virtual directive to government agencies to bypass the merit system. The Office of Personnel Management has given agencies a free hand to hire "temporary" employees instead of utilizing civil service registers. These new hires would receive fewer benefits and would have virtually no job protection. Their continued employment would be subject to the whim of management—or of the political party in power.

Earlier, President Reagan served notice that he will seek a 5 percent pay cut for all federal workers. Not too subtly, his aides put forth the suggestion that government workers and their unions shouldn't resist too vigorously because the alternative was likely to be more large-scale layoffs.

THE LATEST ROUND of civil service bashing is explained as a necessary step to reduce the budget deficit, which President Reagan discovered after the election does indeed exist.

Perhaps we can help in the process.

A bit of research into 19th Century newspaper files has turned up some potential revenue-enhancers that should appeal to Office of Personnel Management Director Donald Devine.

Back before the reformers messed things up and passed the Civil Service Act of 1883, newspapers in Washington regularly carried classified advertisements from persons who offered substantial sums for appointment to government jobs. We're talking about jobs as clerks, not ambassador posts.

Now there's an untapped source of revenue for a free-enterprise administration. Don't just scuttle the civil service. Follow through by putting the jobs up for sale.

That would really be rolling the clock back.

Tackling the Deficit

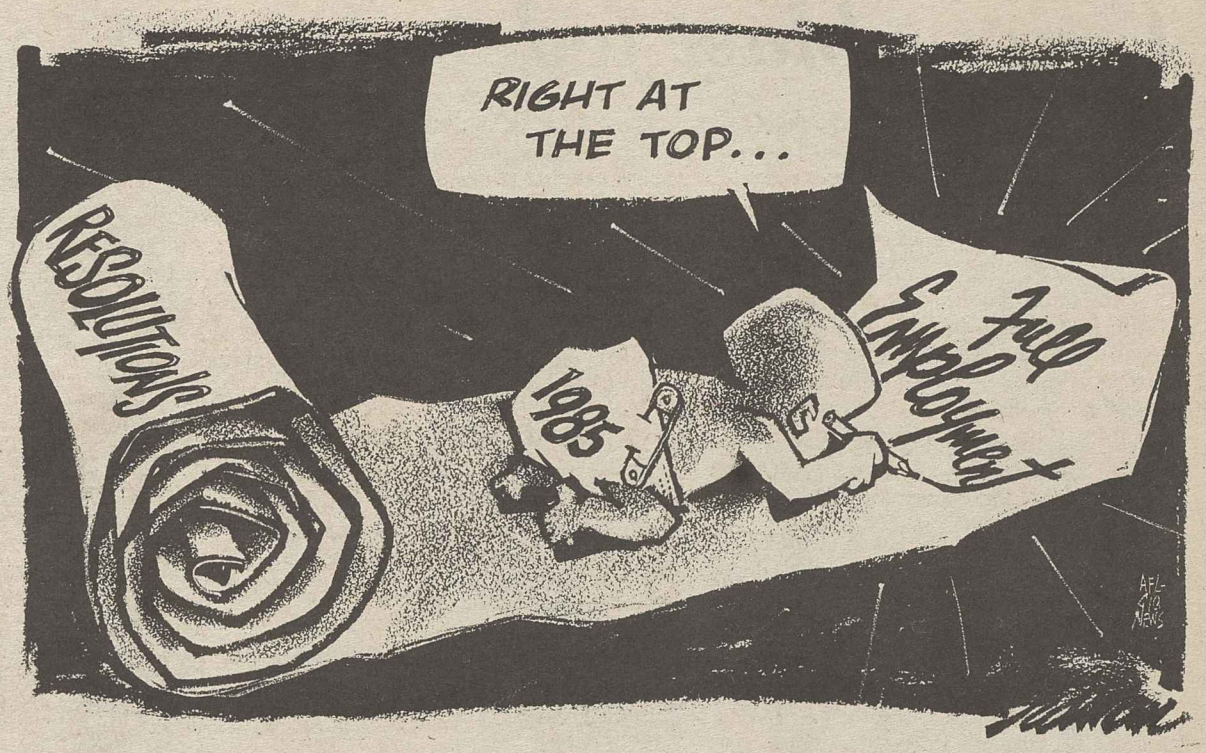
MEMBERS OF the newly elected Congress, Democrats and Republicans alike, have been quoted as expressing dismay at the hard choices they face in an effort to bring the budget deficit down to a digestible size.

The dismay is understandable.

Already, there are hints that the White House will not object too strongly if Congress should take the initiative and block cost-of-living increases for social security beneficiaries. That would get the President off the hook on his campaign pledge not to tamper with social security benefits.



It would also amount to a near-criminal misuse of the surplus currently generated by social security payroll deductions to paper over an unrelated budget deficit instead of paying promised benefits.

Even apart from the social security issue, the budget that President Reagan will send to Congress later this month almost certainly will include program cutbacks that are politically and socially unacceptable, while still short of deficit reduction goals.

THE KEY to dealing with the deficit must be fairness, an element that has been lacking in the Administration's previous budget proposals. And that should apply with at least equal emphasis to the inevitable task of raising additional revenue. There is no way, short of abdicating essential government functions, that spending cuts alone can turn the deficit around.

The Treasury Dept., unwittingly perhaps, took what could be an important step to a solution when it proposed recently a tax simplification package. There are elements that labor opposes, principally the taxation of job-related fringe benefits. But it also calls for significant loophole-closings in the corporate sector.

The tax proposals were designed to be revenue-neutral, neither increasing nor decreasing the total tax burden. But if revenue must be raised, and there appears no realistic alternative, the tax reform elements of the Treasury proposal point in the right direction.

Influx of bogus products costs U.S. workers jobs

By Press Associates, Inc.

During the recent Christmas buying season, federal customs agents seized tens of thousands of bogus Cabbage Patch dolls around the country. In addition to being counterfeit, some of the dolls were dangerously flammable.

Lurking beneath the often lighthearted media reports about the cute but phony Cabbage Patch Kids lies an ugly story of multi-billion-dollar consumer ripoffs, injuries, deaths, and lost jobs.

The United States has become the world's largest market for a growing underground business of passing off shoddy, often hazardous merchandise as trusted, trademarked products. Bogus goods cost U.S. companies at least $8 billion annually in lost sales, which translates into more than 130,000 lost jobs each year, according to the International Trade Commission (ITC).

Consumers here and abroad are defrauded out of billions of dollars by commercial counterfeiters who profit richly at little risk from the good name or status appeal of the brands they copy. Consumers use many of these products daily: watches, designer jeans, luggage, golf clubs, cough medicine and even deodorant.

Counterfeit industrial goods also are booming here. The U.S. auto parts industry has been especially hard hit, losing an estimated $3 billion a year to fake and substandard oil filters, spark plugs and many other products. These shoddy products force consumers to spend millions of dollars in unnecessary auto repairs.

Accident cause

Moreover, phony auto parts such as faulty brake linings are believed by industry experts to be the cause of a growing number of accidents.

Bogus parts have been blamed by congressional investigators for fatal bus accidents and helicopter crashes. Counterfeits of vital parts have been detected on commercial airliners, on a space shuttle test, and in military missile systems.

Consumer health and safety also is being threatened by ineffective or nonsterile drugs, pharmaceuticals and agricultural chemicals.

The value of fakes from clandestine foreign factories has ballooned from an estimated $3 billion in 1978 to about $18 billion in 1983, according to the U.S. Customs Service. This has contributed to the nation's worsening balance of trade.

Criminal link

Trade in pirated goods today accounts for about 2 percent of total world trade, according to the Commission of the European Community. Elements of organized crime are said to be involved in the distribution and sale of counterfeits, especially in the apparel and consumer electronics industries.

More than 40 countries, including the United States, are sources of bogus goods, according to an ITC study. But most of the fakes were said to originate in the sweatshops of the countries of the Pacific Basin, including Taiwan, South Korea, Hong Kong, Singapore, the Philippines and Indonesia.

Congress moved last October to remedy the weak laws and lax enforcement regarding commercial counterfeiting. It enacted the Trademark Counterfeiting Act providing badly needed criminal sanctions and increased civil penalties against manufacturers, distributors and retailers who market products with counterfeit trademarks.

Further, Congress linked continuation of duty-free trade preferences for developing nations to their actions in stopping the counterfeiting of U.S. firms' trademarked products.

John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Commerce investigations subcommittee, said: "The enactment of most of the subcommittee's recommendations in only one session of Congress is a testament to the rapidly growing bipartisan awareness that we cannot continue to allow foreign pirates to endanger the health and safety of American consumers and to rob us of tens of thousands of jobs and the capital needed for our economic future."

Unions blast federal move to hire 'temporaries'

A new Administration policy that encourages federal agencies to hire temporary employees as a means of holding down government costs is "an attempt to undermine the whole federal personnel system," the Government Employees charged.

"It would subvert the concept of a steady, conscientious, reliable, and dedicated workforce," AFGE President Kenneth Blaylock declared.

"It comes down to, 'Do you want to run your government like a model employer, or a McDonald's?' "

The new policy, outlined in a directive by Director Donald J. Devine of the Office of Personnel Management, gives federal agencies broad authority to hire and retain temporary employees without going through the competitive selection process required for permanent Civil Service appointments.

The policy, which took effect Jan. 2, constitutes a significant reversal of personnel policy within the federal government.

"The whole intent of the merit system, when it was established 100 years ago, was to build a long-term career workforce that would maintain continuity when government changes at the top," Blaylock observed.

Question of quality

"With temporary employees, you get people who are just floating, who are between jobs or not looking for solid work. Are those the kind of people we want inspecting meat, treating veterans, and writing social security checks?"

In announcing the new policy, Devine said the use of temporary employees would make it easier for agencies to adjust to budget cuts and to carry out President Reagan's policy of contracting with private companies to perform certain government activities when it is economical to do so.

"It is necessary to encourage use" of temporary employees, he wrote, because they are "very cost efficient."

Earlier, Reagan had announced his intention to cut the pay of full-time government workers by 5 percent in the next fiscal year and to slash their retirement benefits.

The New York Times reported that a confidential memorandum prepared for Devine by his staff noted that temporary employees "have significantly fewer rights and benefits" than career employees. It also pointed out that temporary employees are ineligible for federal health benefits, may be dismissed "at will," and have no appeal rights or other protection against adverse personnel actions.

Regular government employees who believe their rights have been violated may appeal to the Merit Systems Protection Board, an independent federal agency.

Job register bypassed

In the 1984 fiscal year, there were 111,964 temporary appointments out of 2.3 million federal employees, excluding postal workers, the OPM said. More than 90 percent were made "outside the registers," without competitive ranking of job applicants.

The AFGE and other unions representing federal workers charge that the Administration is trying to politicize the Civil Service system.

The new policy would allow use of temporary employees not only in low-level technical and clerical jobs but also in professional positions up to GS-12 levels on the federal pay scale. Such jobs pay up to $41,105 a year.

MEMO FROM COPE

Don't Buy Notion of 'Realigning' Election

Since November 6, many opinion-deliverers have declared it was a "watershed" election.

Or a "realigning election."

Or a "political sea change."

Or an "upheaval."

Or a lot of other words and phrases to describe the results and the political preferences of the electorate in their aftermath.

Polls discover, and pundits discourse upon, a sharp swerve in party support among voters.

Republicans proudly boast "we're it" for the next 25 years or so. Some abashed Democrats scurry about crying, "we have sinned; send in Jerry Falwell."

The decades-long majority status of the Democratic Party, we learn, has been shaken. Voters have discovered Brand X and are crossing the threshhold into its home.

And this is what surveys show. The most recent is a New York Times/CBS poll. It finds as of early December—one month after the election—that a statistically meaningless two percentage points now separate voters who consider themselves Republicans and those who identify themselves as Democrats.

Factoring in those who call themselves independent but "lean" to one party or another, the standings show Democrats 43 percent; Republicans 41. Sixteen percent of the electorate remains staunchly "independent."

This represents a radical shift from 11 months before. Last January, in response to the same question about party identification by the same poll, voters split 52-36 percent for the Democrats.

Interpretations of the new figures vary. Says one pollster who works for the GOP, "There is no question that we are undergoing party realignment." Says one who works for the Democrats, "The figures are the medical equivalent of a patient running a fever after a catastrophic operation." In other words, like most fevers it's temporary.

So, reactions of partisans naturally are a wash. Responses of nonpartisans also cancel one another out.

One political scientist points out, "The acid test for realignment is what happens in congressional elections when there is a presidential landslide. Where is realignment if people are splitting their tickets?" (As they did November 6.)

Another hedges, "What we see is no definitive change, but it's a first step. Unless Reagan's support collapses, I think the changes in 1984 will be significant."

What the poll and others like it do not measure is the degree—so close in time to a presidential election—to which voters base party identification on their presidential preference. It must have substantial influence on their responses.

Here's a bunch of voters just off a long presidential campaign, and wearied of politics and probably of polls and pollsters, too—more concerned with the approaching holidays, winter weather and who's going to make it to the Super Bowl—and some earnest pollster butts into their lives and asks which political party they prefer.

Fifty-nine percent of them had just cast a vote for Republican Reagan a month back. He is a personally popular man. Surely, large numbers of them would say they lean GOP.

It can as easily be argued that 41 percent Republican Party support in early December is serious slippage from 59 percent GOP presidential candidate support in early November, and that Republicans had better start worrying about their base and where they've gone wrong.

Of course, that's not the case, not at the moment anyway, but it's hard to buy the "sea change" notion.

The electorate is wise and very selective over the long haul. And political victories—even big ones—can be astonishingly short-term.

Two years after Lyndon Johnson wiped out Barry Goldwater and pulled along 36 new Democrats into the U.S. House, he had to cough back 47 of his party's members of Congress.

Two years after Richard Nixon swamped George McGovern, gaining only 13 House seats while at it, his party was zapped for a House loss of 42.

Two years after Ronald Reagan defeated Jimmy Carter and was accompanied to Washington by 33 new GOP House members, he had to relinquish 26. In 1984, he gained only 14 GOP House seats and actually dropped two in the Senate.

One or two large gaffes—and what President has ever avoided them?—and an apparent firm base of support turns into quicksand. And surely, if presidential popularity wanes, party popularity will wane with it.

In politics, it can be a painfully swift shift from the bravos to the boos, the rah-rahs to the raspberries. So often has it happened to Presidents and parties, nobody should bet on today's surveys for tomorrow's support.

In view of this, it would be a wise idea for Democrats to come back from the guilt trip so many have set forth on and to bide a while before accepting the notion that 1984 was, indeed, a "realigning" etc. year.

'Don't call us,' inaugural ad tells union talent

By David L. Perlman

If you are young, attractive and squeaky clean, the Presidential Inaugural Committee may have a job for you as a singer or dancer at inauguration week events in Washington.

It's looking for "clean-cut, all-American types."

But don't expect to be paid for your work. And above all, don't get caught with a union card.

That was the message from the Presidential Inaugural Committee in a theatrical trade publication advertisement announcing auditions in New York for "non-union musical theatre performers."

The term "non-union" was emphasized in the audition call. And entertainment unions, with a long record of cooperation in presidential inaugurations, aren't amused.

They've called on President Reagan, who should know first-hand the importance of a union card to professional performers, to overrule his inaugural committee and minimize the damage done by its blatantly anti-union message.

Actors' Equity, the Television & Radio Artists and the Screen Actors Guild, which Reagan once headed, voiced the outrage of their members. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue protested on behalf of millions of other card-carrying union workers.

In New York, Equity's governing body authorized emergency funds for a protest demonstration in Washington, in cooperation with other unions. And Equity's Ethnic Minorities Committee took sharp exception to the implications of the requirement that audition applicants have a "clean-cut, all-American" appearance. Such language could have "a chilling effect" on job opportunities for minorities, the union group protested.

Equity said it wasn't seeking to have the persons chosen in the auditions denied the opportunity to perform at inaugural festivities. But if they did, it wanted them paid the prevailing wage.

Labor presses apartheid battle

South Africa's Phiroshaw Camay addresses conference on support of black unions fighting apartheid.

Black unions called key to social change

By James M. Shevis

An internationally coordinated effort by the world's free trade unions in support of South Africa's black labor movement offers the best hope of one day ending that country's racial policy of apartheid.

That was the consensus of top labor leaders from the United States, black South Africa, and other parts of the world as they met in Washington to explore how best to overcome the apartheid system that denies basic human rights to nearly three-fourths of South Africa's population.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland left no doubt of the American labor movement's continued commitment to the cause of the emerging black trade unions. But he emphasized that the battle must be carried within South Africa by black workers themselves.

Emerging movement

"We have been greatly encouraged by the emergence in recent years of the black trade union movement in South Africa. It is to that movement, and to the brave men and women who lead it—some of whom we are proud to have among us at this conference—that we look for peaceful social change in their country," Kirkland said in a keynote address.

"It is to those inside South Africa fighting on the front lines that we look for leadership in the eradication of apartheid."

Among the 150 trade unionists, academicians, and human rights advocates attending the three-day conference were 11 leaders of South African black trade unions, including Gen.-Sec. Phiroshaw Camay of the Council of Unions of South

Printing trades unions draft plan for merger

The presidents of the Typographical Union and the Graphic Communications Union have announced agreement on terms of a merger between the two organizations.

The next step, following verification of financial calculations by actuaries, will be formal action by the governing boards of the two unions.

If the merger plan is approved, it will be submitted for ratification to referendums of the members of each union.

GCIU President Kenneth J. Brown and ITU President Robert S. McMichen have headed the top-level negotiating teams that began last October. Shortly before Christmas, the negotiators reported "a sound basis for merger" and the final sessions were primarily to tie up loose ends.

On the ITU's part, there was a time limit to carry out a mandate to reach an agreement with the GCIU within the deadline set by delegates to the Typographical Union convention. If a merger document hadn't been negotiated, the ITU would have had to hold a referendum on a proposal to merge with the Teamsters.

Campaign issue

A Teamsters merger had been supported by the ITU's previous leadership and opposed by McMichen in his successful election campaign for the presidency.

In recent months, the ITU has had to battle Teamster raids in several cities despite what McMichen said was the promise of Teamster President Jackie Presser that there would be no raids whatever the ITU decision.

The ITU would have become a division of the Teamsters under the plan previously proposed.

A key issue in the merger dispute within the ITU was whether a shrinkage of membership resulting from the vast technological changes that have revolutionized the printing industry can best be met by strengthening the unity and cooperation of the various crafts within that industry.

The GCIU itself is the product of a series of mergers, involving pressmen, photoengravers and bookbinders.

Pattern contracts shaped by postal arbitration panels

An additional 100,000 postal employees, represented by the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, achieved pay and benefit improvements in new contracts shaped by arbitration panels.

They are similar to the arbitration awards issued the previous week on contracts covering the 500,000 employees represented by the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers.

All of the contracts provide lower starting pay and a catchup within three years for workers hired by the U.S. Postal Ser-

Reagan renews nominations of Rowland, Collyer, Meese

President Reagan has again asked the Senate to confirm his controversial appointments of Robert A. Rowland as head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and Rosemary Collyer as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

The AFL-CIO opposed both nominations at Senate hearings last year, stressing that Rowland and Collyer are unqualified for the posts and hostile to the laws and programs they would administer.

The Senate didn't act on the nominations, but Reagan put his nominees in office by giving them recess appointments when Congress was not in session. If the Senate doesn't approve or reject the nominations before then, the recess appointments will expire at the close of the 1985 session of Congress.

Reagan also resubmitted his nomination of White House Counselor Edwin Meese III to succeed William French Smith as attorney general.

Meese was nominated a year ago, but

OSHA blasted for stalling on formaldehyde

Detroit—The Auto Workers charged that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's refusal to issue an emergency standard on the cancer-causing chemical formaldehyde is a "complete abdication" of the agency's responsibility to assure worker safety and health.

"We were not surprised that OSHA has chosen for a second time since 1981 to reject issuing an emergency standard on formaldehyde," said Dr. Frank Mirer, director of the UAW's health and safety department. "We are disappointed and angered and quite taken aback by the rationale used in denying the emergency measure."

OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland, in a letter to Mirer, said the agency concluded that "there is not sufficient evidence in the record presently before OSHA to support the statutorily required findings of grave danger and necessity."

Rowland said in denying the emergency standard that the agency was not addressing the question of whether a permanent rule on formaldehyde is needed. OSHA will decide on Apr. 15 whether to proceed with permanent rulemaking, he said.

Court review

The UAW first petitioned OSHA in October 1981 for an emergency standard. OSHA's refusal in January 1982 was subsequently reviewed by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, which ordered OSHA to determine whether an emergency standard is necessary.

In addition to its Jan. 8 letter to Mirer, OSHA sent to the Federal Register for publication on Jan. 11 a notice of public hearings to seek additional comments and data on the health risks of workers exposed to formaldehyde.

Dr. Michael Silverstein, an occupational health physician with the UAW, called OSHA's request for additional data "a stalling tactic." A major issue, according to OSHA, is the wide variance being reported on the risk of death to workers exposed to formaldehyde over a working lifetime. Various projections produced risk estimations varying from six in 1 million to two in 100 for exposure levels of 1 part formaldehyde to a million parts air.

Silverstein said there is significant consensus in the scientific community as to the risks of exposure to formaldehyde, citing OSHA's own staff reports. He said for Rowland to "claim he is paralyzed into inaction because some scientists disagree with each other over the level of risk is regulatory cowardice."

Now, that's recovery

Workers may not have noticed any "economic recovery" in their paychecks, but their bosses sure have.

A consulting firm's study showed that the average total pay increase for senior executives was 12.6 percent in 1984, up from 5.6 percent in 1983. Total pay includes salary and bonuses.

The survey by Sibson & Co. of Princeton, N.J., also found that 90 percent of all executives got raises last year, compared to 78 percent in 1983.

Bosses in top floor executive suites fared best of all—chief executive officers averaged pay hikes of 17.8 percent in 1984 and chief operating officers reaped 18.5 percent bigger paychecks, the survey reported.

Auto Workers have key role in GM's new Saturn project

Detroit—The Auto Workers played an integral part in General Motors' planning for its new Saturn Corp., and the union will have a pivotal role in the innovative labor relations at GM's newly launched small car subsidiary.

GM said it will spend about $5 billion over the next several years to get Saturn on the road to compete head-to-head with low-priced imports. Subcompacts made by the new company, the first new brand name at GM since it established Chevrolet in 1918, will be developed and built using advanced technology and production methods.

Donald F. Ephlin, the UAW's vice president for GM, said the new contract to cover the Saturn operations will be innovative, but will not be a "cut-rate" wage and benefit agreement. Wages and benefits are likely to be structured differently than the UAW's contract with GM divisions, but they will have to be equal to the GM pact, he stressed.

The UAW and GM have been participating in a joint study center in Warren, Mich., since 1983 to find ways to increase worker involvement in methods for building small cars, and GM Chairman Roger Smith applauded the "enlightened cooperative spirit of the UAW and its members" in the work at the center that contributed to the planning for Saturn.

Worker involvement

Among the 99 labor and management representatives in the joint study center project were 42 UAW workers and local union officials, the 10-member UAW negotiating team for GM, and eight union staff representatives. The study group agreed that conditions in the new workplace should guarantee workers a greater voice and flexibility in decision-making.

No site has been announced for the new Saturn plant, which will employ about 6,000 workers and generate as many as 14,000 more jobs elsewhere in GM and related industries. The plant is expected to produce about 450,000, four-cylinder, four-passenger, front-wheel-drive cars a year.

In a separate development, the UAW's national Chrysler Council voted not to start early contract negotiations with the Chrysler Corp. on the pact that expires Oct. 15.

The council of presidents of Chrysler locals, at a meeting in Detroit, decided not to open talks until a firm strike deadline has been set to take to the table. The UAW has said it will bargain with the company to re-establish full contract parity with agreements at GM and Ford Motor Co. The union granted some concessions to Chrysler in 1979 to help bail out the then financially strapped firm.

Postal panels follow pattern on pay awards

vice after Jan. 18. Unions will seek to compress the catchup timetable in future contracts.

Mail Handlers President Lonnie Johnson said the union was unhappy with the lowering of the starting rate, especially in view of a fact-finding panel's recommendations last September that management drop its demand for a two-tier system. But he welcomed other provisions in the final agreement, including the 2.7-percent annual pay raise and retention of cost-of-living protection.

The unions also won an additional paid holiday, to observe the birth day of Martin Luther King, Jr. starting in 1986, for a total of 10 holidays.

The Rural Letter Carriers, who have been pushing for parity with city carriers, have a slightly different agreement. Their contract, covering some 60,000 employees, will run six months beyond the three-year term for the other postal unions.

They will receive the same dollar amount of increase as the city carriers, but on a percentage basis this will amount to 2.9 percent a year rather than 2.7 percent.

All of the union contracts, including the start of the first-year pay raise, are retroactive to the expiration of the old agreements on July 20, 1984.

As with the earlier arbitration awards, management members of the arbitration panels expressed unhappiness with the provisions for rolling previous cost-of-living increases into the wage structure.

Lawsuit harassing unions proves costly for contractor

San Francisco—A non-union electrical contractor was ordered to pay legal costs incurred by members of building trades unions to defend themselves against a "harassment" suit that a federal judge found was clearly without merit.

The suit brought by the WSB Electric Co. alleged violation of the Hobbs Act and other anti-racketeer criminal laws by the Rank-and-File Committee to Stop the 2-Gate System, which includes members from a number of unions.

The group has mounted demonstrations at construction sites to call attention to the "separate gate" system that is used by employers to limit the right of striking union construction workers to picket at all entrances to a common job site.

A law firm that frequently represents anti-union employers, Thierman, Simon & Cook, came in for a tongue-lashing from U.S. District Court Judge William W. Schwarzer.

The union actions, which were defended as protected under constitutional free speech rights, could not possibly be construed as violating federal laws, the judge held.

He granted a request by the committee of union members to impose "sanctions" against WSB Electric Co. under Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The rule requires that papers submitted to a federal court be well-grounded in fact and warranted by law. An attorney's signature on the court papers is regarded as certification that the requirement has been met.

Picket site

The picketing took place last spring at a construction site connected with a Veterans Hospital in San Francisco and continued for several days. There were a few minor scuffles, but the police made no arrests and the WSB firm did not seek a state court injunction, which Judge Schwarzer noted would have been the customary procedure for seeking relief.

Instead, a month later, WSB filed the federal court complaint charging violation of the Hobbs Act, which deals with such crimes as extortion, and of the federal Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations Act. The suit also charged a criminal conspiracy "to injure or oppress citizens in the free exercise of their civil rights."

The judge dismissed the complaints as without factual base and said the purpose was to "harass" the rank-and-file committee "presumably to disrupt or discourage its advocacy of hostile views."

Cluttering the courts with baseless litigation to pursue "economic or political objectives" requires "the imposition of sanctions," the judge held. The order that WSB pay $6,125 to the committee for its legal expenses has been complied with, attorneys confirmed.

N.J. ruling clouds status

Akron latest to adopt chemical hazard law

The combined efforts of the Rubber Workers, Chemical Workers and the local AFL-CIO central labor council won adoption by the city of Akron, Ohio, of a worker "right-to-know" law that is stronger than the federal hazard communication rule.

In Trenton, N.J., however, the U.S. district court ruled that the federal law preempts New Jersey's right-to-know act with respect to industries covered by the federal hazard communication rule. Michael S. Bokar, deputy attorney general, said the state would appeal the ruling.

Akron's new statute, passed by a 12 to 1 vote in the city council and signed into law by Mayor Tom Sawyer, covers some 2,500 chemicals. It requires employers annually to file a list of covered chemicals by work area, to label chemicals by name and to provide workers or their representatives material safety data sheets.

Akron is the third Ohio city to enact a right-to-know ordinance, and Cleveland is close to passing similar legislation, Chemical Workers President Frank D. Martino reported. Nineteen states and numerous cities and towns have recognized by law the right of workers to know the hazards posed by chemicals they are exposed to in the workplace. In most instances, the state and local laws are stronger than the rule adopted by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

The new Akron law will go into effect one year after its passage on Dec. 17, 1984, for employers with more than 50 workers and after 18 months for smaller businesses.

The future effectiveness of such local and state legislation, however, is linked to the final outcome of the challenge to the strong New Jersey law by the State Chamber of Commerce and the chemical and fragrance materials industries.

Backing the law

Unions intervening in support of the state law were the Firefighters, Communications Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Paperworkers and districts or locals of the Auto Workers, Clothing & Textile Workers, Electronics Workers, Maintenance of Way Employes, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers.

U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise ruled on Jan. 3 that the federal hazard communication standard prevails over the state law "in its entirety" for manufacturing industries covered by the federal safety and health law. Thus, the ruling noted, communities are prohibited from requiring such industries to provide information on chemicals produced, stored or used within their borders unless specific local legislation is enacted to cover the public's right to know.

Judge Debevoise ruled that the federal hazard communication standard is a "standard" and not a regulation under the law and that the federal law is in force even though portions of it do not become effective until a later date.

The state's argument that its right-to-know law has "purposes in addition to occupational health and safety" does not "insulate it from the preemption provision of the OSH Act," the court ruled.

The court did uphold the application of the state law to those businesses not covered by the federal standard.

Highly industrialized

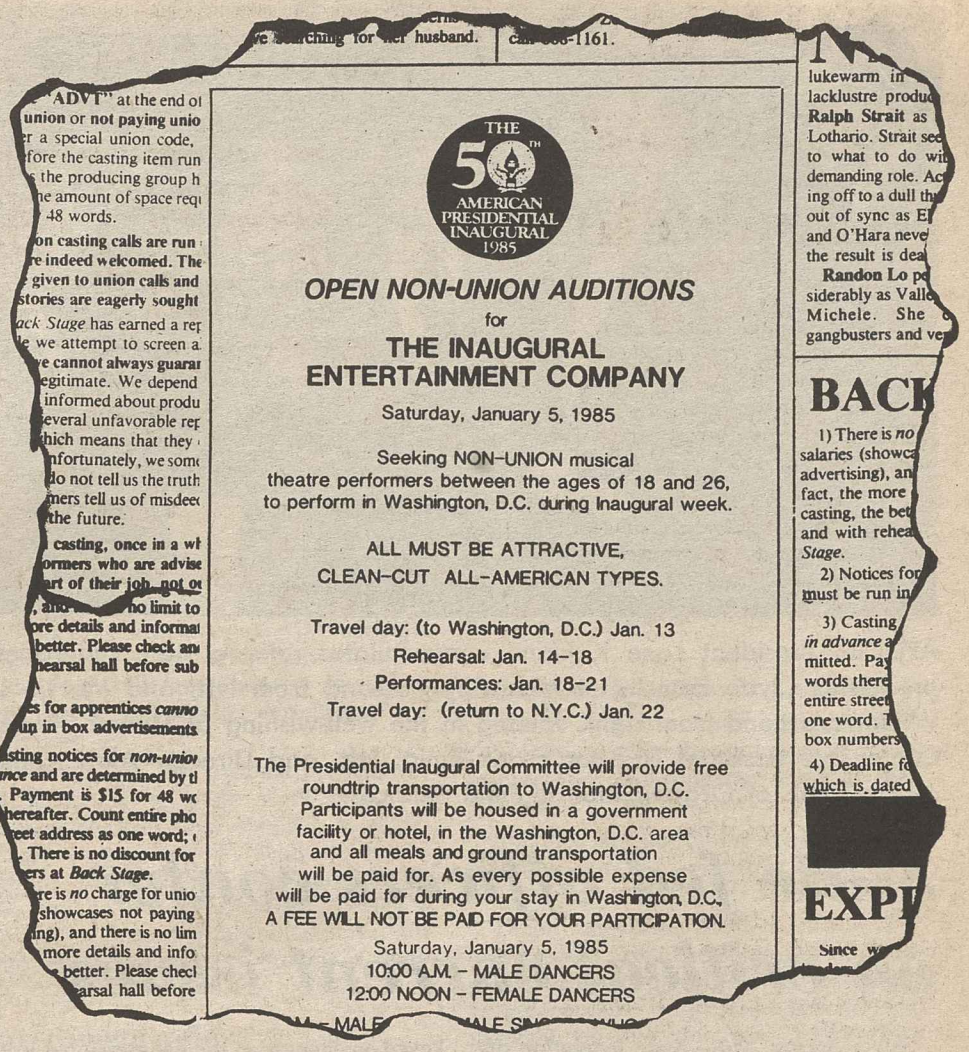
The decision noted that New Jersey is one of the most densely populated states with a high concentration of chemical manufacturing and processing firms and that some 50,000 different chemicals are in use in industry. For those reasons, the state is appealing the decision in hopes of winning reinstatement of the state law to cover the manufacturing firms.

A suit was filed a year ago in the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia by the Steelworkers and three states challenging the federal hazard communication standard, but oral arguments have yet to be scheduled.

George Orlando chosen to head of distillery union



New York — George J. Orlando has been named president of the Distillery Workers by the union's executive board to fill the unexpired term of George J. Oneto, who retired.

Orlando, 40, has been secretary-treasurer of the union since 1974, and had previously served for five years as a vice president.

Oneto, 74, was one of the founding members of the 45-year-old union and over that span served as a vice president and secretary-treasurer before being elected president in 1974.

The executive board also named Vera Catalli secretary-treasurer. Catalli, 43, has been a vice president of the union since 1980.

Orlando and Catalli fill terms of office that will expire in May 1988.

Inaugural audition call seeks non-union 'all-American' cast

AFTRA filed a discrimination charge based on the wording of the advertisement with the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The union also called on the Labor Dept. wage-hour division "to take all steps necessary to assure that federal minimum wage standards are adhered to by the Presidential Inaugural Committee."

Inaugural Committee Chairman Ronald Walker, a White House staffer, sought to mend fences with a conference phone call to officials of Equity, AFTRA and the Screen Actors. But he stopped short of taking any remedial action, the unions reported.

The committee's explanation is that the advertisement in Back Stage, a trade paper, was placed by its entertainment consultant, Bob Janie, and hadn't been cleared in advance with the Inaugural Committee. They were really looking for some 200 amateur performers from high schools and colleges, Walker claimed. Union professionals were being used for the principal entertainment events such as the Kennedy Center galas and the formal ballroom dances, he stressed.

The committee raised $12 million for inaugural expenses but said that wasn't enough to pay "volunteer" entertainers.

Representatives of the performing arts unions scoffed at the claim that the auditions were intended for school-age youngsters, and were somehow comparable to the high school bands that come to Washington to march in the inaugural parade.

The age requirement specified in the audition call was 18 to 26. And, the unions noted, the advertisement appeared in a publication for theater professionals, not in some high school or college newspaper.

Previous administrations, they noted, had sought agreement from the unions affected for the waiver of rules or pay scales that would be applicable for commercial performances.

200 volunteers

The audition call advertisement promised housing in a government facility or in a hotel in the Washington area. Those who were chosen — the committee reportedly was seeking 200 "volunteer" performers— would have four days of rehearsal in Washington and four days of performances. The call was for male dancers, female dancers and "male and female singers who move well." Singers were instructed to "bring clothes to move in."

It explained that since transportation and meals would be covered, "a fee will not be paid for your participation."

A local paper quoted the casting director for the audition as explaining the "all-American" requirement as meaning that "we didn't want seasoned, slick performers." They were looking for people who would be "more honest and patriotic."

Ken Orsatti, executive secretary of the Screen Actors Guild, termed the advertisement "an insult to all professional performers."

AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff said the first union reaction was disbelief. "You can't discriminate against union members. You've got to pay the minimum wage," he said.

Equity Executive Sec. Alan Eisenberg said the union considers the inauguration of a President "a glorious event" and the attempt to bar union members "outrageous."

Court rebuffs anti-labor printers

An employer association that sends anti-union publications to employees of its member companies is subject to reporting and disclosure requirements of the Landrum-Griffin Act, the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled.

Its 3-0 decision rebuffed the Master Printers of America, a trade association of non-union printing firms, which has battled in the courts since 1978 to avoid complying with the law.

The appellate court panel upheld findings by the Labor Dept. and a federal district court that the trade association was engaged in "persuader" activities, acting as an agent of employers in trying to generate hostility toward unions among their workers.

Such activity is not illegal, but the Landrum-Griffin Act requires reports detailing the actions undertaken and the amount and source of funding. The Labor Dept. suit to compel the MPA to file such reports was initiated during the Carter Administration and has been shuttling back and forth between the district and appellate courts over the past six years.

After losing initially on the issue of coverage, the trade association raised constitutional issues which the district court and the appellate court rejected.

MPA sought unsuccessfully to portray the reporting requirements for persuader activity as unconstitutionally vague. It claimed that the effect of registration and disclosure would be to "chill" its exercise of First Amendment free speech rights. Forced disclosure of its membership and contribution lists would deter members from participating in its programs and discourage membership generally, MPA contended.

Clear intent

The appellate court rejected all of these contentions. The MPA is "unabashedly anti-union," it noted, and articles in a magazine distributed to employees by arrangement of their employer were clearly intended "to persuade employees about the merits of union organizing and collective bargaining."

It scoffed at the notion that disclosure of an employer's role in financing the distribution of anti-union material would result in threats, harassment or reprisals. Thus the circumstances were not at all comparable to those in a 1958 Supreme Court decision rejecting an attempt by the state of Alabama to compel disclosure of a list of NAACP members.

As for subjecting member firms to "harassment," presumably from union organizers, the decision by Judge Sam J. Ervin III noted that "knowledgeable persons in the industry already know which shops are unionized and which are not. . . . Thus it is difficult to take seriously MPA's fears that disclosure will force a decline in membership."

The appellate decision said any fringe restrictions the law might impose on First Amendment rights were subordinate to the "compelling" government interest in upholding the free choice of employees on union organization. It quoted from the legislative history of the Landrum-Griffin Act this section of a Senate committee report covering disclosure requirements imposed on management middlemen:

"All of the activities required to be reported by this section are not illegal nor are they unfair labor practices. However, since most of them are disruptive of harmonious labor relations and fall into a gray area, the committee believes that if an employer or a consultant indulges in them, they should be reported."

State fed officers confer on critical current issues

Silver Spring, Md.—State federation officers, attending a three-day conference at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, received updates from AFL-CIO department directors on a broad range of topics from international affairs to postal regulations.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in addressing the participants focused on the recent state legislative elections, the effects of Reagan's "new federalism," health cost containment, and political action.

Kirkland praised the efforts of the state central bodies in the November elections, noting that members of AFL-CIO unions voted for the Mondale-Ferraro ticket "in the landslide range of 61 percent."

Some state legislative elections have resulted in a revival "of the whole right-wing shopping list of anti-worker legislation," Kirkland noted. He pledged that "providing more information and assistance" to the state bodies in a timely fashion is a major goal of the federation. And he noted that objective is more urgent now as Reagan's "new federalism" shifts the burden of social programs to the states.

Detailing the impact of health care costs on the nation and on bargaining efforts, Kirkland told the 52 state body officers from 40 states that the AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its meeting next month, will establish an ad hoc committee to coordinate labor's health care activities and aid cost control efforts at the state level.

Strategy

"Of necessity, that program will entail fighting health care cost increases on the three fronts of collective bargaining, legislation and coalition building with business and consumer groups willing to join us in tackling the problem," Kirkland said.

Donahue outlined the recent activities of the federation involving South Africa and Poland among other topics. His speech was highlighted with the introduction of five South African trade union leaders who were part of a delegation visiting the federation over the past week.

AFL-CIO Vice President Wayne E. Glenn, president of the Paperworkers and head of the Executive Council subcommittee on affiliation, cited a variety of measures relating to local union affiliation with central bodies that are being discussed by the subcommittee.

Education Director Dorothy Shields explained how her department can assist the state federations in setting up labor education advisory committees. Among other services available, she noted, are assistance in working with university labor programs, workshops on education at state federation conventions, publications and films.

The right-wing attempts to tax fringe benefits and force a constitutional convention were among the items covered by Legislative Director Ray Denison. He also keyed on changes in the congressional leadership and committee assignments and prospects for immigration reform and health care cost containment legislation.

COPE Director John Perkins, aided by staffers David Jessup and Dick Wilson, reviewed the Presidential election results, detailed the findings of a pair of polls on how union members voted, and discussed the outlook for the 1986 state and congressional races.

Welfare issues

Bert Seidman, director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, joined staff members Margaret Seminario and Jim Ellenberger in covering workers' compensation, unemployment insurance and safety and health concerns.

Seminario spoke on the status of right-to-know legislation, including the recent decision on the New Jersey law. Ellenberger discussed the attempts being made to get workers to pay into unemployment benefits funds, and the moves in some states to stiffen the qualifications for receiving workers' compensation benefits.

International Affairs Director Irving Brown detailed the AFL-CIO's involvement in various trade union organizations on the international level, addressed the effects of international trade on national employment, and expressed the federation's concerns over the status of workers' rights in countries such as South Africa, Poland, Chile, El Salvador and Nicaragua.

Postal service changes were explained by Edwin Schmidt, director of the Dept. of Reproduction & Mailing, including ways of holding down costs for mass mailings and the growing use of electronic communications.

Larry Kirkman, head of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, described the services available from the federation's broadcasting arm. The audience viewed a sampling of the programs and public service announcements produced by LIPA.

Conference maps support

Black unions held key to ending apartheid

Africa and Gen.-Sec. Philip Dlamini of the South African Black Municipality & Allied Workers, who were jailed last fall for their role in a massive "stayaway," or general strike, of workers that brought South Africa's industrial heartland to a near-standstill.

The conference was sponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund and the AFL-CIO's African-American Labor Center and attracted prominent U.S. civil rights leaders, including Bayard Rustin, organizer of the historic 1963 March on Washington, who is now president of the Randolph Educational Fund.

Kirkland said that AFL-CIO assistance to South Africa's black workers has been guided by the same principle that governed the federation's assistance to the workers of Poland, El Salvador and other countries—"namely, that we will respond to the expressed needs and wishes of our brothers and sisters who are under the gun."

ILO probe sought

Kirkland and others at the conference renewed the call voiced by South Africa's Camay at the December meeting in Brussels of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions executive board for an investigation of the "appalling conditions" of black labor in South Africa, including the forced removal of black workers to the Bantustans, or "homelands."

Toward this end, the ILO should consider setting up a commission of inquiry similar to the commissions it established in looking into worker repression in Poland, Chile, and other countries, Camay said.

ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken was authorized by the confederation's board last month to call an emergency meeting of affiliated unions to seek the release of black trade unionists still detained by the Pretoria government and to press South Africa for compliance with international labor standards. He said preliminary discussions on such a meeting have been held with major affiliates, and the meeting will be held no later than April.

"In the meantime," Vanderveken said, "it is vital for maximum assistance—in all its forms—to be given to the independent black trade union movement inside South Africa."

He cited the ICFTU's 1984 action program of assistance to the South African blacks, declaring "the growth and strengthening of the independent black trade union movement is the single most effective means for the repressed majority to gain freedom and justice and to abolish apartheid without undue violence and bloodshed."

"In other words, to quote Bishop Tutu (South Africa's 1984 Nobel Peace Prize winner), 'this is our last chance to avoid a bloodbath.' "

Camay, an ICFTU board member, thanked the U.S. labor movement for its support of South Africa's blacks over the years, particularly for its protest outside the South African embassy in Washington last month.

After sketching the background of the Nov. 5-6 stayaway of South African blacks, the largest demonstration of its kind in the nation's history, Camay said U.S. workers could play an important role in helping him and his colleagues attain their goal of freedom and justice.

Ultimate goal

"South African workers are not looking for an amelioration of apartheid, but for its destruction," he said, adding that he felt this could best be achieved through coordinated international action.

Jonas Ledwaba, president of the Commercial Catering & Allied Workers, the largest nonaffiliated black trade union in South Africa, traced the historical development of the black labor movement in the country as far back as 1959.

By 1972, the white South African government had come to perceive the black trade union movement as "a force to reckon with," he said. He described last November's general strike as the most historic event in the movement's history.

Its purpose, he said, was "to indicate to the South African authorities that the labor movement and the political movement in South Africa are inseparable."

"This is just the beginning of more things to come," Ledwaba declared. "Our movement has grown by leaps and bounds and can be counted on to make changes in the political and economic climate of the country."

Backs strategy

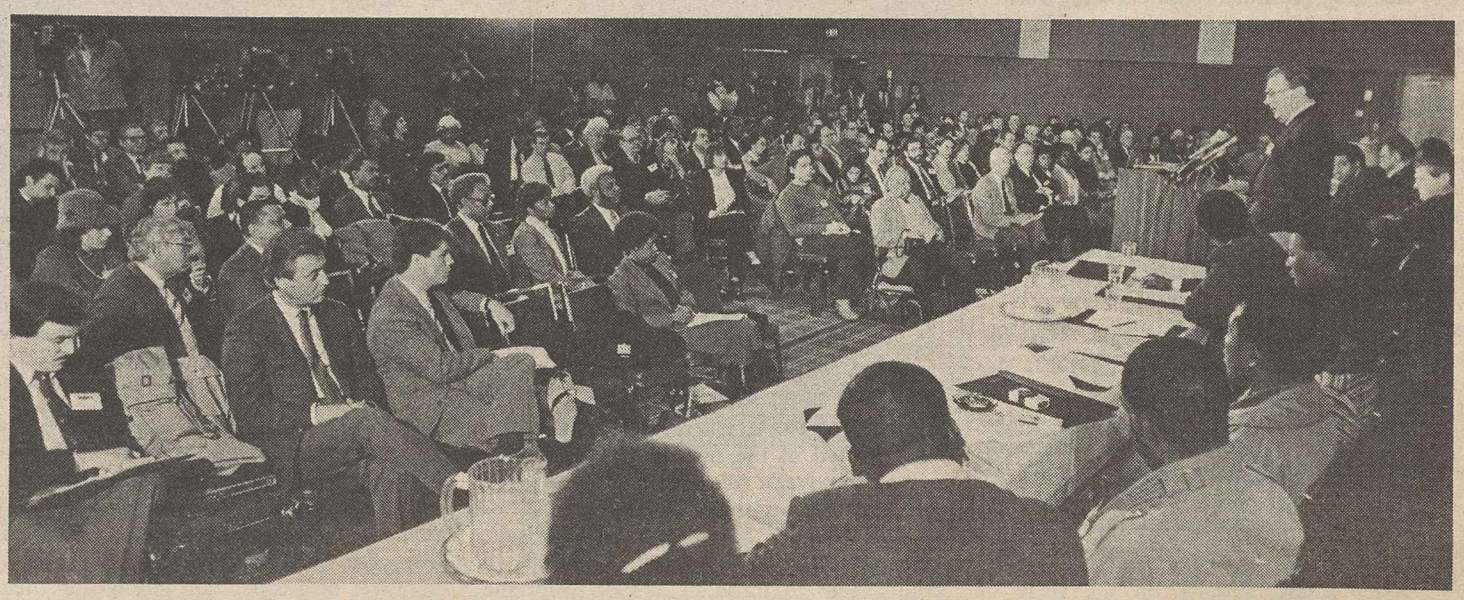
Another member of the South African delegation, President Longway Kwelemthini of the Council of Unions of South Africa, endorsed the international strategy outlined by the ICFTU and the AFL-CIO and welcomed the assistance of the world's free trade unions.



"The fight against apartheid is a universal fight," he said. "The solution must be a universal solution."

Director Irving Brown of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs focused on the urgent need to abolish South Africa's preventive detention laws, which the government used to jail 21 black trade unionists without charges following the Nov. 5-6 strike.

"The detention laws are an instrument by which a government can decapitate the leadership of a new, rising trade union movement," he said.

"That is why we feel one of the essential tasks of the labor movements of the free world is to develop a tactic that leads to the eventual abolition of those laws."

Other speakers at the opening session included Executive Director Norman Hill of the Randolph Educational Fund, AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, and Rustin.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledges continued U.S. labor support for black South African trade unions.

Tenacious desire for rights fuels black unions

By Susan Dunlop and Candice Johnson

In a country whose name is a synonym for vicious racist repression, South Africa's black trade unions are managing to grow, fueled by a tenacious desire for human rights that is giving them the strength to stand up to intimidation and harassment that is both official and private, open and covert.

Members of the delegation of black South African union leaders attending a conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO and the A. Philip Randolph Institute described conditions in the nation where the government's official policy of apartheid, or racial separation, reserves power and priviliges for a white minority.

Longway Kwelemthini is president of the Food Beverage Workers and had been acting president of the Council of Unions of South Africa. Like many elected officials of the unions, Kwelemthini combines his duties for the union with a full-itme job as a housing officer for a grain mill.

He has been active in the union for 10 years, and he has worked toward growth of the labor movement in South Africa for over 20 years.

Unions grow

"They have tried to prevent unions from growing, but the unions are growing just the same," Kwelemthini asserted.

Chele Ernest Lethole is a vice president of the union, which has about 16,000 members in nearly every facet of food production, including bakeries, breweries, beverage bottling, dairies and grain mills. Lethole also works full-time in a mill, and has been vice president of the national organization since 1980.

Although labor laws passed by the South African government in 1979 eased some restrictions made it a little easier for black workers to organize unions, management—abetted by the security police—still uses intimidaiton to thwart organization and weaken existing unions, Kwelemthini and Lethole pointed out.

When it is known that the union is organizing in a facility or a particular region, the security police may suddenly visit workers in their homes, or managers on the job may read off a list of names of people who have joined the union and drop a strong hint to the effect, "tomorrow there will be no union members here," they said.

In a shop where there is an especially effective shop steward, the employer may offer the worker a slightly different job, such as one with increased responsibilities, and then claim that the employee is now a supervisor and no longer able to represent the union.

Pressure on jobs

Hamilton Makedama, general secretary of the 6,000-member Hotel, Liquor & Catering Trade Employees, pointed out that management may also strongly suggest to a union official that he or she is spending too much time on union business and must make a choice between one job or another.

Makedama, who works at the Carlton Hotel in Johannesburg, described how the white government's use of black South African "homelands" is also used to control workers.

As a native of the homeland or "Bantustan" of Transkei, he was obligated to sign a 12-month labor "contract" with an employer in order to get a pass to travel to Johannesburg to work and live.

Because there are no jobs in the homeland, workers are anxious to migrate to the cities to work under the contracts. The desire to hold on to a precious job becomes a factor when an employee is deciding whether to join a union.

The contracts must be renewed annually, and an employer does not have to give any reason for not renewing an agreement.

To be authorized to live in Johannesburg permanently, Makedama had to "qualify" under a law that requires him to work for the same employer at least 10 years or consecutive employers at least 15 years. Had he lost his job, he would have been forced to return to his homeland within 72 hours. Family members not working under labor contracts are not allowed to join workers in Johannesburg until they are "qualified."

Similar restrictions apply to black workers who want to buy a home or property.

None of these restrictions of movement, employment or property rights applies to whites.

Conditions are only slightly easier for workers who are born in Johannesburg, including Jonas Ledwaba. He is president of the 35,000-member Commercial Catering & Allied Workers which represents workers in the wholesale food industry as well as some hotels and smaller restaurants and tea rooms.

Ledwaba, the first national president of the union, is a credit clerk with the largest wholesale food supplier in South Africa. As a native of Johannesburg, he was able to move more freely around the city, and he was not required to sign a contract or remain with one employer for many years in order to become a "citizen" of the city.

Government role

Ledwaba and Makedama explained that unions and employers in South Afirca, despite the power held by management, do enter into legal contracts and negotiations, and if talks reach an impasse, they can seek conciliation with the help of the government.

The desire for stable labor relations by employers is usually the motive behind employers' recognition of unions, and more enlightened employers have even spoken out against some of the government's harsh, anti-union policies when they have interferred with that stability, they explained.

Workers may also strike, although they are supposed to petition to government to do so, and the use of scabs and strike-breakers—as well as firing of strikers—is common. Because conditions make legal strikes difficult, workers do resort to wildcat walkouts in some instances.

The conciliation process, Makedama said, is intended to head off a breakdown in relations between the parties that have to petition the government's Dept. of Manpower to appoint a conciliation board. But if the minister chooses, he can refuse to appoint a board and declare that management was right in the dispute. Although the department has never made such a declaration in a union's favor, appointment of a board is an indication that the government thinks the union view should be heard.

Facing difficulties

Clearly, black unions in South Africa face extreme difficulties in organizing, bargaining and protecting the rights of their members.

But they are not letting the size or the multitude of the problems overwhelm them or stop them.

Union leaders in South Africa believe that support from the international labor community is important to their continued progress because it focuses an international spotlight on the treatment of working people in their country.

"People should be aware that we exist and that people in South Africa are suffering," Kwelemthini asserted.

Lethole noted that American unions can offer not only moral support but other practical help, like information on safety and health protection, steward training, collective bargaining strategies and grievance handling.

Above all, the union leaders agreed that American unionists must understand the unique position of unions in South African society and their determination to make free trade unionism a reality.

Reagan renews nominations of Rowland, Collyer, Meese

an ethical controversy over how he was helped out of financial difficulties by persons subsequently appointed to federal positions put the nomination on hold. A special prosecutor last spring found no grounds for a criminal prosecution of Meese, but he declined to comment on the "ethics and the propriety of his conduct."

Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the nomination are expected soon after Congress returns for the inaugural. Meanwhile, Smith is continuing as head of the Justice Dept.

The Cabinet shuffle at the start of Reagan's second term is turning out to be bigger than anticipated.

Education Sec. T. H. Bell, a moderate in the Reagan Cabinet, was the first to resign. His successor, just announced, will be William Bennett, who has headed the National Endowment for the Humanities. Bennett's selection was warmly praised by Teachers President Albert Shanker, who said the AFT has long had a good relationship with the new secretary.

Another Cabinet change is the result of a headline-making swap in which Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan will become Chief of Staff at the White House. James A. Baker III, who now holds that key job, will be nominated to replace Regan as Treasury Secretary. Baker's top aide, Richard Darman, will go with him as Deputy Secretary of the Treasury.

As the White House explained the unusual swap, Treasury Sec. Regan originated the idea and sounded out Baker. Reagan wasn't even consulted until the exchange had been worked out and presented to him for approval.

A close Reagan associate, William P. Clark, resigned as Secretary of the Interior and is leaving government. Energy Sec. Donald Hodel will move over to replace him. The new Secretary of Energy will be John Herrington, now the White House personnel director.

Still to be named is a successor to Jeane Kirkpatrick in the Cabinet-level office of U.S. representaitve to the United Nations.

Donovan's absence

The Labor Dept. continues to be administered by Under Sec. Ford B. Ford. Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan has been on leave of absence since Oct. 1 pending the outcome of the criminal court case involving the construction firm with which he was associated before his appointment to the Cabinet.

Just below the Cabinet level, the Senate will also be acting on the confirmation of Lee M. Thomas to head the Environmental Protection Agency as successor to William D. Ruckelshaus.

Housing Trust boosts construction fund loans

The AFL-CIO Housing Investment Trust has more than doubled its loans for long-term, union-built construction projects since its merger last October with the older Mortgage Investment Trust.

John Evans, HIT's chief executive officer and financial manager, said the trust has already loaned about $95 million, mostly for single-family home building.

Evans said the new trust now has about $107 million in assets. To qualify for loans, all construction on a job must be carried out by union labor and the funds government-backed.

HIT was established nearly two years ago as a separate and distinct entity to serve as a vehicle for the investment of union funds and qualified pension funds, primarily in single-family housing and nursing homes throughout the country. The MIT lent the bulk of its funds for multi-family construction projects.

Relief fund launched

The AFL-CIO has established an African Drought Relief Fund to channel American union aid directly to unions in famine-stricken regions of Africa to help them care for their members and their families.

Federation President Lane Kirkland said the fund had been set up to coordinate contributions from "concerned AFL-CIO affiliates and local unions who have generously set aside funds from their treasuries to aid the victims" of the drought and famine.

The fund will be administered by the federation's African-American Labor Center.

Kirkland pointed out in a letter to affiliates that the "union-to-union" effort is not in conflict with other international relief and humanitarian agencies providing assistance to the more than 150 million Africans afflicted by the worsening drought in Ethiopia, Chad, Mozambique, Mali, Sudan and Mauritania.

The fund is similar to previous efforts by the AFL-CIO to channel help to victims of other catastrophes.

Donations should be sent to the AFL-CIO African Drought Relief Fund, African-American Labor Center, 1400 K Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

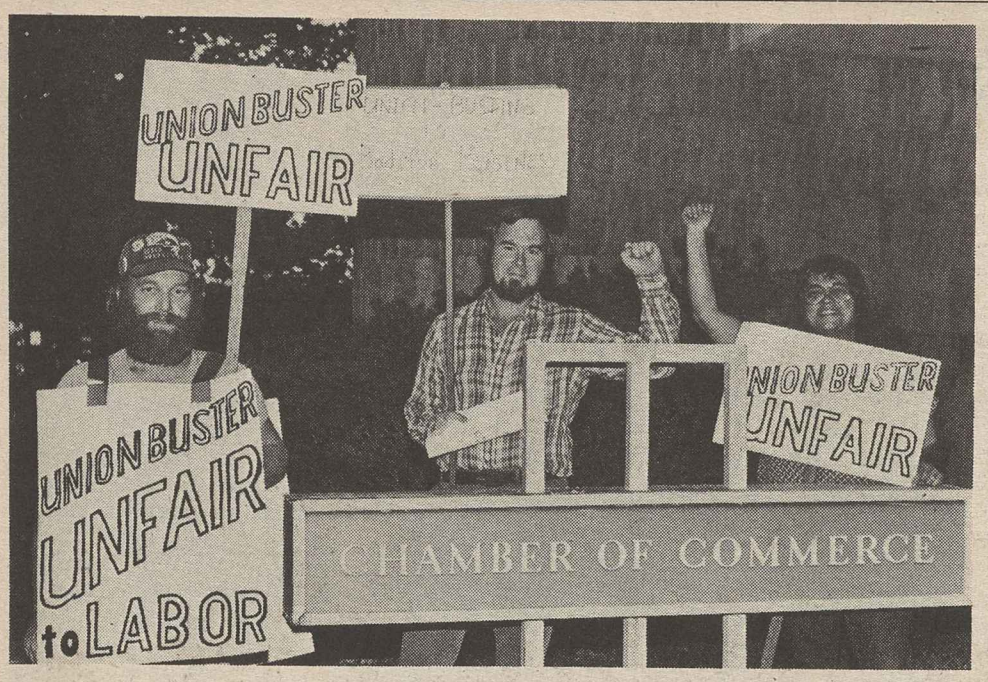
Teachers press Congress to preserve education aid

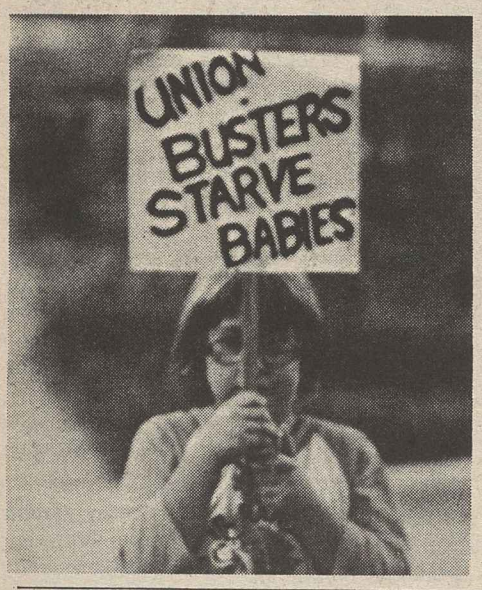
Tax and budget proposals that will be considered by Congress this year could be hazardous to public education, the Teachers warned.

An AFT "action agenda" for 1985 urges that federal funding of special education programs for needy children, vocational education assistance and Head Start for pre-schoolers be exempt from any budget freeze.

Current levels of federal aid are already inadequate and "a freeze would be a giant step backwards," AFT President Albert Shanker said.



At a news conference, Shanker also warned that a Treasury Dept. proposal to end the federal income tax deduction for state and local taxes would weaken school systems across the country. He said it would squeeze the principal sources of school funds "at a time when states and localities are making a sincere effort to upgrade public education."



The AFT also announced a television ad campaign, using five 30-second public service spots, with free brochures available to provide more detailed information.

Subjects to be covered are titled Asbestos in the Schools, Home Learning Activities, Teacher Shortage, Healthcare Costs and Traffic Safety.

Its alert on asbestos hazards notes that an Environmental Protection Agency study estimates that 31,000 school buildings contain cancer-causing asbestos.

The union, with 610,000 members, also has adopted as a goal increasing the number of AFT locals that maintain "Dial-a-Teacher Homework Hot Lines" to assist youngsters having trouble with their school assignments. About 50 AFT locals now operate such programs.

Sizemore offer participants a lesson in how workers feel about union-busting outsiders and their tactics. # Appeals court ruling refines arbitration role of judiciary

Chicago—Courts have the right to decide whether issues in labor disputes are arbitrable, but they should refrain from doing so if that will embroil them in determining the merits of the cases, a federal appeals court held.

The decision by the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals fine-tunes the role of the judiciary in arbitration. It upheld a lower court order requiring arbitration of a dispute between Western Electric Co. and Communications Workers Local 5090 over whether a layoff grievance was itself arbitrable under the contract.

The issue revolved around Western Electric's decision in 1981 to lay off 79 workers at its Chicago facility. Subsequently, the company brought in 80 workers from other states, and the CWA local claimed the layoffs were improper because there was no lack of work to justify them.

The union filed a grievance but Western Electric claimed that a "management functions" clause in the agreement gave it the right to lay off, and it refused to arbitrate the issue. The U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois found for Local 5090 and ruled that the issue of arbitrability was itself arbitrable. The company appealed, contending that the court itself should have decided the question of arbitrability.

In the opinion for the 7th Circuit Court, Judge Harlington Wood agreed with the lower court and held that while there is ample precedent for a court to decide arbitrability, it is correct in referring that question to an arbitrator if the court's action would "entangle" it in determining the merits of the grievance itself.

Judge Wood said the courts should be suspicious of attempts to pull them into deciding the merits of labor disputes through the "back door" of interpreting an arbitration clause. He added that using the services of an arbitrator to decide arbitrability issues is proper in such contractual disputes.

As a general rule, Judge Wood said, the courts should require arbitration of the arbitrability issue in situations where the contract contains a standard arbitration clause, where the parties have not clearly excluded the arbitrability issue from arbitration, and where deciding the issue would "entangle the court in interpretation of substantive portions of the collective bargaining agreement and thereby involve consideration of the merits of the dispute."

New Kansas City Star pact caps lengthy ITU campaign

Kansas City—A five-year stand-off between Typographical Union Local 80 and the Kansas City Star ended with the ratification of a six-year contract providing pay increases totaling $200 a week over the term of the agreement.

The signing of the contract also ended the union's two-year "corporate campaign" that underscored the union-busting tactics of the Star's owner, Capital Cities Communications.

As a part of that campaign, a Fair Contract Committee was formed to focus national attention on the plight of the 140 ITU printers and mailers working at the newspaper. Included on that committee were AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Screen Actors Guild President Ed Asner and former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall.

The contract dispute began in August 1979 when Capital Cities, a New York conglomerate, refused to extend the lifetime job security provision which was in the ITU contract.

The ITU members continued to work without a contract and without any wage increases from 1979 to ratification of this agreement. Both the mailers and the printers received immediate raises of $120 a week, $17 a week in the second through fifth years and $12 in the final year.

Job security is provided through 1990 for all those who were working at the Star when the last contract ended.

The company will provide written notice "as soon as possible" on any plans to introduce new technology and agreed to provide training to the ITU members on that equipment.

The ITU campaign against the Star included a subscription boycott, handbilling of advertisers, informational picketing, and the introduction of resolutions at the company's stockholder meeting.

Clemson scored for spurring textile exodus

Columbia, S.C. — Organized labor in South Carolina has registered a strong protest over Clemson University's plans to hold a conference in Barbados on offshore textile manufacturing, charging the move could further hurt the state's textile and apparel industry.

"Considering the current economic status of the textile industry in South Carolina, the members of the South Carolina AFL-CIO have problems with a state-supported university advocating the advantages of the textile industry leaving the state and taking our jobs to the Caribbean area," State AFL-CIO President Randall Kiser declared in a letter to Clemson President William Atchley.

"This is not a union or nonunion issue. This is a job issue," Kiser stressed.

The three-day Clemson conference is scheduled Jan. 29. Top executives of the state's textile and apparel industry have been invited, at a cost of about $700 each, to learn about the labor supply, plant sites, investment regulations, and wage and utility rates in the Caribbean basin.

With his letter to Atchley, Kiser enclosed a list of South Carolina textile plants that have closed in the past three years. During most of that time, the state was suffering from double-digit unemployment.

Copies of the letter were sent to the governor, lieutenant governor, the state's congressional delegation in Washington, and the chairmen of the House and Senate education committees in the state general assembly.

The labor protest, with special help from the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers, has already generated considerable media attention. "I don't think they planned on all this pressure," Kiser said.

Eighteen South Carolina textile and apparel plants closed in 1982, with the loss of 5,300 jobs. In 1983, the loss was 17 plants and 2,644 jobs and last year 17 plants closed with more than 5,000 workers put out of jobs.

While the state's economy has become more diversified, the textile and apparel industry still ranks as South Carolina's major employer.

"Cotton is still king in South Carolina," Kiser said. "When the textile industry coughs, the economy catches a cold.

"These plant closings hurt not only those who work there, but the whole state since the tax base shrinks. Schools and public services are cut back, and everyone suffers."

The Hope for Change

APARTHEID IS so morally repugnant, so universally despised and so cruel in the economic exploitation it promotes that no language seems excessive in denouncing it.

Yet despite the outpouring of words, resolutions and dire warnings, the system has changed very little over the years.

If neither fiery rhetoric nor toothless diplomacy have so far brought results, where lies the hope for nonviolent change? What are the prospects for tearing down racial barriers, for establishing majority rule, for guaranteeing human rights for all?

The trade union movement approaches these issues from a certain perspective, the product of our own experience both here at home and around the world.

We do not look to governments, self-inspired, to reform themselves. We look instead to the organization of democratic institutions, independent of the state and defending the interests and aspirations of ordinary people against hostile state power and entrenched privilege.

The more authentic, effective and broadly based such institutions become, the greater the prospects that social change can be accomplished without violent upheaval.

This is the concept on which the trade union movement is based.

IN THE PARLANCE of human rights, this concept is known as freedom of association. It enjoys nearly universal lip-service, although its strategic importance to democratic development is far from universally or fully understood.

But it is well understood by the American labor movement, and that is why we have been so encouraged by the emergence in recent years of the black trade union movement in South Africa. It is to that movement, and to the brave men and women who lead it—some of whom we are proud to have among us at this conference—that we look for peaceful social change in their country.

In seeking to help them, we have been guided by the same principle that has governed our assistance to the workers of Poland, El Salvador and every other country where our help has been requested.

Those who trample workers rights march under different banners. Fascists smash workers' organizations in the name of fighting communism. Communists smash workers' organizations in the name of building the workers' state.

We don't care what banner they march under. Our job is to see that they don't kick workers around.

Building Jobs

A WELCOME development of recent years has been the decision by the principal Japanese auto makers to set up production facilities in the United States.

Does anyone seriously believe, however, that Toyota, Nissan and Honda are acting out of a good-hearted desire to help put unemployed Americans to work?

The new facilities, and the jobs that accompany them, clearly stem from negotiated "restraints" on Japanese auto exports to the United States and the evidence of strong congressional support for a domestic content requirement.

From the consumer standpoint, the competition of built-in-America foreign cars is all to the good. And the General Motors decision to make a multi-billion dollar investment in a high-tech small car production competitive with the Japanese subcompacts represents the way the free enterprise system is supposed to work.

Despite the encouraging signs, it is much too soon to proclaim victory in the battle to keep a healthy, job-producing and competitive auto industry in the United States. The Japanese commitment to U.S. production is still at little more than token levels.

A start has been made, and the process should be accelerated. The way to sell more cars in the United States is to build them here. That goes for Honda and Chrysler alike.

Millions remain hungry in Reagan's 'recovery'

By Press Associates, Inc.

"The need for emergency food aid seems a bottomless pit. Increased resources in late fall of '83 and winter of '84 let us feed a greater number of people, but we could detect no decrease in the need. How can you estimate how much of a hole you have filled, when you cannot find the bottom?"

This expression of frustration from a volunteer with an emergency food pantry in Kensington, Calif., is one of many received by the Food Research & Action Center during its survey on hunger in America.

FRAC surveyed nearly 300 private emergency feeding programs in 36 states to "reconcile two seemingly contradictory sets of realities."

On the one hand, inflation is down and "economic recovery" is being heralded by the Reagan Administration. On the other hand, the number of Americans living at or below the poverty line is at an all-time high of 35.3 million persons, with another 12 million near the poverty level. Yet, only 46 percent of eligible households are aided by the federal food stamp program, whose funding was not substantially increased last year.

Only fiction

In "Bitter Harvest: A Status Report on the Need for Emergency Food Assistance in America," FRAC reports that for "many persons in cities and rural areas of this country, the economic recovery is a fiction, not a reality."

Between 1983 and 1984, the average number of households served by the feeding program surveyed increased 20.4 percent. In 1983, 151,262 households were served each month, compared to 182,128 households in 1984.

Comments from people working in the feeding programs reflect anguish at too few resources to meet the demand for food:

- From Elsa Young of the Mount Saint Helping Hand program in Snoqualmie, Wash.: "We don't have all the vegetables and protein that we need, but we have been able to help senior citizens and single people. Where we fall short is in helping families of 6 or 8 where there are small children and growing youth."

- From Sister Carole Tybicke of the Franciscan Center in Baltimore: "Our 15 years of existence and our extensive statistics prove that the plight of the poor, hungry and homeless is ever on the rise, despite reports of the 'economic recovery' we are supposedly experiencing."

Social Darwinism

- From Father Donald Knapp of Grace Episcopal Church in Allentown, Pa.: "We can't meet the real need these people have for jobs and income increases. The elderly poor just can't make it. There is a despair about food aid help. We can't agree with the social Darwinism of this Administration."

- From Jo Call, executive director of the Rutherford County Emergency Food Bank in Murfreesboro, Tenn. "We assisted 865 families during 1980 and 5,734 in 1983. Someone surely is not better off than four years ago."

- From Betty Stouffer of the Heights Emergency Food Center in Cleveland: ". . . We are well aware that a 3-4 day supply of food doesn't fully meet the needs of our clients. In the last year, a large number of our clients (up to 60 percent) have run out of unemployment and are now on welfare. They are unable to find work and are very discouraged."

During the election campaign, stories highlighting the economic recovery served the Reagan Administration well by drawing attention away from the poor and millions of unemployed.

Now that the election is over, the FRAC survey underlines the nation's responsibility to remember those who have been left out.

Auto Workers at Grand Tubes celebrate victory in a long-fought battle.

UAW's victory in rural Alabama a case study in value of unionism

Haleyville, Ala. — Workers at an auto parts plant here are celebrating their victory over a corporate Goliath that tried to cheat them out of wages and benefits.

The victory had its price, though. Because of delays by the Reagan-appointed majority on the National Labor Relations Board, it took nearly three years to bring the company to justice.

The battle took place here in rural Alabama where Formed Tubes, a manufacturer of exhaust pipes, tail pipes and headers, had been lured by tax breaks and special financial incentives.

In the early 1960s, Formed Tubes' parent company, Armada Corp., in Detroit decided to shift much of its production from its flagship plant in Sturgis, Mich., to Alabama. One of the main reasons was to escape its UAW contracts.

The move swelled the town's workforce to more than 400, as Formed Tubes became Haleyville's biggest employer.

The company successfully resisted several attempts to organize the plant. But in the early 1970s, workers began to notice some disquieting changes. New management at Armada, headquartered some 600 miles away in Detroit, suddenly took away the annual bonuses that had been the practice. And favoritism emerged as layoffs were instituted.

In 1977, the Haleyville workers voted 171-80 for UAW representation. A first contract, negotiated the following year, resulted in a $1.75 hourly pay hike, 14 paid holidays and better insurance.

Contract extension

Within two years, the company began to complain that it was in financial difficulties. The union agreed to a year's contract extension in which there would be no raises or benefit improvements. But it ruled out further concessions.

In September 1981, management started making threats and told the union that if no new contract were reached, it would simply cut wages to $3.35 an hour with no benefits. UAW International Rep. Don Cromer spoke for the workers—members of Local 2045—when he said, "After we'd worked all year without raises, the union had no choice but to turn it down." The workers did just that, voting 109-1 to strike if the company did not improve its offer.

But management had something else up its sleeve—the old trick of creating an "alter ego" by pretending to close down and go out of business only to reopen under a new name at the same place with the same management.

Workers at Formed Tubes had their suspicions aroused when a mail room employee found a printed letterhead with the name Grand Tubes on it. A day before the union struck, Formed Tubes declared bankruptcy and Grand Tubes took over. While management kept its jobs, Formed Tubes workers were out in the cold.

The "new" company advertised for new employees at lower wages. The company refused to recognize the UAW and formed an "employees association" to "bargain" a new agreement.

The UAW members renewed their strike commitment, set up picket lines, and dug in for a long fight.

Lawson Raper, then president of Local 2045, recalled that townspeople at first were skeptical.

Strike benefits

"Everybody thought we were just plain looney," he said. "They 'knew' we were going to lose. But we kept up our our spirits by meeting once a week, and we got regular strike benefits from the international union in Detroit. Now, of course, folks tell us they're glad we won."

During the long winter of 1981-82 while the picketing went on in Haleyville, the union filed unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB, accusing the company of creating an "alter ego," failing to bargain in good faith, refusing to reinstate workers or to pay contracted health insurance premiums, and other violations of the federal labor law.

Nearly 18 months later, after a series of management delaying tactics, an NLRB administrative law judge ruled that the company had indeed violated the law.

"There is no doubt that Formed Tubes was nothing but a puppet on the Armada string," the ALJ said. "Armada's control over the labor relations (of Formed Tubes and Grand Tubes) was and is as complete as its managerial control over their financial, sales, and production activities."

The NLRB judge also ordered the company to reinstate the strikers, make them whole for lost income, reinstate payment of health insurance premiums, and guarantee the pension plan. The UAW was to be recognized, and negotiations resumed.

But Armada, leaning on the loopholes in the law, was able to stall another year by filing an appeal with the NLRB.

If workers had not stood together as strongly as they did, the case might still be before the board. But the company, which had been caught red-handed (minutes of corporate meetings exposed the bankruptcy scheme), realized it might lose its case, even before a Reagan board. Early last summer, it contacted the union about negotiating a settlement.

"They saw that we were determined, that we weren't just going to walk away, and that they'd better do something," Cromer said. The company finally reached terms with the union, agreeing to reinstate the strikers, remove scabs, extend the Formed Tubes contract two years, grant workers a 12-percent wage boost over that period, and make up other losses.

UAW Regional Director George Smith stressed that the victory once again showed the importance of a union to workers.

"Here is a group of workers in a small parts plant who, because of their union affiliation, had the power of over a million members throughout the country behind them," Smith said.

"The union supplied weekly strike benefits, paid health insurance premiums, and pursued the case vigorously before the NLRB.

"In exchange for their monthly dues of two hours' pay, the workers got back support and representation and direct benefits worth that many times over."

Reagan ducks on pledge to guard benefits

President Reagan sent a clear signal that he would not object if Congress eliminates next year's cost-of-living adjustment in social security benefits in order to hold down the federal deficit. But he acknowledged at a news conference that social security payments to retired and disabled workers are not a cause of the federal deficit.

In fact, as Reagan noted, the social security system is currently running at a surplus with the payroll tax on workers and employers bringing in revenue that exceeds the amount paid out in benefits.

The surplus stays in the social security trust fund. Reagan observed that "if social security spending were reduced, you could not take that money saved and use it to fund some other program."

The President hedged, however, when asked about his election campaign promise not to tamper with social security benefits, including the cost-of-living adjustment.

"Well, I never specifically mentioned that," Reagan began his answer. He said if "an overwhelming bipartisan majority of Congress" wanted to freeze social security payments, "I would have to look at that situation."

Taxes, defense

Reagan was adamant, however, that taxes should not be raised and the defense budget should not be frozen at present levels.

The Administration's apparent inability to come up with a politically feasible and realistic script for reduction of the budget deficit during the President's second term has led Senate Republicans to take the initiative in shaping their own budget plan. The goal, Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.) has said, is to have it in shape before Reagan sends his budget to Congress in early February.

Such a tactic would normally be a device of a party in opposition, since it would appear to be a repudiation of the President and his Administration. But at least some White House officials have welcomed the approach, seeing it as a way of getting Reagan off the hook on his campaign statements.

Post-recession jobless rate throws doubt on recovery

The nation's jobless rate, at 7.2 percent in December, "is a matter of continuing concern," the AFL-CIO stressed, as 15 million Americans remained either unemployed or underemployed.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported 8.2 million workers were without any kind of job last month, 1.3 million others were too discouraged to seek work, and another 5.6 million were unable to find more than part-time employment.

"Unemployment is still at worse than recession levels for black Americans, whose unemployment rate is 15 percent," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald observed.

"Following the 1975 recession, a concerned America was able to lower the unemployment rate to 5.6 percent. Unfortunately, there is no outlook for lower unemployment in 1985 since such concern is lacking."

Last month's jobless rate, up a tenth of a percent from November, would have been 13 percent if part-time and so-called discouraged workers were counted, the Full Employment Action Council pointed out. The council, which represents labor, the elderly and other groups, also charged that the recovery has bypassed young people and hard-hit communities.

Since World War II, the nation has gone through several recessions, including 1954, 1961 and 1971, when the unemployment rate never got as high as 7.2 percent—which today is defined as recovery.

Following the 1975 recession, the Carter Administration took steps to drive down unemployment to 5.6 percent by 1979 through public service employment.

While the jobless rate is now down from 8.2 percent in December 1983, "unemployment remains a particularly serious problem for blacks and Hispanics," Oswald said. Also, there are still regions of the country where joblessness remains higher than the national average.

Among the largest states, Michigan still has double-digit unemployment, at 10.5 percent, and severe problems exist in Ohio, where the rate is 9.1 percent, and in Illinois, where it is 8.9 percent.

Oswald said the outlook for 1985 is for little change or improvement in current unemployment levels.

The government's report showed the volatile teenage jobless rate went up to 18.8 percent from 17.8 percent in November. Other major work force categories showed little or no change.

BLS, which reports on discouraged workers quarterly, said their number increased 92,000 during the last three months of 1984 to 1,303,000. The number had been edging downward over the past two years from a recession high of 1.8 million in the fourth quarter of 1982.

Among industries, employment gains were posted last month in the auto industry, 25,000 jobs, and construction, 55,000 jobs. December employment gains were also posted in food processing, apparel, fabricated metals, and stone, clay and glass products.

13.8 million children living in poverty

Figures compiled by the Congressional Budget Office show that more than 22 percent of all children 17 or younger lived in poverty in 1983.

CBO's preliminary study on poverty based on census data, found that 25 percent of all pre-school-age children and 21 percent of all children ages 6 to 17 lived in households with family incomes below the government's official poverty line of $10,178 for a family of four. The number of poor children was 13.8 million, or two-fifths of all the nation's poor.

That makes children the largest poverty group in the country, compared to poverty rates of 12.4 percent for adults 65 or younger, and 14.1 percent for the elderly for the same year.

While noting that poverty rates were higher among minority children and those in families headed by women, the CBO analysis pointed out that the increase in child poverty cannot be blamed solely on the rise in the number of households supported only by women. A big share of the blame should be laid to "the severe back-to-back recessions of 1980 and 1981-82, the rapid inflation of 1979-1980 and reductions in income-maintenance programs," the analysis said.

Apartheid protest

Handcuffed Auto Workers President Owen Bieber is led to a police van after being arrested along with 16 other protesters in continuing demonstrations at the South African embassy in Washington. Addressing a crowd of several hundred, Bieber reaffirmed labor's stance against apartheid and recalled the words of Martin Luther King, Jr., that "injustice anywhere is injustice everywhere." The Jan. 15 protest marked the birthday of King.

Labor pledges fight to block tampering with social security

By David L. Perlman

Labor will strongly oppose any effort by Congress or the Reagan Administration to tamper with cost-of-living adjustments to social security benefits, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

Senate Republicans are currently shaping a package of spending cuts to hold down the federal budget deficit—and a one-year freeze on social security payments is expected to be high on the list. President Reagan has already signaled his willingness to forget a campaign pledge to leave the social security COLA intact if Congress should "insist" on a freeze.

The argument that a deferment of the cost-of-living provision is needed to deal with the deficit just won't wash, Kirkland said.

Social security is a self-sustaining program financed by payroll taxes on workers and employers. It currently takes in more than it pays out in benefits, Kirkland noted. Without the social security income surplus, the federal budget deficit would be even greater.

Social security did not cause the deficit and won't make it worse, Kirkland stressed. "It should not be tampered with to meet problems it didn't cause."

Retired and disabled workers lost a half-year's COLA as part of the compromise Congress enacted in 1983 to shore up the system's future financing. Kirkland, who was a member of the bipartisan commission that drew up the compromise, charged that it would be a clear breach of faith on the part of Congress if social security recipients were further penalized.

A continuing cost

The sacrifice they made then through postponement of the effective date of the annual cost-of-living increase from July to January of each year "continues to cost them some benefits" and will do so on into the future, Kirkland pointed out. Social security's COLA merely preserves the purchasing power of "very modest benefits," averaging below $450 a month for single beneficiaries and $776 for couples.

Congress should honor the 1983 compact, Kirkland urged.

"The causes of the deficit—the massive tax cut and the Administration's unwillingness to face the costs of the military budget—should be addressed in seeking to tame the deficit," he insisted.

A one-year delay in the COLA would push an additional million older Americans below the poverty line, the National Council of Senior Citizens charged.

The council's executive director, William R. Hutton, termed it "mind-boggling that the President or Congress would even consider such a harsh and unfair plan." If necessary, he said, senior citizens will "take to the streets in protest."

In Congress, there were no signs that President Reagan will be confronted with the demand from "an overwhelming bipartisan majority" that he said might persuade him to go along with a social security freeze.

Helping hand

House Majority Leader Jim Wright (Tex.) said in a television interview that Democrats will "help" President Reagan keep his campaign promise by opposing a COLA freeze.

Earlier, House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel (Ill.) appeared to throw cold water on Senate proposals for a social security freeze—at least without a stronger signal from Reagan. Michel said congressional Republicans "have to honor" the President's statement that a freeze on social security would be off-limits.

Court upholds labor role on local hospital boards

Elkins, W.Va.—A West Virginia law requiring public and non-profit hospitals to include representatives of organized labor on their boards of directors has been upheld by a federal court here.

The U.S. District Court for Northern West Virginia ruled that the law adopted by the state legislature as a hospital cost-containment measure is constitutional and that its provisions requiring labor representation are not pre-empted by federal labor law.

The measure requires that as of July 1, 1985, at least 40 percent of each board of directors of non-profit and local government hospitals in the state must consist of "consumer representatives" drawn from small business, organized labor, the elderly, and persons who earn less than the national median income. It also calls for "special consideration" to be given women, minorities and handicapped persons for the board appointments.

The district court rejected the contention of the American Hospital Association that the law restricted the hospital's rights. The opinion by Judge William M. Kidd stressed that the participation of citizens on the boards of tax-supported hospitals has a "rational relationship" to the goal of controlling health care costs in the state.

The court also turned aside the association's argument that the presence of labor representatives on the boards would amount to a conflict of interest under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Judge Kidd pointed out that the state legislature passed the law with the specific goal of curbing health care costs in West Virginia by giving consumers more say in hospital decision-making.

Such citizen participation makes sense when the hospitals get tax breaks or subsidies out of the public purse, the court held.

Direct connection

"Local government hospitals receive their appropriations from political subdivisions of the state. Non-profit hospitals receive a favorable tax status which is clearly a benefit," and there is a direct connection between hospital operations and board policy decisions that affect the quality and cost of services, the court pointed out.

The presence of consumer representatives on the boards is intended to allow the citizen "a greater input into the overall operation of hospitals and ultimately to result in closer scrutiny of financial op-

Power shift adds to OMB control over regulations

President Reagan's decision to give the Office of Management & Budget broad, new powers over regulations contemplated by federal agencies opens the way to further interference in the regulatory process that could hurt workers, the AFL-CIO warned.

"Under the existing Executive Order, OMB has abused its responsibilities and interfered enough in the process, seeking to substitute its political judgment for the technical and scientific judgments of agencies such as the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Environmental Protection Agency," the federation's job safety director, Margaret Seminario, said.

"Until now, it has had authority only to review proposed and final rules," she said. "Now, under this new proposal, it appears that it will be involved in all aspects of the regulatory process."

Inaugural recruits find unions pay

A youthful troupe of singers and dancers recruited to perform without pay at President Reagan's inaugural learned a profitable lesson on the value of a union contract.

At the insistence of the performing arts unions, each of them will be paid at least $375 for taking part in the entertainment at the presidential balls on the night of the inauguration.

The union representative who negotiated the payment—John Hall, assistant executive secretary of the Variety Artists (AGVA)—broke the news to some 90 performers who were rehearsing at an army installation near Washington.

Like it or not, he told them, they were going to get paychecks in addition to expense money. The amount, which took into account rehearsal time, was set at three times the AGVA minimum for a club engagement.

They gave him a standing ovation.

Audition call

Most of the performers had answered a New York audition call that sought non-union singers and dancers — "clean-cut, all-American types," the advertisement in a theatrical trade paper specified.

The Presidential Inaugural Committee said it was embarrassed by the advertisement's insistence on non-union performers —a category that would have excluded President Reagan. And whatever the "all-American" requirement meant, the committee insisted that it wasn't intended to discourage any minorities from auditioning. Besides, the $12 million it raised for inauguration expenses wasn't enough to pay "volunteers."

The performing unions, backed by the AFL-CIO, didn't see it that way at all. They called on President Reagan to overrule his inaugural committee and let it be known that they were prepared to escalate their protests if necessary.

ICFTU a global champion of workers' rights

Brussels—Thirty-five years ago, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions was created as a counterforce to the communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions that had formed four years earlier.

At its inaugural congress in London, 53 countries from the free world were represented. Today, the Brussels-based ICFTU—to which the AFL-CIO belongs—represents some 83 million workers in 138 labor organizations in 95 countries.

The confederation's executive board will meet in Washington Apr. 11-12. It last met in the United States in 1955.

Marking the organization's 35th anniversary at last month's executive board meeting, ICFTU Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken observed that representation in terms of both workers and geographical area is continually expanding.

Describing the wide range of the ICFTU's activities, Vanderveken stressed its chief goals of promoting the interests of working people through the world and fighting for social justice.

ICFTU Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken confers with Lane Kirkland.

Country affiliates

The ICFTU is a confederation of national trade union centers, each of which groups together the trade unions of a particular country. Britain, for instance, is represented by the British Trades Union Congress; the United States by the AFL-CIO; West Germany by the DGB; Canada by the Canadian Labor Congress, and Norway by the LO.

In some countries, more than one center may be affiliated, as in the case of Sweden, India, Italy and Finland. In special cases, individual trade unions are accepted as members.

Membership is open to bona fide trade unions that are independent of any outside dominating influence, derive their authority only from their members, have a freely and democratically elected leadership, and voluntarily accept the aims and constitution of the ICFTU.

Among its other goals, the ICFTU works for rising living standards, peace, full employment, and social security for workers. It also seeks to promote international understanding, disarmament, and an end to oppression and dictatorship anywhere. Also, it opposes discrimination of any kind and helps workers everywhere to organize themselves and bargain collectively with their employers.

The ICFTU gives expression to workers' international solidarity, organizes and directs campaigns on issues such as respect of trade union and workers' rights, and fights against racial segregation.

It has devoted much of its efforts recently to supporting and defending the Solidarity union movement in Poland, human and trade union rights in military dictatorships such as Chile, and the efforts of black unions to overcome apartheid in South Africa.

The ICFTU has close relations with the International Labor Organization in Geneva, and makes effective use of the specialized United Nations agency to focus attention and criticism on any violations of workers' rights by governments.

The list of countries that the ICFTU has denounced in recent years within the ILO and in other international bodies includes Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, the Soviet Union, South Africa, Guatemala, Turkey and Poland, to name a few.

The ICFTU congress, the organization's highest authority, is held every four years and all affiliated organizations are represented within it. The congress elects an executive board made up of 37 members from various regions of the world and a general secretary.

The executive board, whose members include AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, meets at least twice a year and directs the organization's activities between congresses. Besides the Brussels headquarters, the ICFTU has permanent offices in Geneva and New York and special representatives based in other parts of the world.

To carry out its aims, particularly that of giving active assistance to developing trade unions in the Third World, the ICFTU works through regional organizations, which enjoy a wide measure of automony.

These include the Asian & Pacific Regional Organization (APRO), headquartered in New Delhi; the African Regional Organization (AFRO), which works out of Monrovia, Liberia, and the Inter-American Organization of Workers (ORIT), headquartered in Mexico City.

European section

There is also the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC), founded in 1973 by 13 ICFTU affiliates, whose constitution embraces the ICFTU's principles.

Developing nations receive a great deal of attention from the ICFTU as it works to close the gap between rich and poor and improve the position of all workers. Convinced that the best chance of achieving this goal is by setting up and strengthening labor unions in these countries, the ICFTU cooperates with trade unions and organizations of rural workers to help them determine for themselves the best way of handling their problems.

Modest gains mark 1984 state legislature sessions

There were more gains than setbacks to labor's agenda in state legislative sessions last year, but only a few states broke significant new ground.

Among the pluses were a commitment by Hawaii to the concept of comparable worth in state jobs and a willingness by Maine to set a state minimum wage that is higher than federal law requires.

Continuing a trend, a number of states enacted or improved "right-to-know" laws requiring employers to inform workers of chemical hazards they may encounter. Some of the laws require periodic worker training in the handling of toxic substances.

Seventeen states followed the lead of Congress in establishing the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., as a national holiday.

Here are highlights of state legislative actions reported in the Bureau of National Affairs publication, Daily Labor Report. A later survey will cover changes in unemployment insurance and worker compensation laws.

Alaska—The "monetary terms" of any collective bargaining agreement between a state agency and a union representing its employees must be approved by the legislature.

Arizona—The state law requiring payment of prevailing wages on public works contracts was repealed through a ballot initiative.

California—When a party to a collective bargaining agreement goes to court to compel arbitration, the state court must award attorney fees to the party that prevails unless the other side has raised "substantial and credible" issues of law or fact.

California's Division of Occupational Safety & Health was required to investigate any accident causing death or serious injury or illness to an employee. The previous law dealt only with accidents involving five or more workers. Employers were prohibited from retaliating against workers reporting noncompliance with federal or state laws or regulations.

Colorado—Employers were barred from firing a worker because his or her wages have been garnisheed. Public works contracts involving the state Dept. of Highways or the chief engineer were removed from coverage of the prevailing wage law.

Connecticut—Firefighters employed by a private non-profit corporation under contract with a municipality, such as a volunteer firefighter organization, were removed from coverage of a state law requiring overtime pay after 40 hours a week. The agency investigating complaints of discrimination may now compel written answers under oath to interrogatories relating to a complaint. Minors under 18 can work at supermarkets until midnight if there is no school the next day, but cannot be compelled to work later than 10 p.m.

Delaware—Employers must provide annual training for workers handling hazardous chemicals. Discrimination on the basis of marital status was included in the category of prohibited employment practices.

Florida—Workers have the right to obtain from employers a material safety data sheet for any toxic chemicals present in the workplace.

Georgia—The state minimum wage was raised to $3.25 an hour.

Hawaii—A new temporary commission on comparable worth will evaluate state government job classification and pay systems, examine sex-based job and pay differentials in state and local government employment, and recommend a job evaluation system to implement the concept of comparable worth. The state law setting a 70-year maximum age for public employment was repealed.

Illinois—An employer of five or more workers not related to him must allow an employee to inspect any personnel documents used to determine qualifications for promotion or disciplinary action. An employer who stops making payments to a health insurance plan must notify workers facing loss of coverage.

Iowa—A hazardous chemicals right-to-know law was enacted. Public-sector whistle-blowers were protected from retaliation. Employers were required to grant an unpaid leave of absence to a worker elected to any public office.

Kentucky—Employers were prohibited from deducting breakage, shortages, losses due to customers' bad checks or unpaid bills from a worker's paycheck.

Maine—The state minimum wage will be raised to $3.45 an hour on Jan. 1, 1986, and to $3.65 a year later. A hazardous chemical right-to-know law was enacted.

Maryland—A right-to-know law was enacted.

Masachusetts—A new law encourages but does not require employers to notify workers 90 days prior to closing a plant and to continue paying health insurance premiums for an additional 90 days.

Nebraska—The state's ban on sex discrimination was broadened to cover discrimination based on pregnancy or related medical conditions.

New York—Age can no longer be a bar to an apprenticeship program. A pregnant employee cannot be compelled to take a leave of absence unless she is unable to perform her job because of her pregnancy. An employer can't fire a worker who reports a violation of law or regulation.

Pennsylvania—A hazardous substance right-to-know law was enacted.

Rhode Island—Public sector whistleblowers were protected from retaliation.

Washington—A right-to-know law was approved. Employers are barred from firing or disciplining workers whose wages are garnished.

A. F. Grospiron dies at 68, president of OCAW 14 years

Thermopolis, Wyo. — Alvin F. Grospiron, retired president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and a former vice president of the AFL-CIO, died here on Jan. 10. He was 68.

Grospiron headed OCAW from 1965 to 1979. Earlier, he served for three years as secretary-treasurer of the union,

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a message to Grospiron's wife Etta Mae that his "four decades of devoted service to America's working people enriched a great many lives, not only among OCAW members, but far beyond their ranks. His contributions to the work of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, especially his leadership of its committee on occupational safety and health in the years leading up to passage of the OSHA Act, will never be forgotten."

A. F. Grospiron

Grospiron's union career began when he was a refinery worker in Texas City, Tex. By 1942 he had helped organize employees at Amoco Chemicals Corp. and American Oil Co. For 20 years Grospiron served in various offices of Local 4-449, including 11 years as secretary-treasurer.

After becoming OCAW president, he established a national oil bargaining program under which more than 400 contracts between the union and the oil industry were negotiated simultaneously.

Grospiron served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council from 1969 to 1979, on the Industrial Union Dept.'s executive council, the executive committee of the United Way of America, on the board of directors of the United Nations Association of the U.S.A., and on an advisory committee to the Federal Power Commission.

Funeral services were held Jan. 14 in Lakewood, Colo., with burial at Crown Hill Cemetery. Survivors include his wife and two children.

Labor conference builds support in fight to end South African apartheid

By James M. Shevis

The free world movement to help black South Africans in their struggle for basic human rights with a government still practicing racial segregation gathered momentum in the wake of a landmark Washington conference on the problems of oppressed black workers.

American labor and civil rights leaders participating in the three-day meeting pledged not to give in, give out, nor give up until victory was achieved.

The conference, attended also by leaders and members of eight black South African unions, served primarily as a forum for the exchange of ideas and views on bringing an end to the apartheid policy of South Africa's government, and was eminently successful in producing an outpouring of opinions.

As the windup speaker, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donhaue told the visiting black unionists that they could judge for themselves the interests, motives and desires of American unionists, better understand their allies in the United States, and get a "better sense of the kinship we feel."

National focus

"We have learned from you, and we have been able to add to the effort to focus this movement's and this nation's attention on the inhumanity called apartheid," Donahue said.

While the conference examined the social, economic and political problems facing South Africa's black unions, another major accomplishment was to acquaint leaders of these unions with their American counterparts and establish direct links.

At a press conference and afterward near the South African embassy, several recently released black trade union leaders arrested during anti-apartheid demonstrations in South Africa praised the AFL-CIO and the American people for helping their cause.

"We want the American people to know we appreciate what you're doing," said Gen.-Sec. Phiroshaw Camay of the Council of Unions of South Africa. He attributed his release and that of other union leaders from solitary confinement to the apartheid protests by U.S. demonstrators.

"Americans are serious now," said John Gomomo, another recently released South African union leader.

"It shows you feel that as long as South Africans are not free, you are not free," said Gomomo, vice president of the National Auto & Allied Workers.

Basic concept

The concept of freedom of association and the interdependency of people around the world was emphasized repeatedly in panel discussions and workshops.

"As members of the only human race there is, as citizens of the only world in which humans live, we have — each of us — a responsibility toward every other human being and especially toward those who, like ourselves, work for a living and who want, like ourselves, a better world and a more rewarding life for all," Donahue said.

"That is why," he said, "as Lane Kirkland said the other day, we accept the responsibility to do what we can to see that workers are not kicked around—no matter how, no matter where, no matter by whom."

The Rev. Walter Fauntroy, the District of Columbia's delegate to Congress, earlier told a luncheon audience, "We won't be free here or anywhere in the world until we free South Africa."

The Reagan Administration's policy of "constructive engagement" in South Africa came in for sharp criticism by both black South African union leaders and U.S. unionists, who in its place urged severe action unless white South Africa adequately responds to the expectations of the black masses.

Proposed disinvestment

Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions reported that major ICFTU affiliates, particularly those in industrialized countries with strong economic ties to South Africa, have submitted concrete proposals for "selective disinvestment," possibly isolating a selected number of multinational companies whose investment in South Africa is seen to support the apartheid system.

"The input of the American trade union movement can be decisive to the success of our strategy," he said.

While selective disinvestment is regarded in some quarters as controversial, it is backed among some black trade unions in South Africa. CUSA's Camay said that his organization decided to pursue a policy of selective disinvestment after "a long and agonizing debate."

Targeting businesses

"We decided that those agencies and companies which were particularly propping up the apartheid regime, either through computer technology, through defense technology and other technology that assists South Africa . . . we decided to target those specific companies," Camay said.

Vanderveken said that the ICFTU is now updating its list of some 3,000 companies with financial interests in South Africa, and is focusing on firms that would make the best targets for an international coorinated union effort.

CORRECTION

A picture caption in the Jan. 12 issue of the AFL-CIO News incorrectly said that President Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO and President Marvin L. Williams of the Washington State AFL-CIO were "retiring." Neither Ramsay nor Williams has announced plans to retire. They were the longest-tenured officers attending a conference for state federations at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Frank Emig named to head Community Services Dept.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has appointed Frank W. Emig as director of the federation's Dept. of Community Services, filling the vacancy created by the death of Walter G. Davis last Dec. 18.

The appointment was one of three announced by Kirkland. He named Green P. Lewis to succeed Emig as an assistant director of the Dept. of Organization & Field Services and appointed Susan Dunlop as an assistant to the AFL-CIO president.

Lewis, assistant director of AFL-CIO Region V headquartered in Atlanta, has been coordinator of the Houston Organizing Project for the past year. Dunlop currently is an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News.

Emig, 58, joined the AFL-CIO staff in 1963 as coordinator of field services for the Dept. of Community Services. A native of New Orleans, he had been a member of the Electrical Workers since 1946 and held a number of offices in IBEW Local 130. He was community services chairman of the New Orleans AFL-CIO from 1956 to 1960 when he became Red Cross labor liaison representative for the Southwest.

Since 1970, Emig has been responsible for coordinating activities and communications between the national AFL-CIO and the state and local central bodies, providing direct assistance in efforts to prevent punitive state legislation. He is a member of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped and has helped coordinate its relations with the federation and its central bodies.

Emig holds a bachelor of arts degree in labor-management relations from Antioch University, which he earned through the degree program of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Former organizer

Lewis, 39, is a member of the Service Employees and served as an organizer for SEIU Local 579-3017 in Atlanta before joining the AFL-CIO staff in 1969. He became assistant regional director in March 1984, shortly after his appointment as coordinator of the Houston project.

Before he began his union career, Lewis taught at the junior high school level and coached football in Columbus, Ga. He holds a bachelor of arts degree from Fort Valley (Ga.) State College.

Dunlop, 37, has been an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News since 1980. Before that she was assistant to the secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., editing the department's publication, Labeletter, and directing advertising and publicity for the annual Union-Industries Show. Previously, she worked in advertising and public relations for several New York firms and a Washington-based trade association.

A member of the Newspaper Guild, she was secretary-treasurer of the International Labor Press Association, 1981-83. A native of New York City, she graduated from Wagner College, Staten Island, N.Y.

Economy's year-end signs mixed

By Susan Dunlop

The nation's economic outlook stayed on its uneasy seesaw as 1984 ended with some economic indicators that tilt toward modest economic growth offset by sagging consumer confidence and declining retail sales at Christmastime.

The Conference Board, a non-profit economic research firm, reported a dramatic plunge in its consumer confidence index, a measure of how well consumers expect the economy to do in the near future.

The index slumped from 96.8 points in November 1984 to 85.6 points in December, the lowest mark in more than a year. The figures are calculated against a 1969-70 base year set at 100.

The Conference Board pointed out that while a one-month indicator is not conclusive, the depth of the decline is "disconcerting," and the research firm said its experience has shown that drops of this size have often been the forerunners of economic trouble ahead.

The firm also surveyed consumers' plans for making major purchases in the next six months and found that that yardstick dropped to 95.9 percent last December compared to 102.7 percent of its base year in November.

The survey found that only 26.6 percent of the consumers were confident that their incomes would be higher over the next six months, compared to 30.9 percent who were optimistic in November.

A slump in auto sales and a disappointing Christmas sales season for retailers contributed to a downturn of one-tenth of a percent in retail sales in December, according to the Commerce Dept. The drop —the first in four months—came on the heels of a 2-percent increase in November.

Auto sales fell 2.3 percent, also down for the first time in four months, after a 2.1-percent gain in November.

Purchases of non-durable goods were up four-tenths of 1 percent in December, while sales of durable goods dropped nine-tenths of 1 percent. All figures are seasonally adjusted.

The Federal Reserve Board reported that factory output edged up six-tenths of 1 percent in December, after an increase of four-tenths of 1 percent in November, after decreases in October and September.

Industrial capacity

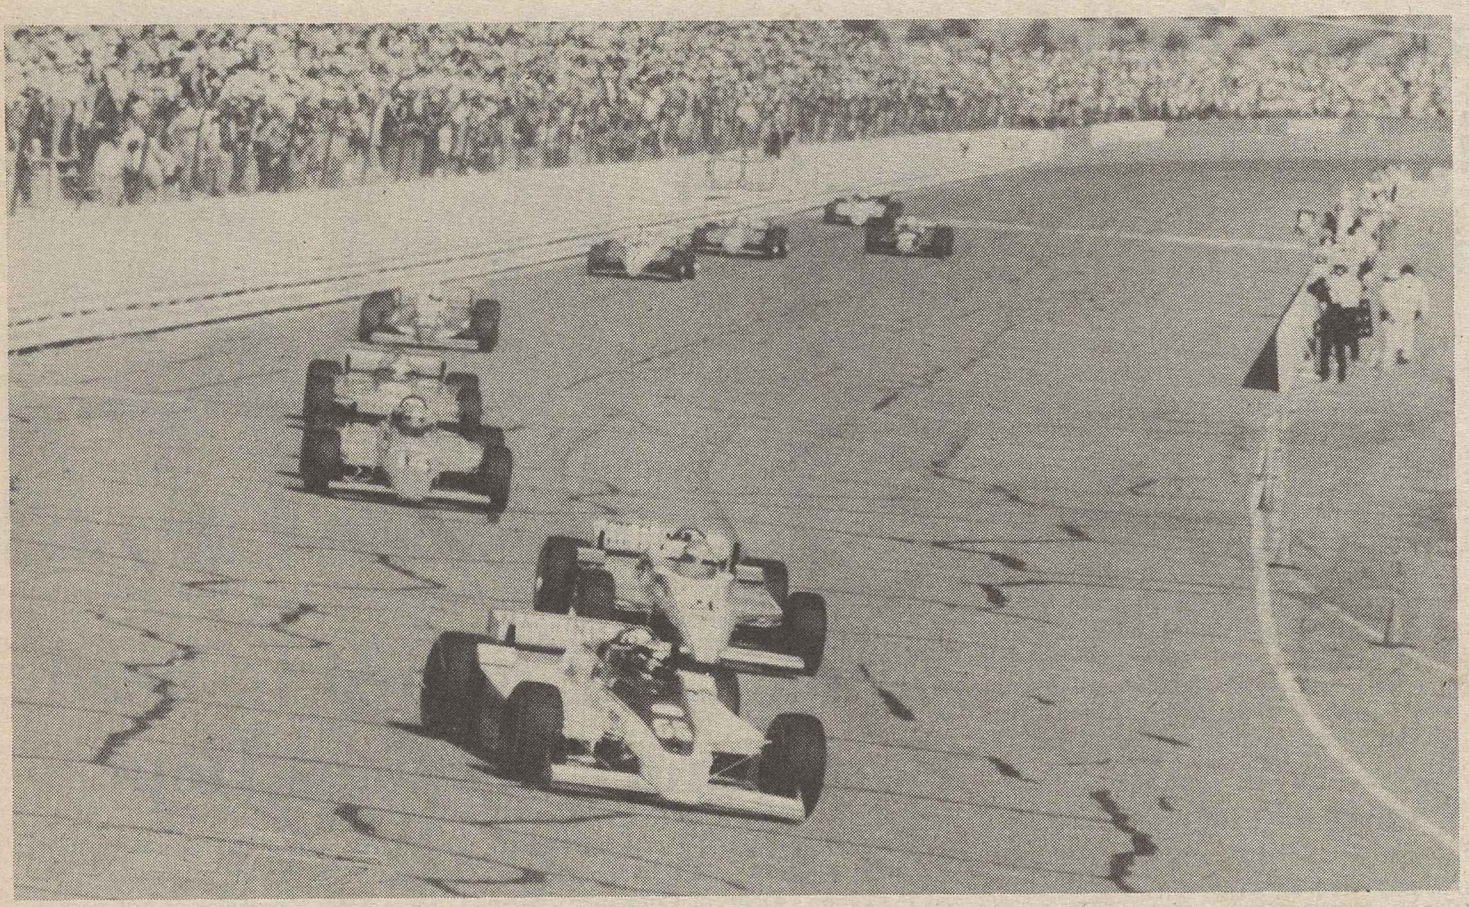
The Fed also reported that American industry was working at 81.9 percent of capacity in December, up slightly from November but still below the 82.7 percent peak for last year reached in July.

While the utilization rate was up for some industries, such as auto manufacturing—operating at 81.5 percent of capacity by the end of last month—it was down elsewhere, as in steel where the last reported utilization rate in November was only 64.9 percent.

Overall in the fourth quarter, operating rates were down in both non-durable and durable goods manufacturing from the third quarter.



In a separate development, Citibank, the nation's largest bank, lowered its prime lending rate to 10½ percent from 10¾ percent, and Chase Manhattan and Manufacturers Hanover Trust have followed suit. The move brings the prime rate to its lowest level since August 1983.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept.'s producer price index for December showed a significant leveling off in finished goods, intermediate goods and crude materials.

The index for finished goods edged up one-tenth of 1 percent last month following a five-tenths of 1 percent increase in November. Producer prices for intermediate goods dropped two-tenths of 1 percent, reversing the November rise of three-tenths of 1 percent, and prices for crude goods fell four-tenths of 1 percent in contrast to a 2-percent rise in November. The figures are seasonally adjusted.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said the figures indicate that the chance of a new surge of inflation in 1985 is unlikely.

Housing starts inched up 2.1 percent in December, the Commerce Dept. said, an increase that came on the heels of a modest 1.2 percent gain in November. The upward movement, which reverses a dip in starts in the second half of last year, was helped by declining mortage rates.

IAM's Indy car winning races, good will

The Machinists' high-powered, four-wheel public relations campaign is paying off—with public awareness and cash purses.

The "campaign" is Car No. 55, a sleek Indy-car racer, which is entering its sixth season of competition in the Championship Auto Racing Team circuit. Winnings in 1984 were the highest yet, with a total purse of $293,026 from 17 races.

The bigger dividend, however, was the nationwide media exposure, which included television, radio and newspaper interviews, articles and public appearances. The IAM said that coverage boosted the value of its race-car program by another $1.5 to $2 million.

Additional exposure included public appearances of the racing team's show cars in parades, car shows and shopping malls, accompanied by driver Josele Garza.

The IAM Racing Team finished 13th overall in CART's 1984 season, ahead of such racing greats as Gordon Johncock, Pancho Carter, Johnny Rutherford, A. J. Foyt and Kevin Cogan. No. 55 finished 10th in the Indianapolis 500 and fourth in the Molson Indy at Montreal, seventh at the Portland 200 and in the Provimi Veal 200 at Elkhart Lake, Wis., and eighth in the Stroh's 150 at Phoenix.

The IAM Racing Team schedule for 1985 is: Phoenix on Mar. 31, Long Beach, Calif., on Apr. 14, Indianapolis on May 26, Milwaukee on June 2, Portland on June 16, Meadowlands, N.J., on June 30, Cleveland on July 7, Brooklyn, Mich., on July 22, Elkhart Lake, Wis., on Aug. 4, Pocono, Pa., on Aug. 18, Lexington, Ohio, on Sept. 1, St. Pie, Que., on Sept. 8, Brooklyn, Mich., on Sept. 22, Laguna Seca, Calif., on Oct. 6 and Miami on Oct. 27.

3 airline unions ask court to bar Eastern pay cut

The Machinists, Pilots and Transport Workers filed separate suits against Eastern Airlines seeking court injunctions prohibiting the company from extending past the Jan. 1 expiration date the 18-22 percent pay cuts the company negotiated last year.

The IAM and TWU filed their suits in U.S. District Court in Miami, while the Pilots sought an injunction from the U.S. District Court in New York. The IAM's case will be heard in court on Jan. 21.

Eastern's board of directors voted on Jan. 4 to back company President Frank Borman's decision to extend the severe wage cuts while ending the stock investment program. Under the agreements, the company saved $370 million in 1984, while its employees received 25 percent of the company's common stock and representation on the board of directors.

Monthly cost

Borman said the concessions would remain in effect "until the negotiating process is exhausted." The pay cuts are costing Eastern's workers $22 million a month.

Charles Bryan, head of IAM District 100 at Eastern and a member of Eastern's board of directors, told other directors that extending the wage concessions would be in violation of the agreements with the unions. Bryan pointed out that for his members the 18 percent pay cut means a loss of $110 to $140 per week.

Bryan said the IAM has a letter of agreement with the company specifying that the pay cuts could not be continued beyond Jan. 1, and that the agreement exempts it from the status quo provisions of the Railway Labor Act. The company contends that the "status quo" of pay cuts must continue under the RLA.

The ALPA's suit charges that the company unilaterally reopened the contract by continuing with the pay cuts. ALPA's contract with Eastern will expire June 1.

ITU leader urges members to support merger accord

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Typographical Union President Robert S. McMichen has urged ITU members to support merger with the Graphic Communications Union to strengthen unity of printing trades workers and assure continuation of the ITU's democratic traditions.

McMichen's letter to all ITU chapels—the shops and printing establishments where the union's members work—outlined the chief features of the merger agreement. The ITU executive council was scheduled to vote on the pact at a Jan. 18 meeting and the GCIU board is to consider it the week of Feb. 4.

If approved, as the presidents of both unions anticipate, it will be submitted to the membership of each organization for ratification. The ITU has close to 45,000 active members in addition to retirees. The GCIU, itself the product of three printing trades mergers, has more than 200,000.

As outlined by McMichen, the agreement provides:

- The ITU will choose the executive vice president, financial secretary and three vice presidents of the merged union and elect seven rank-and-file members to the executive board.
- The per capita payment to the union will be $7.90 a month, substantially less than the present rate of 1.5 percent of earnings.
- The merged union's headquarters will be in the GCIU building in Washington, but the future of the Union Printers Home in Colorado Springs is assured and the home will remain in total ITU control.
- The ITU's mortuary fund will continue for retirees and working members alike.
- Retirees will retain membership and voting rights on matters affecting their economics. A bilingual Canadian office is guaranteed.
- The international union will continue affiliation with the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress.
- Local union mergers will be encouraged but not required.
- Strike benefits are $100 a week and can go higher for ITU members if they choose to raise the per capita.
- The ITU's general laws will be retained in the new union.

McMichen said the constitutions and bylaws of the two unions are almost identical and a merger would assure ITU members "full voice and participation in a strong, democratically run union of printing industry workers."

It would assure that printing industry concerns will "be addressed only by union members elected from within our trade, not appointed by outsiders," he stressed.

Kirkland raps scheme to tax fringe benefits

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland reiterated the federation's firm opposition to any scheme to tax the value of workers' fringe benefits.

Any revenue attained by taxing fringe benefits would be taken out of the pockets of America's workers, Kirkland warned in a statement. The Treasury Dept. recently proposed to tax workers on the value of such employer-financed benefits as health insurance, pensions and day care.

The likely result of taxing employer contributions for such plans would be a reduction of essential coverage by workers and their families, Kirkland said. Pensions are now taxed when they are received.

The Treasury Dept. estimates grossly exaggerate the potential revenue to be gained by taxing fringe benefits, Kirkland said. The department also wants to tax fully benefits of unemployed workers and those injured or disabled on their jobs.

Congress has turned down most past proposals for taxing fringe benefits but the new effort is being pushed as a tax simplification plan.

Kirkland stressed that the AFL-CIO supports measures to reduce the deficit and make the tax code more efficient and productive. "But merely to increase the taxes of working people and jeopardize benefits and protections that are essential to their welfare and that of their families would be unjust and unfair," he said.

Fulfilling needs

Fringe benefits now being considered for taxation fulfill major, demonstrable needs and social purposes, Kirkland said.

"Health insurance, pensions, day care, education programs, and prepaid legal plans have evolved over many years to meet specific national social goals and have been subjected to the checks and balances of the legislative process, as well as the collective bargaining process.

"These benefits are not frivolous 'perks' or gimmicks to shelter income, generate phony losses or otherwise reduce the taxes of a privileged few," he said. "Most are long-standing economic buttresses of the tax code and are widely distributed among America's working population."

Kirkland noted that workers' compensation benefits already are inadequate to meet the needs of disabled workers and their families. Taxation of these benefits would widen the gap between payment levels and income levels required to maintain decent living standards, he observed.

Unemployment insurance benefits provide essential income and, above certain thresholds, are already taxed, he added.

A parallel statement also voicing strong opposition to taxing fringe benefits was issued the same day by President Richard Lesher of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

OMB gains power to thwart proposed federal regulations

In an Executive Order issued earlier this month, Reagan authorized OMB to screen other agencies' regulatory proposals before they are formally drafted or announced publicly.

Under the new procedures, the heads of most agencies will be required early each year to submit for OMB review a list of the regulations they plan to propose in the coming year.

Reagan's order said the list must include an explanation of "how each new activity will carry out the regulatory policies of this Administration. . . . The overview should specifically discuss the significant regulatory actions of the agency to revise or rescind existing rules."

"No governmental agency should have that kind of authority to usurp the power given to Congress," said William Pollard, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights. "It amounts to OMB and the Executive Branch of the government nullifying the actions passed by Congress in a number of instances. OMB, by withholding funds, could cut out legislative programs that Congress intended to keep in force."

Bert Seidman, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said that workers depend on regulations for their health care, safety, pension protection and other rights and benefits. Because they have not been sufficiently protected in the past, regulations have been drawn up. Now, these may be jeopardized, he said.

All Cabinet agencies except the Defense Dept. would be subject to the new policy, as well as EPA, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, General Services Administration, Office of Personnel Management, and Veterans Administration.

The new order does not apply to independent regulatory commissions such as the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Communications Commission.

Worker rights strengthened

Court rulings bolster Ohio's job injury law

Columbus, Ohio — The Ohio AFL-CIO is applauding two state supreme court decisions that will enable more injured workers to collect benefits and strengthen their right to sue a negligent employer.

The state federation stressed that both decisions, handed down in late December, "will make it possible for generations of injured workers to receive workers' compensation benefits they would not be eligible for had not the court ruled the way it did."

In both landmark cases, the Ohio AFL-CIO was the prime mover.

In a decision that re-interprets the definition of a work-related injury, the state high court found that a worker may be entitled to benefits for a job-related injury that develops over a period of time rather than from a sudden accident.

The Ohio AFL-CIO pointed out that this ruling finally recognizes "the long-term wear and tear on a worker's body" as a compensable injury.

The court reversed what the State AFL-CIO termed 50 years of "anti-worker decisions handed down by conservative Republican courts" as it concluded that "the judicial distinction between gradual and abrupt causation is unjustified."

Key factor

Whether an injury is sudden or progressive is irrelevant, the court said, as long as its cause is related to the injured worker's job.

That position recognizes what the labor movement has contended is the clear intent of the Ohio workers' compensation law, the state federation asserted.

A series of state supreme court decisions handed down since the 1930s sharply limited eligibility for compensation. And, the state federation said, even after the legislature amended the law to make it clear that all injuries were to be compensable, "just as predictably" the courts continued to deny benefits for injuries that developed over a long term.

The State AFL-CIO warned that the new interpretation of workers' rights will still require taking a number of cases through the courts, but for the first time a high court decision has "correctly interpreted" the law itself and the intent of the legislature in passing it.

Wider latitude

The second decision upholds a worker's right to sue an employer over injuries that result from negligence by broadening the definition of intentional wrong-doing.

The court held that not only do workers have the right to sue employers in cases where there was a specific intent by the company to do harm, but also where it can be shown employers know that conditions on the job have a "substantial certainty" of causing injuries.

The decision defines the legal concept of an intentional tort — an intentional wrongful act that can be taken to court for action—as it applies to work-related injuries.

"Where an employer acts despite his knowledge that the risk is appreciable, his conduct is negligent," the court said. But the decision asserted that a "specific intent to injure" is not "an essential element" of intentional torts in instances where an employer "proceeds despite a perceived threat of harm to others which is substantially certain, not merely likely to occur. It is the element of substantial certainty which disinguishes a merely negligent act from intentionally tortious conduct."

The court also ruled that a worker injured as a result of an intentional tort may sue the employer for damages even while receiving workers' compensation benefits. In addition, an employer held liable for an injury through an intentional tort is not entitled to reduce the award by the amount of benefits the injured employee is receiving.

Employees of Beverly Enterprises Hamlet Inc. nursing home in Cleveland celebrate SEIU election victory, one of a string of union successes.

Unions scoring 70% victories in Beverly organizing surge

The Food & Commercial Workers and the Service Employees are on an organizing roll at the Beverly Enterprises nursing home chain as their joint efforts rang up a 70-percent victory rate in representation elections.

Since the campaign was officially kicked off in January 1983, elections have been held in 83 Beverly-owned facilities where the SEIU or UFCW have conducted organizing drives. Fifty-seven resulted in union victories.

The SEIU will be on the ballot in early February at two facilities in Michigan, and the UFCW is participating in active organizing programs in Pennsylvania that are expected to go to elections soon.

Both unions are also working with employee committees in other nursing homes and convalescent centers owned by Beverly in a number of other states. The company is the nation's largest nursing home chain, and it employs well over 50,000 people.

The UFCW and the SEIU targeted the nationwide chain for organizing beginning in 1982 with the assistance of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

When the campaign got underway, the SEIU already represented workers in 21 Beverly homes in four states, and the UFCW represented workers at 10 homes in five states.

Work-patient link

UFCW President William H. Wynn said as the joint drive opened that a key focus would be on the link between good working conditions and the quality of patient care.

"Quality care is sometimes difficult in the best of circumstances," Wynn said, "but in the worst of circumstances, when discouraged workers are understaffed, underequipped and underpaid, it is impossible."

And SEIU President John J. Sweeney pointed out that "deteriorating quality of care, a lengthening record of citations for deficiencies after inspections, harsh and unfair working conditions, and a record of spending on patient care that is far below the industry average while administrative expenses are far above average" all help prompt Beverly employees to turn to the unions as they sought to organize.

An initial part of the Beverly organizing effort was a "corporate campaign" to publicize the company's activities and financial dealings.

The campaign got a boost in March 1984, when—in the face of the union's highly successful organizing efforts—Beverly management agreed to a letter of understanding intended to improve relations and smooth the way for union representation and bargaining by Beverly employees. Under the terms, the unions called a halt to the corporate campaign, and the company agreed to recognize the right of employees to choose union representation, and to provide a "non-coercive atmosphere" during election campaigns.

California Fed contests 'labor' appointee

Sacramento, Calif. — The California AFL-CIO has won the right to sue a member of the state's occupational safety and health appeals board on the grounds that his qualifications do not meet the provisions of the law that require a representative of labor to sit on the board.

State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John Henning was granted the right to sue board member Alfred H. Song by Atty. Gen. John K. Van de Kamp. California law allows the attorney general to go to court—or grant other parties permission to do so—to prevent a "continued exercise of authority unlawfully asserted."

The state federation charges that Song, a former state legislator and former member of the state's Agricultural Labor Relations Board, does not meet the requirement that one seat on the state's three-member OSHA appeals panel must go to a representative "from the field of labor." Seats are also specifically assigned to a representative from management and to a public member.

In granting permission for the suit, the attorney general wrote that the legislation did not intend "that the occupant of that office simply have education, knowledge and experience in the field of labor law or labor relations. The legislature intended a closer connection to 'labor.' "

Song served in the California assembly and senate as a Democrat representing a Los Angeles district. He was later appointed by former Gov. Jerry Brown to the state's agricultural labor board. After resigning from the ALRB in June 1984, he was immediately named to the OSHA panel by Gov. George Deukmejian (R). The state senate has yet to confirm the appointment.

The State AFL-CIO went to court to block the move, but when the state supreme court finally ruled that it would not act, the federation appealed to the attorney general's office.

Song is not a member of any labor organization and has never been an employee representative or officer of any labor organization.

Henning stressed that the federation is obligated to challenge the appointment, because its approval "would invalidate provisions in state law requiring the presence of union members on boards and commissions and like government bodies."

Mediation Board study cites settlement record

In the 50 years since its establishment, 97 percent of the disputes brought before the National Mediation Board have been resolved without a work stoppage, according to a historical analysis of the agency.

The study by Charles L. Rehmus, dean of Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations, notes that since 1934, the board has resolved 5,500 representation cases, "largely without incident," and it has mediated nearly 12,000 cases in the rail and airline industries. Fewer than 350 of those cases resulted in a strike or lockout.

The report, titled the National Mediation Board at Fifty, points out that the agency was created by Congress under an amendment to the 1926 Railway Labor Act to help insure the right of rail and airline employees to organize. The board's function is also to aid in settling labor-management disputes and to resolve grievances to avert interruption of vital transportation services.

Copies of the report are available from the Research Dept., National Mediation Board, Washington, D.C. 20573.

Kirkland vows fight on social security

ing News, Reagan again suggested that his arm could easily be twisted in favor of a social security freeze as long as he didn't have to take the political heat by himself.

"If Congress en masse came down on the side of, say, reducing or holding off on the COLA, the cost-of-living increase, you know, what would I be able to do about that?" the President asked.

Reagan, however, made clear his adamant opposition to seeking large-scale budget savings by holding down military spending.

That would really be off limits, he made clear.

Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (Kan.) predicted that Republican committee chairmen would agree to an across-the-board budget freeze that would include abandonment of the 1986 COLA for social security recipients. But there were indications that Senate Republicans were having more difficulty than they had anticipated in shaping a GOP consensus on a budget that would be unveiled even before the President sent his proposals to Congress.

Ironically, a law scheduled to take effect in 1992 would have eliminated the push to cut social security outlays to make the budget deficit appear smaller.

After that date, social security income and outgo will no longer be considered part of the unified federal budget and thus will not be a factor in budget deficits or surpluses.

The social security trust funds were brought into the budget in 1969, in part at least because the surplus the system normally runs would brighen the budget picture in the public's perception.

Ray Alvarez dies at 55, Ohio-Ky. COPE director

West Chester, Ohio—Raymond S. Alvarez, the AFL-CIO COPE director for Ohio and Kentucky, died of cancer at his home here Jan. 11. He was 55.

Alvarez, who came out of the Steelworkers, had been on the COPE staff since 1969. He also was an organizer for the Clothing Workers in 1961 and 1962, and held a number of elected offices with USWA Local 2598.

Services were held Jan. 17 at Holy Infant Church in Bethlehem, Pa. Survivors include his wife Helen and three children.

HMOs cleared for Medicare prepayments

Health maintenance organizations (HMOs) will be eligible for preset monthly payments for members covered by Medicare under new government regulations that take effect Feb. 1.

Until now, HMOs have had to bill Medicare for each covered service provided members over 65 and be reimbursed on a fee-for-service basis.

The new regulations, based on legislation passed in 1982, will allow HMOs to seek certification for prepayment at a monthly amount based on 95 percent of the average cost of covered health services for area residents covered by Medicare.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman welcomed the move as encouraging the comprehensive, prepaid health care concept represented by HMOs. He noted that HMOs typically provide services not covered by Medicare, such as reimbursement for prescription drugs, eye examinations and sometimes dental care.

Future participants

The regulations, more than two years in the making, do not require HMOs to choose prepayment from Medicare, and at least initially, there is not likely to be any change in the cost of participating in an HMO plan. But the long-range effect may be to increase the number of Medicare-eligible persons choosing HMO membership. At present, they make up an estimated 400,000 of the more than 31 million persons covered by Medicare.

Persons over 65 pay the monthly premium, currently $15.50, for Medicare Part B coverage of doctor services, whether or not they are in an HMO.

Those who are in HMOs normally pay a special cut-rate premium because Medicare will reimburse the plan for part of their health care costs. The new regulations change the way the plan is reimbursed but do not directly affect the individual's cost. To be eligible for the per capita reimbursement, the HMO must provide physician services and hospitalization benefits at least equal to Medicare.

Frank Mongelli dies, ran Seafarers' school

Valley Lee, Md.—Frank A. Mongelli, 73, vice president of the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship in Piney Point, Md., died at his home here Jan. 11 after a heart attack.

Mongelli, who was in charge of the school's day-by-day operations, joined the Seafarers in 1940 when he put to sea with the Merchant Marine. He came ashore in 1957 to work as an SIU official in developing a training program for seamen. He had been at Piney Point since 1967.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller addresses HRDI conference in St. Louis.

HRDI spearheads program to open jobs for handicapped

St. Louis—Labor's commitment to job opportunities for handicapped persons and disabled workers was stressed at a conference held here to further cooperation by unions, employers and public rehabilitation agencies.

The program, which drew some 130 participants, was cosponsored by the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute. HRDI opened a handicapped placement center in St. Louis last year, and HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold said the program has gotten off to a good start.

HRDI's handicapped placement effort is "only a small contribution to an enormous employment problem," Arnold told the conference. But "it demonstrates what can be done through a cooperative effort," he emphasized.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller, who heads the labor subcommittee of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, noted the importance of the union role in the workplace.

Shop stewards, she said, have been at the front line of establishing the rights of handicapped workers to job equality and arranging simple job accommodations that have significantly eased the workplace problems of handicapped members. Miller urged greater attention to such issues as job retention for middle-aged workers who bocem disabled on the job.

Marcia Cline, coordinator of the Missouri AFL-CIO's displaced worker program, told a workshop session of the efforts of an Electrical Workers shop steward in helping to develop factory job opportunities for deaf workers and encouraging workers in the shop to learn sign language that enabled them to communicate with the new workers.

Missouri's newly elected lieutenant governor, Harriett Woods, spoke of the need to secure changes in laws and regulations that impede the rehabilitation of the handicapped.

President Robert Kelley of the Greater St. Louis Labor Council and Executive Sec. Richard Manyia of the St. Louis Building & Construction Trades Council were speakers at the conference, along with employer representatives and officials of the state's Vocational Rehabilitation Division and Bureau for the Blind, which were among the program's co-sponsors.

The HRDI is planning other area conferences as part of a national effort to strengthen the working relationship among labor, business and vocational rehabilitation agencies, Arnold said.

Court backs hospital board role for labor

erations," and it squares with the state's goal of controlling costs, Judge Kidd said.

The court also upheld those parts of the law that require specific percentages of citizen representation, declaring that "there is no reason to believe that the average consumer is not qualified to serve as a hospital board member." The final decision as to who will be appointed to the board still rests with the hospital, with the proviso that the four categories in the law must be observed, the court said.

In the parts of the case involving board membership by union members, Judge Kidd rejected the argument that this would upset the "balance of power" between labor and management and pose a conflict of interests between the board member's duties as a hospital trustee and as a union representative.

The law does not require that labor representatives on hospital boards be "affiliated with the hospital's bargaining unit," the court noted. And even in such cases, conflict of interest can be avoided because, like any other board member, "a labor representative sitting on a board of directors should stand aside when issues are taken up regarding his labor organization."

Judge Kidd continued that any board member—whether a labor member or business representative—"should withdraw from the decision-making process" wherever a conflict of interest or breach of fiduciary responsibility could occur.

West German conglomerate assailed for union-busting

Union-busting on an international scale has the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers hopping mad.

OCAW's battle is with a West German multinational conglomerate, BASF A.G., that operates a chemical plant in Geismar, La., where 400 workers were locked out seven months ago.

A union delegation led by OCAW Vice President Calvin Moore has already met with German embassy officials in Washington to air the dispute. And next month, OCAW representatives plan to meet with government officials in Bonn and enlist the support of West German trade unions in the battle with BASF.

The lockout at the BASF-Wyandotte plant came just as OCAW's contract was to expire. The union charged that management insisted on stripping workers of seniority rights, forcing massive wage rollbacks, and other demands that would effectively destroy the agreement.

BASF has set out to systematically destroy unions, Moore charged. BASF already has engineered the decertification of two Steelworkers locals, a Teamsters unit, destroyed an OCAW bargaining unit in Wyandotte, Mich., and forced an inferior contract on an OCAW local in Huntington, W.Va.

"And it has become a notorious labor law violator in the process," Moore added. "Administrative law judges for the National Labor Relations Board have found BASF guilty in four separate cases of violating the National Labor Relations Act, but this company refuses to comply with the law."

Although OCAW has altered its position in an effort to get a fair settlement, the company refuses to negotiate. Instead, BASF has called for further cuts in bargaining unit positions while using contract employees.

Its insistence on substantial wage cutbacks at Geismar in the face of soaring profits for the firm makes it clear that the sompany simply wants to break the union, OCAW said.

"It is certainly not because BASF is suffering financially that they have placed these unreasonable demands on the table," the union stressed. After near-record profits in 1983, pre-tax profits for the first nine months of 1984 rose 76 percent from a year earlier.

Based on last year's performance, BASF expects to boost its capital investments in the United States by 40 percent this year, expanding the production capacity of its Geismar facility in the process.

Focus on labor history

Some 40 social studies teachers from Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia explore efforts to expand and improve the teaching of labor history, economics and current issues affecting unions. Program director Harold D. Snell, far left, a Railway & Airline Clerks retiree and a former State Dept. labor attache, conducts one of the four workshops at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. The program was developed by the National Capital Area Trade Union Retirees, a group of former officers and staff members of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates.

Union pay cheers inaugural troupe

The breakthrough came through the Actors & Artistes, the parent federation of the entertainment unions headed by AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal.

After determining that AGVA was the union with jurisdiction over the performers involved, O'Neal dispatched Hall and attorney Gerald Dunbar to Washington to negotiate with the Robert Jani organization, which is producing all of the inaugural entertainment.

The union position was that performers taking part in any event for which a fee was charged should be paid at least the prevailing rate. It did not seek to represent amateur college choruses made up of full-time students. But it insisted on payment for participation in the inaugural ball entertainment being put together by Jani and his staff.

The inaugural ball agreement does not require the performers recruited to be members of AGVA. But the producers will make the standard payment into the union's pension and welfare fund in addition to paying performers the rate negotiated by the union.

Performers will also get the expense money promised them and will be free to take part as volunteers in any inaugural event which is free to the public.

O'Neal said the many expressions of public and trade union support for the position of the performer unions contributed significantly to the settlement.

A New Beginning

ON INAUGURATION DAY, we are all winners because of our nation's sturdy democratic heritage. No military coup determines our head of state. Our elections are no kin to the obscene charade of democracy that takes place in one-party states where no effective opposition is tolerated.

As he takes the oath of office anew, President Reagan will know as his predecessors can testify, the trade union movement will not be found wanting in any crisis confronting our nation.

Quite obviously, respect for the President and the election process does not diminish the AFL-CIO's disagreement with policies it considers wrong or actions it regards as harmful to workers and the nation.

In the past, unions have criticized the actions of public officials labor helped elect and praised positions taken by persons who lacked union endorsement. That is as it should be.

SCHOLASTIC UPDATE magazine, which goes to high school students, asked 10 prominent Americans what they expected of President Reagan in his second term. This is what AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland wrote in the magazine's Jan. 18 issue:

"We ask no more of any President than that he faithfully execute the laws of the United States, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution, and administer the nation's laws fairly and impartially.

"For four years, many laws have been enforced selectively, to say the least. Those guaranteeing the right of workers to join and form unions, those that require employers to provide safe and healthy working conditions, and those designed to protect ordinary people from the power of concentrated wealth have become nearly meaningless. Tax burdens have been shifted strongly from wealthy individuals and corporations to wage and salary earners. Public education, public health and public facilities have been drastically underfunded.

"What we would most like to see in Mr. Reagan's second administration is an effort to breathe life into the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag so that this country shall become, in truth, 'one nation . . . with liberty and justice for all'—including working people, including the young, the old, the sick and the disadvantaged, and not exclusively those who hold the greatest economic and political power."

A Union of States

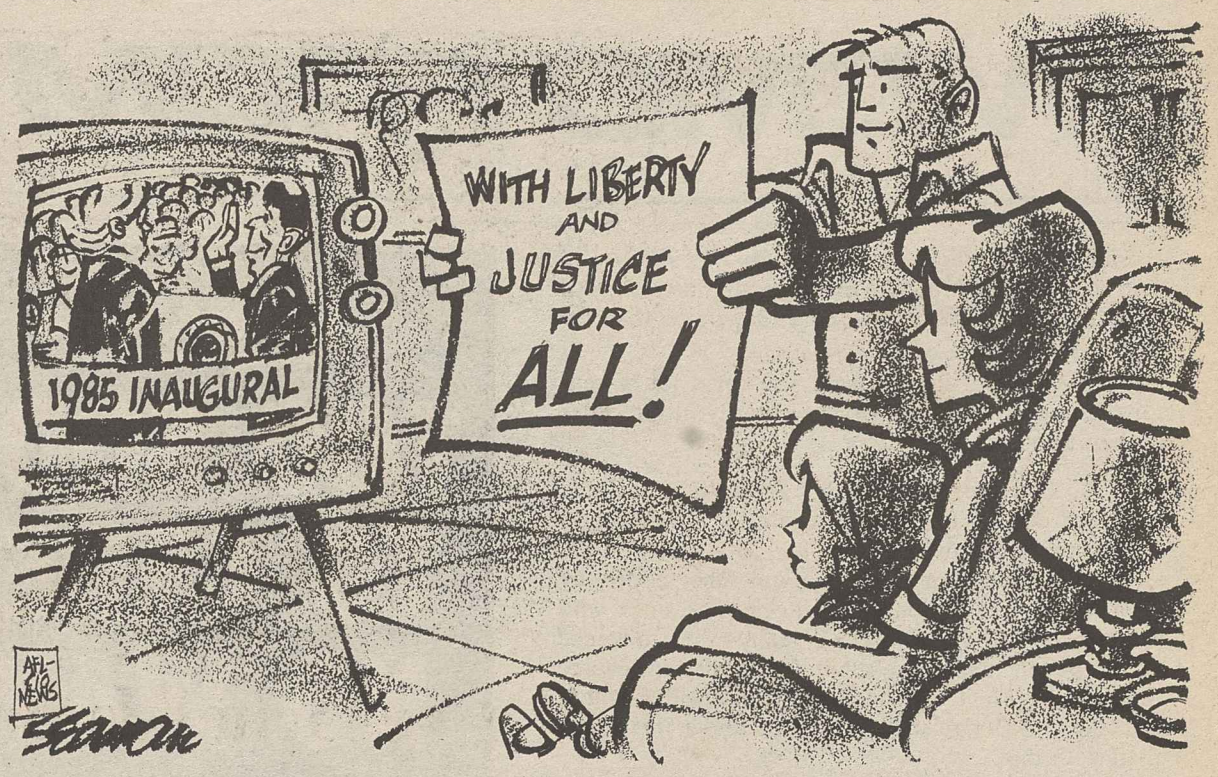
THE LEGISLATIVE efforts of the AFL-CIO and of its constituent unions are properly centered on Congress as the principal forum for dealing with national issues.



It would be a terrible mistake, however, for any union member to dismiss as minor-league politics the election of state legislators and governors. Especially in this period of frequent gridlock between Congress and the White House, the states often are where the action is.

Sometimes this is brought dramatically into focus.

In Idaho, union members don't need any lectures on the importance of the state legislatures. The union shop would have been outlawed by a "right-to-work" law and the state's prevailing wage law would have been repealed if it had not been for vetoes by Democratic Gov. John Evans. But conservative Republicans gained enough seats in the last election to claim a veto-proof legislature—a claim that is likely to be soon put to the test.

In contrast, there are states with progressive legislatures where labor has been able to remedy some of the deficiencies of Congress. The proliferation of state laws to assure workers the right to full disclosure of the hazardous chemicals they may encounter in their jobs is a direct offshoot of union legislative efforts.

State labor federations are the front line troops in these battles. They need all the support we can give them.

Budget ax aimed again at vital social programs

By Press Associates, Inc.

During the 1984 presidential election campaign, Ronald Reagan played down the importance of his record-breaking deficits which continue to flow from the tax and spending policies of his first term.

Economic growth, Reagan insisted, would close the ballooning revenue-spending gap without the need to raise taxes or slow the escalation of military spending. Candidate Reagan refused to reveal any specifics about further domestic spending cuts, aside from pledging not to cut social security benefits.

After the election, the White House's rosy deficit estimates grew above the $200 billion mark. Administration officials and GOP congressional leaders began eyeing drastic spending cuts to curb runaway deficits.

In early December, Reagan proposed to freeze, cut or eliminate more than 100 domestic programs that affect most Americans. Only the Pentagon would be spared from his budget ax.

As with previous Reagan cutbacks, the poor would be hit the hardest, in spite of Reagan's campaign rhetoric about preserving the social "safety net." During congressional hearings last September on the rise of poverty in America, Budget Director David Stockman had promised to recommend no further cuts in programs for the poor.

Reagan's budget

Most of the Administration's preliminary budget proposals are expected to be in the final budget package Reagan will submit to Congress in February.

The proposed cuts in domestic programs "would be nearly equal in magnitude to all human resources cuts enacted in 1981 and 1982," according to an analysis by the Washington-based Center on Budget & Policy Priorities, a nonpartisan group. These cuts would exceed $63 billion over the next three years, the study said.

Cuts in programs for low-income persons, the center said, would exceed $31 billion during this three-year period. The results would include:

- More than 500,000 low-income pregnant women, infants and children at nutritional risk would have their prescription food supplements terminated by a proposed 17-percent reduction in the WIC program. This program has proven effective in reducing the incidence of low birth weight, the leading cause of infant mortality.

Housing subsidy cuts

- Some 200,000 low-income families and elderly persons would lose a chance for decent, affordable housing due to further cuts in federally subsidized housing construction. As many as a half-million low-rent housing units now are lost each year because of condominium conversions, rent hikes, decay and abandonment.

- A freeze on adjustments in the food stamp program would mean that food stamps purchase less food. This would "increase the number of poor elderly and poor families with children who run out of food before the end of the month," according to the center.

- Among the low-income programs to be shut down completely are the Jobs Corps; the Work Incentive Program, which helps welfare mothers find jobs; legal services; rural housing programs; and the community services block grant.

Despite Reagan's claim that social security benefits, including cost-of-living adjustments, would be protected, COLAs would not be provided for two million low-income social security recipients. Low-income beneficiaries generally receive Supplementary Security Income (SSI) benefits as well as social security.

Because of the Administration's proposed freeze on COLAs for SSI, low-income elderly and disabled beneficiaries would have their SSI benefits cut by the full amount that their social security benefits increased. Thus, the social security COLA would be cancelled out for the very beneficiaries who need it most—those with low incomes.

MEMO FROM COPE

Isn't it a bit ridiculous, in January of 1985, to be worrying over U.S. Senate elections that aren't going to be held until November of 1986, more than 20 months off?

As a matter of fact, it isn't, and for a lot of reasons. Some of these are, not necessarily in the order of their importance:

► 1. It will be the best shot for folks so inclined to usher out of the Senate a cluster of first-term right-wingers narrowly elected in 1980, partly on the strength of lavish expenditures and other efforts by rightist political action committees. The ones who survive the 1986 election will gain more influence in the Senate and more clout for right-wing causes than they presently possess. And they will be more difficult to dislodge with two terms under their belts than with one.

In this group are Jeremiah Denton (Ala.), Matt Mattingly (Ga.), Steve Symms (Idaho), Dan Quayle (Ind.), Charles Grassley (Iowa), John East (N.C.), Don Nickles (Okla.), Robert Kasten (Wis.).

► 2. Another grouping of less ideologically-driven conservatives, also first-termers elected by thin margins in 1980, will seek return to office. If granted a second term, they too will be hard to budge before the turn of the century and will settle into positions of enhanced power in the Senate and the nation.

In the second group are Frank Murkowski (Alaska), Paula Hawkins (Fla.), Warren Rudman (N.H.), Alfonse D'Amato (N.Y.), Slade Gorton (Wash.).

► 3. The arithmetic of 1986 contests provides Democrats a hot opportunity to take numerical control of the Senate, a better one than they'll have for a long time thereafter.

After scoring a net gain of two seats in 1984, Democrats still are on the short end of a 53-47 margin. They'd need a gain of four to take control, but if they can't do better than that from among all the "opportunity" seats, their party is in more trouble than even its loudest Cassandras suspect. After all, 22 Republican seats and only 12 Democratic will be contested in 1986, and 16 of the GOP seats were won by 55 percent or less in 1980.

Control means having the chairs and the majorities on Senate committees and subcommittees and, in effect, having the say on what legislation gets considered and in what form.

► 4. The bottom line is the impact reducing the ranks of conservative and ultra-conservative Senators would have on votes on key issues (see chart). On any issue like job-creating measures, health care, fair trade, tax justice etc., by replacing these incumbents with challengers of a different mind-set you actually pick up two votes. You substract one from the anti column and add one to the pro.

► 5. A substantial Democratic gain at the expense of conservative and ultra-conservative Republicans will take the steam out of the fast-charging right-wing PACs who now think and act like they've got the political world by the tail. Sooner or later, they're going to run out of gas anyway, but to hasten the process would be a substantial public service.

► 6. Since the Senate is stuck with Jesse Helms—re-elected in 1984—for another term, it would be nice to cashier some of his troops and leave him to play out in the far right boondocks with less company and diminished support.

Listed in the chart that follows are two groups of GOP incumbents. The first includes ultra-conservatives who, as senators, or previous to Senate service, have been associated with, and owe their election in large measure to, right-wing PACs. The second includes conservatives not openly aligned with the rightist movement and its PACs.

All are expected to seek a second term. All are measured in the marginal category by the only yardstick presently able to determine marginality, the narrowness of their 1980 victory. Some may be more, others less, vulnerable than the figure suggests.

(Not included in the list is Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater, who already has announced he will not run for re-election. His Senate seat, too, can be considered marginal. He won by only a few thousand votes in 1980.)

Keeping a Close Eye on Virginia

Chances are if you don't live in Virginia, you couldn't care less who's running for the Republican nomination for the state's lieutenant-governor.

Maybe you don't give a hoot, but the one political contest that will be watched most closely this year by party people, political committee people, observers, commentators and political junkies will be the race for lieutenant governor of Virginia. At least the primary, and then maybe the general.

The reason is that for the first time, a major figure in the "new right" leadership ranks, who had a hand in hundreds of campaigns, is coming out of the closet and openly lusting for elected office. (He made a token run once before, as vice presidential candidate on a third-party ticket in 1976.)

The person is Richard Viguerie, the Founding Father of the "new right" (no longer "new" because it's been around a while now.) It was Viguerie who got the idea and built the lists for direct mass mail to identified conservatives and ultra-conservatives and refined the process so it can successfully "prospect" for supporters.

Much has come after Viguerie in the way of rightist PACs and leaders, but he made it all possible. "It all" as of now represents multi-million dollar budgets, effective political action, think tanks, publications and—most telling—significant numbers of members of the U.S. House and Senate, state legislatures and other levels of elected officials indebted to the "new right" for their eminence.

This contest—which would be so obscure in the eyes of the rest of the nation under normal circumstances—will be monitored closely by a lot of interested parties with several questions in mind:

► Will the techniques and technology a "new right" leader has used with such skill in behalf of other candidates and causes succeed in his own campaign?

► Will normally ultra-conservative supporters respond as voters to one who has manipulated them as contributors?

► Will someone who's done so much to promote the candidacies of others be effective in promoting his own?

► Will the candidate trim his sails to accommodate the realities of running for office?

► If he runs and wins, will this unleash a flood of other right wing leaders into the electoral process as candidates?

These and other questions will be answered as the campaign progresses. If nothing else, Viguerie is adding some zing to a year in which little is happening in the way of electoral activity.

For Viguerie, Virginia . . . For Helms, the World

Now, here's the plan:

While Richard Viguerie is taking over Virginia, Jesse Helms will take over CBS.

That's right: CBS, the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Senator Helms' notion is to persuade right-wingers to buy stock in CBS so they can, in his words, "take control of the network" and "become Dan Rather's boss."

This would end all the biased, liberal reporting that Helms frets poisons the minds of Americans and unfairly influences elections. (Has Helms looked at the '84 returns lately?)

Recognizing a good publicity ploy when he sees one, Terry Dolan—chief of the National Conservative PAC—jumped on the Helms bandwagon and committed $100,000, with a few strings, to the project.

It is described, as most right-wing causes are, as a "national crusade."

GOP Big Gainer from '84 New Registrants

Republican candidates benefiitted most from the increase in registered voters in 1984 elections, according to a report by the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate.

The number of registered citizens increased by 12 million over 1980, the report said, though only four million of the newly-registered voters turned out on election day.

These voters went 61-32 for President Reagan and 45-39 for Republican House and Senate candidates. Forty-nine percent consider themselves GOP or leaning GOP, 38 percent Democratic or leaning that way. Biggest gain among new voters for the GOP was in the south, with 55 percent with or leaning toward the GOP.

The survey turned up 53 percent GOP allegiance among new voters in the east, but lesser figures elsewhere—44 in the midwest, 46 in the west.

Despite the substantial increase in enrolled voters, election day turnout was only slightly higher than in the 1980 presidential contest. At 53.3 percent of total eligibles, it was merely a 0.7 percent boost. However, 1984 was the first time participation has increased since it peaked at 62.8 percent in 1960.

South African protests add new pressure

By James M. Shevis

American labor backed up its pledge of support for embattled black South African trade unionists with a demonstration at the South African embassy that produced the largest number of arrests since protests began there 10 weeks ago.

The Jan. 18 arrests of 87 representatives from 10 AFL-CIO affiliates, federation headquarters, and the staff union of the National Labor Relations Board came on the eve of weekend festivities connected with President Reagan's inauguration to a second term. The demonstration was as much a protest of Reagan's policy of "constructive engagement" toward the South African government as it was a condemnation of Pretoria's racist treatment of black workers.

"I think it's time to let him (Reagan) know that so-called constructive engagement is absolutely destructive of human freedom, and it's time to stop it," Postal Workers President Moe Biller declared at a streetside news conference a block from the embassy.

Constructive engagement is the term the Reagan Administration applies to its relationship with South Africa. It stresses "quiet diplomacy" rather than firm pressure on the South African government to abandon its official policy of race discrimination.

Increasing pressure

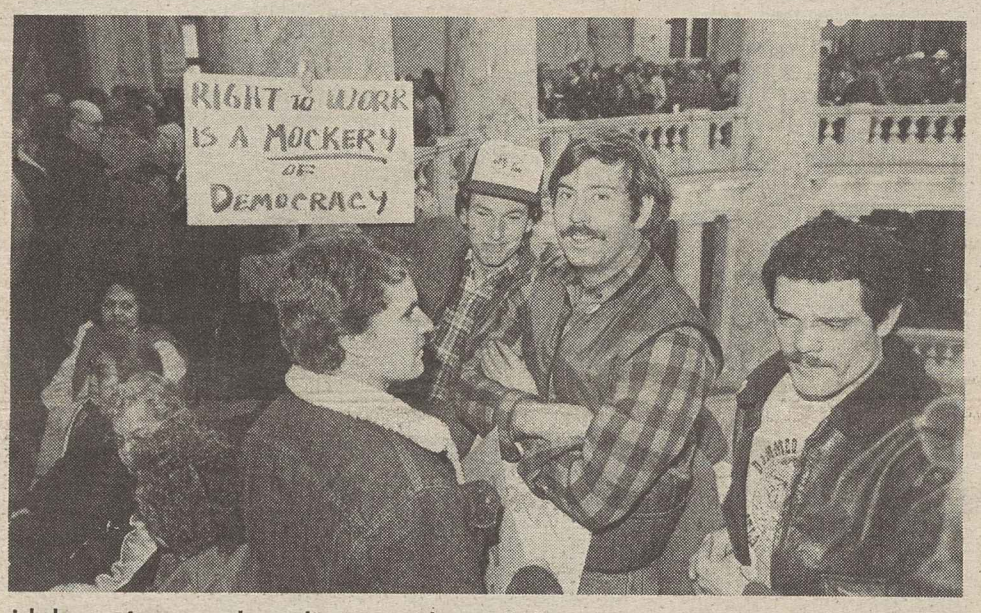
South African black unionists, spearheaded by the Council of Unions of South Africa, along with most of the world's free trade unions, are moving inexorably toward more severe action to persuade Prime Minister Pietr Botha's regime to accord basic human rights to all citizens.



At a three-day meeting in Washington earlier this month, Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken of the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions said concrete proposals for "selective disinvestment" in South Africa had been put forth by a number of ICFTU affiliates.

The ICFTU executive board is expected to act on these measures at a meeting in Washington, Apr. 11-12, possibly targeting several multinational firms whose operations in South Africa are seen to support the apartheid system.

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, told news reporters the federation "will continue to press the Reagan Administration and the corporate world to take more

Idaho union members line corridors of the state Capitol, overflowing the committee room where a "right-to-work" bill was being rammed through.

Idaho GOP steamroller passes union-shop ban

Boise, Ida.—A Republican-dominated legislature passed a "right-to-work" law to make union shops illegal in Idaho and the state's labor movement is counting on a promised veto by Democratic Gov. John Evans to slow the GOP steamroller.

The battle then will be to switch the votes needed to prevent a two-thirds majority of the House and Senate from overriding the veto.

In a similar scenario two years ago, "right-to-work" supporters couldn't override a veto by Evans, and the union-busting bill died. But with their ranks enlarged by November's election and the effects of redistricting, conservative Republicans have made enactment of "right-to-work" a top priority in the new legislature.

After a hastily called committee hearing, at which hundreds of union members were frozen out, the "right-to-work" bill was rushed to passage in the House and rammed through the Senate less than a week later. It passed the House 62-20, with only three Republicans crossing over to join the solid Democratic opposition. The Senate's 28-14 vote was strictly along party lines.

Hurry-up hearing

The brief House hearing on the legislation was called on less than 24 hours notice, but the Idaho AFL-CIO's alert to unions and central bodies brought more than 600 union members to the Capitol.

At the hearing, State AFL-CIO President Jim Kerns attacked the "right-to-work" proposal as a smokescreen for union-busting but the hurry-up session was devoted largely to hearing proponents of the bill. Its chairman gaveled it to a close after two hours, complaining of "heckling" of the bill's backers by union members.

A principal witness for the bill, Terry McKnight of the Idaho Freedom to Work Committee, asserted that he had once been a union supporter and had such bitter arguments with his father that "we

Survey finds non-union pay one-third less

A union contract was worth more than $100 a week extra to the average worker last year. Full-time wage and salary workers represented by unions got paid an average of one-third more than their non-union counterparts.

That's what the Bureau of Labor Statistics found through the monthly census survey of 60,000 households which provides the basic information on the nation's labor force.

For 1984, the 21.6 percent of the workforce represented by unions were paid an average of $404 a week compared with the $303 average for the non-union workforce.

That's consistent with the 1983 report, the first year of the detailed BLS survey, which showed a $98-a-week differential.

If the value of fringe benefits were included—an area in which unions have been pacesetters—the dollar advantage of union contracts would be even greater.

Minorities benefit

The 1984 tally also shows that the gap between union and non-union pay is even higher among minorities.

Blacks covered by a union contract averaged $352 a week compared with $236 for those without union protection. Among Hispanics, the union average was $346 compared with $236 for the non-union group.

Reagan's inaugural address as chilling as frigid weather

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan began his second term with an inaugural address that combined a hard-line conservative philosophy with a warmly sentimental vision of a simpler America in which neighbor looked after neighbor and economic opportunity was unhindered by government restraints.

When shorn of its coating of rhetoric, the presidential message was as chilling as the frigid winds that forced the inaugural ceremonies indoors.

The next four years, by Reagan's script, will see the non-military role of the federal government drastically and permanently reduced.

The poor will be "freed" from dependence on the federal government. An expanding private sector and "support from family and community" will assure care for "the old and infirm," protect "the unborn," and help make "the unfortunate" self-sufficient.

By turning back functions to the states, the budget deficit can be brought down and a future balanced budget assured by a constitutional amendment.

The President, whose Administration has been marked by unprecedented growth of the federal deficit, primarily because of massive tax cuts for the most wealthy,

Guild's Broun Award honors probe of 1960 jailhouse death

Mike Masterson of the Arkansas Democrat won the Newspaper Guild's 1984 Heywood Broun Award for his investigation into the death, 24 years earlier, of a young black man in the Faulkner County Jail in Conway, Ark.

Masterson's investigation "established beyond a doubt" that 21-year-old Marvin Williams "had been beaten to death, probably after his arrest on what appeared to have been a trumped-up charge of public drunkenness," the judges said. A coroner's jury in 1960 ruled his death to an accident.

The $1,000 award was presented to Masterson at a luncheon on Jan. 22 during the winter meeting of TNG executive board.

Masterson, a former member of Chicago Guild Local 71, is currently director of special editorial projects at the Arkansas Democrat in Little Rock.

The award, in its 44th year, is made annually for outstanding individual journalistic achievement in the spirit of Broun's own work in the '20s and '30s. That spirit was distinguished by an abiding concern for the underdog and the underprivileged.

Broun, a newspaper columnist, was TNG's founding president.

Masterson's work was one of a dozen first-rate contenders among the 139 entries in this year's competition, the judges said, noting that "Masterson stood out for his exceptional enterprise, diligence and balance."

The entry "exemplified the spirit of Heywood Broun's own reporting of injustices done to ordinary people who were as defenseless as Marvin Williams was in a small-town American jail in 1960," they said.

Acting on a tip from a white prison inmate who had been held in the Faulkner County jail on the night of Williams's arrest in 1960, Masterson launched an investigation that led him to an autopsy report that showed Williams had died from a blow to the head that severely fractured his skull. The report also showed that no alcohol was found in his blood.

A coroner's jury impaneled within hours after Williams's body was found in a jail cell ruled his death an accident. It based that finding on the testimony of two white police officers that Williams sustained his head injury from a fall on the courthouse steps following his arrest.

As a result of Masterson's reporting, a special prosecutor was named and a grand jury investigation into his death will begin in February.

Judges for this year's entries were Peter Braestrup, editor of the Wilson Quarterly; Lyle Denniston, Supreme Court reporter for the Baltimore Sun, and Katherine Winton Evans, editor of the Washington Journalism Review.

CORRECTION

John Hall, who negotiated the contract covering young singers and dancers hired to perform at inaugural events, is assistant executive secretary of the Television & Radio Artists (AFTRA). He negotiated the contract on behalf of the 4-As, the parent federation of entertainment unions, on the basis of wage scales of the Guild of Variety Artists (AGVA). The Jan. 19 issue of the AFL-CIO News incorrectly identified Hall as an official of AGVA.

First contract ratified

White-collar unit posts victory in Yale dispute

New Haven, Conn.—The 2,500-member clerical and technical unit at Yale University, members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34, ratified a new 42-month contract that will boost salaries an average of 35 percent over the term of the agreement.

Local 34's long, bitter struggle for a first contract with the university ended Jan. 22 when the members voted to approve the contract, 890-2. The agreement had been recommended unanimously by the 35-member bargaining committee.

Also at that meeting, the Local 34 members unanimously voted to back the blue-collar, service and maintenance workers in their sister unit, Local 35, in negotiations for a new contract. Bargaining for that contract was continuing at the AFL-CIO News presstime, with a strike deadline set for midnight, Jan. 25.

Pay equity, pensions, job security and a dental plan were the central issues for the Local 34 workers, with pay equity receiving national attention because of its impact on workers at other universities and public institutions.

Across-the-board increases will total 20.25 percent over the life of the contract with additional raises coming from a new 17-step pay scale within each grade level. Local 34 spokesman Bill Meyerson said each annual step increase provides a 3-percent pay raise. In addition, the lowest step in the previous pay schedule was eliminated.

Retroactive raise

The first across-the-board increase of 6.5 percent is retroactive to July 1, 1984. Increases of 3.25 percent will be added in July 1985 and March 1986, with raises in October 1986 and June 1987 totaling 7.25 percent more.

"This contract ends the mechanism by which Yale compressed and depressed salaries by clustering workers at the low end of the pay scales," Meyerson said. He added that adjustments will be paid in January 1987 and July 1987 if the cost of living rise exceeds 4.5 percent. The workers will receive half the percentage of inflation above 4.5 percent.

A dental plan provides full coverage for all prevention and diagnostic care and 80 percent of all other dental services, with no deductible and no maximum limit. The university will pay for full coverage of its workers and half the fee for family members.

Meyerson said pension benefits will be boosted by about 45 percent over the contract's term with increases of 11.5 to 14 percent for current retirees.

Improvements also were achieved in job security, and Yale agreed to pay in full for retraining costs of any worker on layoff.

A joint committee of university and union representatives headed by a mutually agreed upon faculty member will be set up to hear appeals from members who feel they have been slotted at the wrong pay level in the new schedule. The committee will have the authority to make a binding determination.

In the 15-month battle for the contract, Local 34 members built a strong sense of solidarity among themselves and drew widespread support from the rest of the labor movement.

10-week strike

After achieving a partial contract on non-economic items early last year, the local hit a stone wall in its efforts to end pay inequities, and the members went on strike Sept. 26 to achieve their goals. The unit of secretaries, research assistants, telephone operators, and computer operators had an average wage of $13,424; 80 percent of the members are female.

As support for their cause grew, some faculty members moved classes off campus and students joined in the rallies that drew public attention to the dispute.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland addressed one rally at the university and assured the strikers that the labor movement was solidly behind them.

Fraternal support from Local 35 was the mainstay of the Local 34 members during their 10-week strike. The walkout ended on Dec. 4 when the members voted to return to work temporarily while the local's bargaining committee worked toward the settlement with the university which has now been ratified.

AFL-CIO Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler said the victory at Yale sounds a positive note both for the school's employees and the entire labor movement. The HERE unit's success in winning recognition and a contract acceptable to both sides should boost organizing and bargaining at other universities and in all other white-collar workplaces, he said.

Roofers choose Wiederkehr to succeed Johnson

Joseph A. Wiederkehr has been elected president of the Roofers by the union's executive board to succeed Roy E. Johnson, who retired.

Johnson, 62, president of the union since 1974, previously served as secretary-treasurer. A member of Local 108 in Washington, D.C., he joined the union staff in 1971.

Wiederkehr, 60, who took office Jan. 16, has been business manager of Local 20 in Kansas City since 1968 and an international vice president since 1970.

He also has been a member of the union's committees on safety and health, and apprenticeship, and was active in the development of the Roofers' political education and legislation fund as well as its drug and alcohol abuse treatment program.

Reagan inaugurates chilling agenda

said solemnly: "Let us make it unconstitutional for the federal government to spend more than the federal government takes in."

Reagan began his second term with the advantage of an impressive victory at the polls and the electoral votes of 49 states.

"I will do my utmost to be deserving of your trust," Reagan said in one of the more moving passages of an otherwise low-keyed inaugural address.

As he has throughout his political career, Reagan viewed government as an encroachment on liberty, an intruder into the lives of Americans and an obstacle to the rewards that should go to the successful.

He did, at one point, reach out to black Americans and other minorities with a promise that there will be "no turning back" from progress. This is still, Reagan conceded, an area in which "the federal government can play a part."

The President reiterated his determination to continue to build up America's military defenses while pursuing negotiations seeking a reduction in nuclear arms and their eventual abolition.

His foreign policy goals, Reagan made clear, include support for "free enterprise throughout the world" as well as self-government and individual rights.

Far-right praise

The President's mild-mannered delivery muted much of the stridency of his conservative doctrine. But the most enthusiastic response to his address came from the fringes of the GOP. Richard Viguerie, the chief fund-raiser for the far right, was asked in a television interview what he would have written for Reagan's inaugural address.

Viguerie glowed happily. The President's message was letter-perfect, he insisted. He wouldn't have changed a word.

As with Reagan's first inaugural, Washington streets were near-gridlocked at times with bumper-to-bumper limousines taking affluent Republicans to rounds of parties. But the GOP was making a special effort this time around to provide a place for young Reagan supporters. The Republican hope is to translate the strong youth vote for Reagan into a permanent political attachment to the GOP.

Rep. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), spokesman for a New Right populist philosophy, was a principal speaker at an inaugural Leadership Brunch for Young Americans.

A Washington Post reporter at the event cornered a state official of Virginia's Reagan youth group who was willing to explain the President's political appeal to her contemporaries.

When Jimmy Carter was President, she explained, "we couldn't go on ski trips and buy designer jeans because our parents were strapped financially. But then Ronald Reagan came in, and after a while we got those things."

Study documents grim impact of plant closings

Birmingham, Ala.—The decision to close a plant or shut down a mine that may cause only a ripple in a distant corporate boardroom can set off a tidal wave that leaves workers and their families, local communities and their voluntary agencies swamped and helpless.

A new study conducted by the University of Alabama and the United Way among jobless steelworkers and coal miners found that state unemployment benefits and voluntary agency resources are inadequate to cope with the level and the length of joblessness touched off by shutdowns in a three-county area.

Once those options and workers' own resources have been tapped out, for many of the unemployed "there literally may be nowhere to turn," the researchers found.

The 18-month study was conducted by David Sink, chairman of the university's department of political science and urban affairs, and Norman Eggleston, chairman of the department of social work. United Way Planning Director Harry Brown also participated in the research.

The researchers compiled results of questionnaires given 324 unemployed workers. They interviewed about 30 of the jobless workers. Half of those participating were laid off from a U.S. Steel Corp. facility in 1982, and the majority of the others were out-of-work coal miners.

Eggleston and Sink pointed out that half the workers questioned were over 40 and half had worked at their last jobs for more than 10 years. More than a third of the steelworkers had been on their jobs more than 30 years before they were let go. And most of those over 40 had spent all their adult working lives in the steel mills or coal mines.

Soaring joblessness

According to Labor Dept. unemployment figures, the Birmingham area has had one of the highest unemployment rates anywhere in the nation for the past several years. Sink and Eggleston lay the blame for the "explosion" of double-digit joblessness throughout the region to the closing of the U.S. Steel mill.

When that plant closed its gates with no warning to workers, local government or local charitable agencies, the impact was "staggering" and "impossible for the local economy to absorb," they found.

The inadequacy of unemployment or other state benefit programs in Alabama "places significant hardships on the unemployed as well as on the voluntary social services network" which cannot cope with such massive income maintenance needs, the researchers found.

They said the situation was made even worse by the national economic recession, and cuts in funding to government and social agencies. The rash of closings further pinched state and local governments through lost tax revenues. Voluntary agencies such as United Way faced substantial losses in contributions as area employers closed their doors and their purses.

Without unemployment benefits or government agencies to provide aid, private charitable agencies were overwhelmed, the study showed.

Eggleston and Sink, in their conclusions, were critical of the element of surprise in the U.S. Steel closing. They pointed out that in some other industrial nations "the government requires advance notification of plant closings so there can be planning for emergency assistance. retraining and relocation."

They pointed out that the area's economy is changing from a manufacturing base to one keyed to services, while many of the long-term jobless—with skills learned in heavy industry—"have become unemployable." Birmingham does not have "adequate social machinery" to cope with the type and depth of joblessness it faces, Sink and Eggleston asserted.

Other findings revealed the depth of personal hardship suffered by workers in the region. Many of those surveyed reported that once their employment benefits dried up, they resorted to cuts in spending for food, housing, medical care, clothing and insurance. In many families, wives went to work or children quit school to find jobs.

Further hardships

Workers were forced to sell cars, and many discontinued newspapers or telephone service, making it harder to seek out jobs.

Physical and psychological problems also were on the rise, with many workers reporting disrupted marriages, increased use of alcohol and symptoms of severe stress such as insomnia and anxiety.

"The long-term consequences for the community in terms of physical and mental illness and family disruption are obvious. The income maintenance programs designed for brief periods of unemployment are not designed to prevent the misery of extended unemployment. We will therefore be paying for the consequences for many years," the researchers said.

O'Neal protests plan to cut back funding for arts

The Reagan Administration's plans to slash the federal arts and humanities budgets will do severe damage to the programs they fund if the cuts are implemented, AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal warned.

O'Neal, who is president of the Actors & Artistes, said the Administration's proposals to slash nearly 12 percent from the budget of the National Endowment for the Arts and 10 percent from the National Endowment for the Humanities will cut those agencies to the bone and impact severely on the projects they fund.

"While it is clear that the nation's financial problems require some budget cuts, they should be made in areas where they will not be as damaging as in the arts" or, he stressed, "in programs that provide vital services to needy people and their families."

The White House said the Reagan budget for fiscal year 1986, to go to Congress Feb. 4, will call for a cut in the arts budget from a current $163.7 million to $144.5 million and a slash in the humanities budget from $140 million to $125.4 million.

Annual grants

Federal funding is a vital source of support for the arts. Annually, the arts endowment agency makes some 5,000 grants to large and small opera companies, ballet and theater groups, and a variety of other arts projects.

Humanities funds go toward grants for research and educational projects in literature, history, philosophy and related fields.

Deepest cuts in the arts budget are slated for opera, music and dance programs, and the directors of several companies have said they are worried that the lack of federal grants will also dry up matching contributions from private groups.

Although the Administration has proposed sharply trimmed budgets for the endowments every year since 1981, Congress has rejected the Reagan budget proposals and insisted on appropriating higher amounts for both agencies each time.

Equity award

Paul Robeson Award of Actors' Equity is presented to Lena Horne by Equity President Ellen Burstyn during the union's national membership meeting in New York. The union's annual award went to Horne in recognition of her 45-year career in music, dance, theater and films, and for her "commitment to the struggle for a decent world in which all people can live in dignity and peace."

New Jersey to appeal ruling against 'right-to-know' law

Trenton, N.J. — A federal court ruling that weakened New Jersey's 1983 right-to-know law on hazardous chemicals will be appealed but meanwhile legislation is being drafted to replace portions of the law that the court struck down.

Gov. Thomas H. Kean said the state will appeal the Jan. 3 ruling by U.S. District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise.

"New Jersey has the strongest right-to-know law in the country and we think its citizens have a right to a stronger law than is currently being put forth by the federal government," Kean declared.

The federal "hazard communication" standard covers manufacturing concerns, while the New Jersey law covers all businesses. Judge Debevoise ruled that the federal law pre-empts the state legislation as it relates to manufacturers.

Besides the move to appeal the ruling, legislative action at both the state and federal level are planned. State Sen. Daniel J. Dalton, who sponsored the original 1983 law, said he plans to introduce a new bill that will cover the community aspect of the act.

The New Jersey AFL-CIO, which worked for passage of the 1983 bill, indicated it is working with Dalton on the measure.

At the federal level, Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.) said he would seek to amend the 1970 Occupational Safety & Health Act to prevent federal standards from pre-empting stronger state statutes.

Judge Debevoise's ruling blocks the state from applying its right-to-know provisions to the 14,000 manufacturing plants in the state which employ about a million persons.

Included in the state law is the provision that employers give local fire, police and health departments lists of the hazardous chemicals or substances the firms manufacture, use, store or ship from their plants. State officials hope to enact new legislation covering that provision.

Railway Carmen repel Teamsters raid

Queens, N.Y.—A Teamsters local tried and failed to raid the Long Island Rail Road bargaining unit of the Railway Carmen.

The representation election, conducted by the National Mediation Board, resulted in a 488-252 vote to stay with the Carmen, an AFL-CIO affiliate.

Carmen President C.E. Wheeler said Teamsters Local 808 had campaigned for months to take away the unit, but in the end "we were able to swamp them."

The LIRR workers, represented by Lodge 886 of the Carmen for half a century, didn't "buy the promises" of the Teamster officials, Wheeler said.

Biennial shuffling of committees puts Congress on hold

Congress is in the midst of its biennial reshuffle of committee assignments and probably won't take up before March the budget and tax issues that are expected to dominate this session.

Senate Republicans had hoped to get a jump on the President's Feb. 4 budget message by unveiling before then a more politically realistic compromise, including a smaller military increase than Reagan wants. But Majority Leader Robert Dole (R-Kan.) found it couldn't be done and moved their target date to Feb. 19. That's just after Congress returns from a recess that will let members assess back-home sentiment.

As for the House, Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., promised President Reagan that the Democratic majority will not try to block a vote on whatever budget package the President submits. But he made clear that the procedural assurance was far from a commitment of support.

And if President Reagan wants Congress to freeze or reduce the social security cost-of-living adjustment, he will have to ask for it. O'Neill said, "You can be sure that Democrats are not going to cut social security as a whim of their own."

The House Democratic leadership did agree to give Republicans greater representation on most committees, reflecting their election gains.

The shifts would not be significant for votes that largely follow party lines, but could tilt the balance on some committees where Republicans and conservative Democrats are able to form a majority.

Narrowed majority

As an example, the increasingly influential and sometimes closely divided Energy & Commerce Committee will slip from a 27-15 Democratic majority to a 25-17 edge.

On the Education & Labor Committee, where liberal Democrats and sometimes moderate Republicans have usually had a safe majority, the 22-13 ratio will drop to a 19-13 Democratic majority. The Merchant Marine panel goes from 25-14 to 25-17; Post Office & Civil Service from 15-9 to 13-8, and Public Works from 30-18 to 27-19.

Committees dealing with major spending and tax decisions were less changed. The Appropriations panel went from 36-21 to 35-22, Budget from 20-11 to 20-13, and the most potent panel, Ways & Means, only from 23-12 to 23-13.

Senate Republicans, meanwhile, were considering in caucus a proposed reshuffle to lower the number of major committees on which a senator could serve.

In a whirlwind of activity, volunteer union craftsmen erect the frame of the Los Angeles emergency shelter in one day, and completed it in four days.

Union volunteers build shelter for L.A. homeless

Los Angeles—For union members in this city, just talking about the needs of the homeless was not enough. They opened their toolboxes and did something about the problem.

In a whirlwind of activity that took just under a week, trade unionists proposed, financed, built and stocked a temporary shelter that will bring in at least 200 homeless people off the streets.

It's been a cold, rainy winter in Southern California, and concern for the city's thousands of homeless people prompted Los Angeles County AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. William Robertson to propose the labor-built shelter to Democratic Mayor Thomas Bradely, who enthusiastically agreed.

Robertson contacted Executive Sec. Bud Mathis of the Los Angeles County Building & Construction Trades Council and Sec.-Treas. Paul Miller of the District Council of Carpenters, and they coordinated the recruiting of nearly 200 craftsmen. The union volunteers worked all-out to put up the 9,000-square-foot temporary shelter in less than four days.

The councils estimate that the all-union crews contributed more than $100,000 in labor to the project. All building materials —purchased with the help of a local developer—will also be paid for by the area's unions.

The shelter, in the heart of the city's skid row, was stocked with cots and blankets obtained by local volunteer agencies. Many of the details were ironed out by Jim Wood, an assistant to Robertson who is also chairman of the city's Community Development Agency.

Robertson, who had a stint as a homeless person himself many years ago, said he and Mayor Bradley "really focused in on the problem" of people without shelter when a "tent city" for the destitute was pitched directly across the street from City Hall.

"Any enlightened person was aware of the problem," Robertson said, but the tent city "brought it to the forefront" and prompted him to act.

The shelter is the first built under city auspices since federal officials pointed out last year that Los Angeles leads the nation in the number of homeless residents. Estimates of the homeless range from 30,000 to 50,000 people on the city's streets.

The union-built shelter will be replaced later by a permanent city facility.

Housing trust panel

Survey finds union contract has $100-a-week advantage

Among women generally, those represented by unions averaged $301 and those without a union averaged $218.

The data show the union advantage persisting even in recession-hit and import-battered industries where wages were held down or sometimes even rolled back to enable an employer to stay in business.

Two earlier samplings—in May of 1980 and 1977—showed comparable paycheck advantages of union representation.

The 1980 average of $320 a week for union-represented workers was a $42-a-week advantage. In 1977, the $262 union average was $41 more than for the non-union group.

The union advantage persisted and even grew during a period in which the proportion of wage and salaried workers represented by unions slipped from 26.5 percent in 1977 to 25.7 percent in 1980 and 21.6 percent for 1984.

By industry, construction has the biggest differential. Last year, the union segment averaged $539 a week to $306 for the non-union construction workers. Service occupations had a $384 average under union contracts and $191 without union representation.

Government workers represented by unions had a $404 to $338 advantage and the retail trade comparison was $339 to $225.

The data on the percentage of workers under union contract show a 24.5 percent ratio last year among full-time workers but only 9 percent among part-time employees.

Minority representation

The survey found that 29.5 percent of blacks were represented by unions, including 33.4 percent of black men and 25.7 percent of black women.

Among whites, the 20.7 percent overall representation included 24.9 percent of men and 15.6 percent of women workers.

The Hispanic category listed 22.9 percent union representation, with a 26.2 percent ratio of men and 18.4 percent of women.

Manufacturing sector called key to balancing U.S. trade

The United States must draw up a clear set of national goals that puts the need for a large, diversified manufacturing sector at the top of the list, President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. warned.

In a National Press Club speech before the Japan-American Society of Washington, Samuel said that once this simple proposition is established, "then everything else falls into place."

It is the manufacturing sector that provides most of the nation's productivity improvements, he said, adding that "if we are ever to be able to achieve a better balance in our trading account, we will have to sell goods as well as services."

Samuel said the past 20 years have given ample evidence that the United States is losing the race for its proper share of the world market. The nation's merchandise trade balance has been negative for 12 of the past 14 years, and its share of world trade in manufactured goods has been declining for 20 years.

Deficit doubled

The U.S. trade deficit through the first nine months of 1984 soared to a record $96 billion—double that of the same period a year earlier—and the government estimates that final figures will put the deficit for the full year at more than $130 billion.

The deficit with Japan, the largest with any country, reached $10.4 billion in the third quarter of 1984 after hitting $7.9 billion in the previous three-month period.

The overvalued U.S. dollar has contributed to the trade imbalance, but so have other factors such as the growing tendency of the country's trading partners to use non-tariff barriers to protect their domestic markets from American exports, Samuel observed.

"Japan has clearly indulged in this practice, on a massive scale," he said, "but so have the countries of the European Community and the newly industrialized group.

"Another cause is the increasing practice of industrial targeting, using fair means or foul—measured against GATT standards—by our trading partners. Again, Japan is frequently mentioned as the leading practitioner but it is in fact only one of many."

Samuel recommended reform of U.S. trade laws to take adequate steps against those trading partners whose methods violate GATT standards. GATT—the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade—is the treaty administered in Geneva that sets rules for world trade.

Industrial targeting

Samuel said the U.S. government should be more responsive to industries that are the victims of foreign industrial targeting.

"We should also seek means of stabilizing international trade in a few industries where all the rules have broken down and a multilateral regime is clearly needed," he said, citing steel as an example.

Finally, labor, industry, and government should be brought together in an industrial policy framework, he said.

"I am not looking for more government intervention into the marketplace," he stressed. "We may already have too much. But what we have has been imposed without rhyme or reason . . . and without national purpose."

Jessica Smith elected to new Frontlash post

Jessica Smith has been elected chairman of Frontlash, the labor-supported youth organization, and Joel Klaverkamp has been elected executive director.

Smith, 27, had been executive director of Frontlash since 1979 after having been a campus volunteer for the organization since 1974. She will be the organization's first full-time chairman. Daniel Curtin, an assistant to California AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John Henning, has served as part-time chairman since 1978.

Klaverkamp, 27, has served for the past year as Frontlash's New York director. Earlier, he was director for Minnesota.

Founded in 1968, Frontlash works with labor organizations nationwide on a wide range of projects, including voter registration and labor education.

Employer bias ruled a valid election issue

The National Labor Relations Board upheld a ruling of one of its hearings officers who found no objection to a union's raising the issue of an employer's alleged racial discrimination during a representation election campaign.

But as so frequently happens, the federal labor law's built-in delays mean that the workers involved will have to wait a while for justice to be served.

The employer in the case, the Coca-Cola/Dr. Pepper Bottling Co. of Memphis, Tenn., filed an objection with the board and asked that the decision be set aside. Thus, the case remains pending and the workers, who voted in favor of a union, must wait.

In the May 28, 1982, representation election, employees of the Coca-Cola plant chose the Teamsters Local 1196 by a vote of 203 to 165, with 41 challenged ballots. The company challenged the outcome on several grounds, including charges that the union used references to management running its business like a "plantation" and appealed for racial solidarity. The company also said a substantial number of the 41 challenged votes had been cast by discharged employees. The board subsequently found that 24 had been lawfully discharged and were not eligible to vote.

In a 2-to-1 decision, an NLRB panel held that the union references and appeals for racial solidarity did not taint the fairness of the election, but merely raised the question of unfair treatment—a legitimate issue in an election campaign.

Members Don A. Zimmerman and Patricia Diaz Dennis signed the board opinion, with Member Robert P. Hunter dissenting.

"We agree with the hearing officer," the board majority said, "that the campaign here was not designed to inflame racial hatred or to engender conflict between black and white workers.

"Rather, the comments were obviously designed to express the view that blacks had not been treated fairly by their employer and that they needed to join forces to do something about it."

The union's charge that "the company had kept blacks down for a long time . . . represents nothing more than a view that the black employees had been mistreated in their employment with this employer—a legitimate issue for discussion during a union campaign," the board said.

"References to 'plantation' and 'Martin Luther King' simply put these matters in a historical setting well understood by all, blacks in particular."

couldn't sit down and discuss it like white men, like civilized people."

Fortunately, McKnight said, "my eyes were opened" and he and his father are now in accord.

After the hearing was abruptly shut down, Gov. Evans told union members gathered on the steps of the Capitol that he shares their indignation at the attempt to railroad through a "divisive" bill that denies the concept of majority rule and would be harmful to the state's economic health.

Union members showed up in large numbers before the Senate vote as well and prepared to go back to their home towns to build grass roots pressure for the vote switches needed to sustain the anticipated veto.

Conservatives are bringing counter-pressure on Republican legislators to hold firm. The political reporter for one of Idaho's newspapers wrote in a column of an unnamed Republican senator who said privately that he would like to vote against the anti-union bill. But, he explained to the columnist, revealing at a Republican caucus that he's "less than 100 percent behind 'right-to-work' would be like telling the caucus one is gay."

The bill acted on by the legislature goes beyond that of other "right-to-work" states and imposes both jail and fine penalties for picketing to achieve a union shop or "intimidation" of any worker or member of his household to join or pay dues to a union or to refuse to work with a non-union employee.

AFL-CIO General Counsel Laurence Gold questioned the constitutionality of the legislation and termed it "a blatant effort to override federal law."

Bans legal actions

In a telegram to State AFL-CIO President Kerns, Gold noted that "the National Railway Labor Act specifically permits agreements that this bill would make illegal" and the restrictions on strikes and picketing are not authorized by the National Labor Relations Act.

Meanwhile, the anti-union majority of the legislature is preparing another kick at the state's labor movement.

A bill to repeal the state's prevailing wage law—its "little Davis-Bacon Act"—has cleared a House committee and is expected to move to a vote shortly.

There, too, the governor made a veto stick in a previous legislature and has indicated he will veto any new attempt to repeal the law.

GTE division told to reinstate full seniority benefits

Boston—Seniority benefits giving long-time employees of GTE Products Corp. extended sick leave and personal time off with pay have been restored to them under a ruling by an administrative law judge of the National Labor Relations Board.

The ruling, which resolved a two-year-old unfair labor practice charge by six unions and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., said the benefits had become an integral part of the terms and conditions of employment and thus were a mandatory subject of bargaining.

GTE Products, formerly GTE Sylvania Inc., had unilaterally cut off both extended sick leave—full pay for up to 50 weeks a year—and brief periods of personal time off with pay for employees with 25 or more years of service.

The case goes back to 1982 when, during coordinated bargaining, GTE sought to eliminate the benefits that were enjoyed by members of the company's "Quarter Century Club." In prior years, management had insisted that the club and its operation were outside its bargaining agreement with the six unions.

Unions involved

The unions, representing a total of some 3,000 workers at 10 locations, are the Machinists, Auto Workers, Electrical Workers, Electronics Workers and unaffiliated Teamsters and United Electrical Workers.

After strong resistance by the IUD's GTE Coordinated Bargaining Committee, the company dropped its demand. Negotiations were concluded with a three-year agreement that preserved the club's status.

In December 1982, however, the company notified the unions it had established new administrative guidelines regarding the benefits and planned to put them into effect the following month.

Upholding the unions' unfair practice charge, the NLRB's Judge Robert Wallace ordered immediate restoration of the benefits and retroactive reimbursement to workers who lost pay or benefits as a result of the company's action.

Copper firms slam door on accord

Albuquerque, N.M.—A "shameful exhibition of corporate irresponsibility" forced the breakdown of talks between the Steelworkers and five major copper companies over a new wage and benefit package, USWA Sec. Edgar Ball charged.

Ball, chairing the union's National Non-Ferrous Bargaining Committee, said the 20 local unions engaged in the talks had come to the table ready to make "a good faith effort to demonstrate our deep concern over the plight of the industry and the jobs of our members."

Although current contracts with the copper producers run to June 1986, both sides had agreed to new talks to hammer out cost-cutting measures—including temporary wage cuts—to shore up the depressed copper industry.

A tentative agreement went down the drain when most of the companies refused to agree to a pattern settlement.

The union's members, Ball said, were prepared to show a willingness to make "necessary sacrifices" and work with the companies to find ways to save jobs and ease the financial plight of the industry.

USWA President Lynn Williams, at a meeting of the 140-member bargaining committee that preceded the first talks, said job security was high on the USWA's agenda. Employment in the copper industry has dropped from nearly 40,000 ten years ago to roughly 12,000 today.

Williams also stressed that the union plans to keep up its corporate campaign against Phelps Dodge Corp., whose copper miners and smelter workers have been on strike at facilities in Arizona and Texas since July 1983, and to continue its program of assistance to the strikers.

Tentative package

Ball explained in a statement that the bargaining committee had reached a tentative agreement with ASARCO, Inc., for a temporary concession package that could serve as a pattern for the others. But only Inspiration Resources Corp. agreed to the same terms. Bargaining broke off after Kennecott Corp., Magma Copper Co., and Pinto Valley Copper Corp. refused to accept the pattern and demanded deeper, permanent wage and benefit cutbacks.

The USWA committee voted unanimously to reject the entire ASARCO package, charging that it had been "torpedoed intentionally" by the other companies, Ball said.

Under the plan, the unions would have agreed to temporary wage cuts of $2.50 an hour and temporary suspension of cost-of-living adjustments, as well as other pay and benefit revisions. Wages would have been restored in three increments of 75 cents each by January 1987.

The holdout companies wanted wage cuts of about $6 an hour, $3 of it permanent, and permanent suspension of COLA.

In a separate development, a ruling by the National Labor Relations Board general counsel has brushed aside the USWA's unfair labor practice charges and cleared the way for the counting of ballots in decertification elections a Phelps Dodge facilities in Arizona.

In those contests, the NLRB earlier ruled that only strikebreakers were allowed to vote. As one result, the decertification election at the company's struck facility in El Paso, Tex., led to a vote against the USWA unit there.

The USWA represents the largest number of workers at the Phelps Dodge facilities where a total of 13 unions have been on strike for 18 months.

The programs of aid to the striking workers have been boosted by the strong support of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates.

Williams said contributions to the Copper Relief Fund can be sent in care of the Southern Arizona Central Labor Council, 606 South Plumer, Tucson, Ariz. 85719.

David Silberman joins AFL-CIO's legal staff

David Silberman has joined the AFL-CIO's legal department as associate general counsel of the federation.

Silberman, 34, comes from the Washington firm of Bredhoff & Kaiser, where he had been an attorney since 1977 and partner for the past two years. Earlier, he was a clerk for Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall.

A native of New York, Silberman graduated from Brandeis University and received a law degree at Harvard University.

Eastern Airlines restores full pay to union workers

Miami—Eastern Airlines backed down in the face of union lawsuits, and agreed to discontinue employee pay cuts that were to have expired at the end of 1984, and restore all the wages it has deducted since Jan. 1.

In return, the Machinists, Air Line Pilots and the Transport Workers agreed to expedite talks on the company's request for other concessions so the airline can satisfy its lenders by Jan. 31.

Eastern Chairman Frank Borman said that more concessions were needed for the carrier to stay competitive. While Eastern has registered losses every year since 1979, it rang up profits in the last two quarters of 1984.

A year ago, the three unions agreed to a $380-million package of wage and productivity savings in return for 25 percent of Eastern's stock and an unprecedented voice in management.

When Borman announced last month the carrier had unilaterally extended wage cuts and other concessions, the unions filed lawsuits charging that the airline had violated existing agreements and was bound to honor its commitment to restore the pay cuts Jan. 1.

IAM represents some 12,000 flight dispatchers, mechanics, and related personnel; ALPA represents about 4,000 pilots, and TWU bargains for some 6,500 flight attendants.

The old IAM contract covering mechanics and other ground employees became amendable on Jan. 1 under the Railway Labor Act, but negotiations typically extend several months beyond the end of a bargaining agreement. The IAM agreement covering flight dispatchers expires July 1, while the TWU contract runs out Apr. 1, and the ALPA agreement expires May 31.

Limited exchange

In late 1983, the unions agreed to pay cuts ranging from 18-to-22 percent for one year in exchange for company stock, representation on Eastern's board of directors, and other concessions.

Following the airline's announcement that it would end the pay cuts, IAM agreed to postpone indefinitely its lawsuit against Eastern. The other two unions are weighing their decision.

Charles E. Bryan, president of IAM's District 100, said he was confident that an agreement could be drawn up to provide continuing financial strength for the airline.

But Bryan, who brought IAM's suit this month in U.S. District Court here to prevent the withholding of wages, continues to stress that the way to cut labor costs is through increased productivity, not reduced wages.

In a report to the airline's board, Bryan noted that IAM members accounted for more than $30 million in productivity gains last year.

In harsh language, Bryan, who is one of four labor representatives on the board, accused the company of not adequately reducing the number of supervisors through attrition, and failing to eliminate waste, reorganize management and consolidate its divisions.

As to Eastern's string of annual profits declines, Bryan observed: "We can't go on forever saying that we have the best management team in the industry when we continue to sustain losses."

Sheet Metal union hits work quality of non-union firm

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission should deny an operating license to the Comanche Peak power plant near Dallas until all concerns about shoddy workmanship of a non-union contractor are allayed, Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough said.

In a letter to NRC Executive Director William Dircks, Carlough noted that the agency is already aware of the "serious allegations" against Brown & Root, Inc., a large non-union construction firm that worked on Comanche Peak. NRC "should consider that serious job-site conditions would come to light only through a complete investigation" of the project, Carlough stressed.

He urged the NRC to give "special protective coverage to all employees who may submit testimony concerning these serious allegations." He also asked that officials of the Citizens Association for Sound Energy, a Texas group which has closely monitored the firm's performance record, be allowed to testify at any agency hearing.

Carlough cited performance reports concerning Brown & Root, Inc., made by the NRC's licensing division, the construction appraisal team and Texas Utilities Generating Co., for which the plant is being built.

In December 1983, Carlough asked the NRC to ban the company from further work on any nuclear power projects because of deficiencies in the quality of its work. At that time, the NRC proposed a $40,000 fine against the utility because it had fired an inspector allegedly for reporting flaws in the construction work performed under Brown & Root.

In 1981, Brown & Root was dismissed from a south Texas nuclear power project being constructed for Houston Power & Light.

OSHA denounced for delay on farm sanitation rules

The AFL-CIO attacked the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's foot-dragging on a field sanitation standard, charging that the agency's delays are "inexcusable."

"This is not a complex or scientific issue that OSHA should have to wrestle with—it is a matter of dignity for farm workers," said Margaret Seminario, the federation's job safety director, at a Capitol Hill news conference.

The proposed standard would require agricultural employers to provide workers with sanitation facilities, including portable toilets, and water for drinking and hand-washing.

OSHA has been under court orders for more than a decade to issue a field sanitation standard. The Farm Workers petitioned the agency in 1972 to set a standard and later sued OSHA.

In 1975, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ordered OSHA to develop a standard. But the case was sent back by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia for further consideration.

Court settlement

Another ruling by the District Court in 1978 was again remanded. Finally, in 1982, a settlement was reached under which OSHA would issue its standard by Feb. 16, 1985.

In its most recent periodic report to the court, OSHA contended that personnel changes, "the length and complexity of the record" and "the substantial work necessary to complete development of the standard" would not permit the agency to issue a standard until mid-April.

At the press conference, Seminario said that what OSHA lacks in reality is not the resources but "a commitment to protect these workers. It has had vacancies in its health standards section for a long time and it tells Congress regularly that it is properly staffed."

She said the AFL-CIO will continue to work to make sure OSHA carries out its commitment to farm workers. Also taking part in the news conference were Rep. Matthew Martinez (D-Calif.), who has held a number of meetings with his farm worker constituents, and representatives of the Farm Worker Justice Fund.

U.S. economy registers 6.8% growth for '84

The nation's economy grew 6.8 percent last year as inflation moderated, the Commerce Dept. reported.

Real gross national product in the final quarter of 1984 was up at an annual rate of 3.9 percent. Real GNP is the measure of the total output of goods and services adjusted for inflation.

In a separate report, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W) rose two-tenths of 1 percent in December and for all of 1984 increased 3.5 percent.

Workers' real earnings last month rose eight-tenths of 1 percent, about the same as in November, and were two-tenths of 1 percent above the year-earlier level.

The 6.8-percent growth in GNP over the year compared with 3.7 percent in 1983. As measured on a fourth-quarter to fourth-quarter basis, the 1984 gain was 5.6 percent, compared with 6.3 percent in 1983.

Top performance

It was the best performance for the economy since 1951, and the fourth-quarter growth rate of 3.9 percent was significantly higher than the government's preliminary estimate of 2.8 percent.

Real GNP rose at an annual rate of only 1.6 percent in the third quarter.

The fourth-quarter growth was marked by a large increase in final sales—due to a strong Christmas shopping season—that more than offset a sharp drop in inventory-building by business. This was in contrast to the third quarter, when inventories rose as final sales fell.

In its report on consumer prices, BLS said prices for food and beverages, medical care, and other goods and services each rose three-tenths of 1 percent in December.

Homeownership costs in the CPI-W, which include house prices, mortgage interest rates, property taxes, property insurance, and maintenance and repair costs, rose four-tenths of 1 percent.

In the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U), which uses a rental equivalence approach, shelter costs were also up four-tenths of 1 percent. The overall rise in the CPI-U was the same as that of the increase in the CPI-W, two-tenths of 1 percent.

Automobile prices barely moved in December. New car prices were up 2.3 percent for the year and used car prices rose 7 percent. Medical care costs, up three-tenths of 1 percent last month, were 6.1 percent above the year-earlier level.

Real earnings

BLS's separate report on real earnings showed that, in current dollars, production and nonsupervisory workers in the nonfarm sector averaged $299.34 a week in December. This compared with a weekly average of $296.38 in November.

Adjusted for inflation, and expressed in terms of constant 1977 dollars, however, the December weekly average was $173.83, compared with $172.41 in November.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer seven institutes and workshops during February and March. The schedule:

Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, Feb. 3-8—An institute on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. The exercises are videotaped for self-criticism.

Newswriting & Editing, Feb. 3-8—A workshop for union editors seeking to make their publications more readable, more credible and more useful.

Computers for Local Unions, Feb. 18-22—A briefing on the use of computers for local union officers who need some knowledge before buying equipment.

Labor Law, Feb. 24-Mar. 1—A review of laws affecting staff responsibilities in bargaining, servicing and union administration, including problems arising from bankruptcy and plant closing.

Negotiating Techniques: Private Sector, Mar. 3-8—A skills-sharpening session for experienced negotiators through simulated bargaining exercises in front of a video camera with federal mediators on hand.

Advanced Organizing Techniques, Mar. 11-21—A two-week workshop co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services. Enrollees must be approved by the department.

Advanced Arbitration Techniques, Mar. 17-22—Programs for experienced union representatives focusing on the examination and cross examination of witnesses, preparation of briefs and researching issues.

Unions using the campus during February for their own staff training programs are: Communications Workers, Feb. 3-22; Teachers, Feb. 10-15; Newspaper Guild, Feb. 15-22; Flight Attendants, Feb. 18-22; Operating Engineers, Feb. 24-Mar. 1, Electrical Workers, Feb. 24-Mar. 1.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development has a class of Latin American unionists on campus through Feb. 22.

More information about these and other labor studies is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

Another America

AS JUBILANT and affluent Republicans were pouring into Washington for a round of inaugural parties, the United States Conference of Mayors was winding up its winter meeting on a grimmer note.

As New Orleans Mayor Ernest Morial put it, the nation's "selective" economic recovery has bypassed many of the nation's cities.

Morial, the new president of the Conference of Mayors, said problems of poverty, joblessness, hunger and homelessness are getting worse rather than better.

Cities don't have the resources to meet the growing need for emergency food and housing, he stressed.

Other mayors spoke with dismay of the prospects for new federal cutbacks in social services. "We just can't take any more cuts in our social support system," Louisville Mayor Harvey Sloane said at a workshop session.

This is the harsh reality that Congress must deal with—a reality that the rhetoric of President Reagan's inaugural address ignores.

Mr. Reagan would make the poor more self-reliant by withdrawing the often meager federal programs now available. He would relegate both problems and costly solutions to the states and cities, closer to the people.

If there was any applause for Mr. Reagan's solution to poverty, you can bet it didn't come from the large-city mayors.

They are close to the people.

They know better.

A Life-Support Tax

ALMOST ALONE among the world's developed nations, the United States makes no provision for the health care of its workers and their families.

In recent years, belatedly, we have enacted Medicare for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor among us. But ordinary working Americans have been left to manage on their own.

At one time, as the older among us remember, a shop collection to pay for a co-worker's hospital stay was commonplace. A union might levy an assessment for a death benefit to help a widow pay funeral expenses.

Out of necessity, unions negotiated employer-paid hospital insurance and eventually health care benefits. These and other union-pioneered life-support benefits have increasingly become a standard condition of employment in the United States.

Since Congress has thus far balked at providing comprehensive health insurance as a birthright of all Americans, the private sector role is essential.

IT IS AGAINST this backdrop that the Treasury Dept. proposal to tax the value of so-called fringe benefits provided by employers appears so outrageous and unjust.

It comes with especially poor timing at a point when President Reagan is insistent that taxes not be increased and that deficits be held down by reducing federal expenditures for health care, among other domestic programs.

By no honest definition could such a raid on workers' paychecks be described as "tax simplification."

It proposes a new tax, to be levied on life-support provisions that are provided by employers because the government has chosen to leave the responsibility to the private sector.

At the very least, the private sector should not be penalized for meeting its responsibilities.

Washington Window

Widening U.S. trade gap imperils world economy

By Press Associates, Inc.

The federal budget deficit during the Reagan years has grown into a kind of monster which regularly captures front-page headlines and has come to dominate the political debate over government spending and taxes.

But there's a less publicized deficit which also has been expanding at alarming speed and which could prove to be an even more dangerous monster—the U.S. trade deficit. Since 1980, this widening imbalance between imports and exports has slowed domestic economic growth about 3 percent and has cost the nation more than 2 million jobs, most of them in manufacturing.

When people think of debtor nations, Mexico, Brazil and other Third World countries come to mind. But it appears that the United States soon will become a net debtor for the first time since 1917, mostly because of mounting trade and balance of payment deficits.

If the United States becomes a debtor nation, warned Business Week magazine, it will "further destabilize the already rickety international financial system," of which America has been the mainstay since World War II.

The trade deficit in 1983 reached a record $69 billion, almost double the 1980 level. For 1984, it exceeded $120 billion.

Worse yet

While these figures alone are disturbing, a closer look reveals an even darker picture. In 1983, the United States recorded trade surpluses in only two sectors—agriculture and chemicals, but at much lower levels than in 1980.

For the first time since World War I, the United States has become largely an exporter of cheap raw materials and agricultural commodities and an importer of expensive finished goods.

The reasons for the trade gap go back to the 1970s and include the OPEC oil price hikes, aggressive competition from Europe and Japan, and the widespread transfer of technology and capital by U.S. multinational corporations.

However, it has been the Reagan Administration's fiscal and trade policies that pushed the trade deficit each year to record-breaking heights. First, the record $200-billion federal budget deficits flowing from the Administration's tax giveaways and military spending binge have kept real interest rates at historically high levels.

These high interest rates, in turn, have contributed to an artificially high dollar valued at least 35 percent higher than warranted by normal market conditions. The overvalued dollar has hurt exports by making them more expensive and encouraged imports by making them cheaper.

Interest rates costly

High interest rates also have encouraged massive inflows of foreign capital, making the U.S. economy highly dependent on foreign investors and slowing growth in European and other nations by reducing their pool of investment funds.

Further, high interest rates have raised the already heavy debt burden of developing Third World nations—reducing their ability to buy American products, increasing their need to acquire U.S. dollars by boosting their exports to the United States, and lowering their already poor living standards.

The stability of the U.S. and world economy demands reducing the federal deficit and ending our reliance on foreign funds.

To close the widening and destabilizing trade gap, save American industries and jobs and promote balanced economic growth, organized labor supports a range of measures.

They include reducing the federal deficit and interest rates by closing tax loopholes for corporations and the rich, strengthening and vigorously enforcing U.S. trade laws, repealing tax incentives for companies to move their operations abroad, intervening in currency markets to trim the bloated dollar, and enacting domestic auto content requirements.

vigorous and effective action against apartheid."

Young said the AFL-CIO will not be content with symbolic demonstrations but will continue to provide moral and material assistance to the oppressed black trade unonists as long as the practice of apartheid continues.

Also taking part in the news conference was Federation Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard who pledged the AFL-CIO's "unfaltering support and assistance" for the "aims and aspirations of the South African black trade union movement."

Pollard, a director of the NAACP, said American union members were joining the picket line to protest and deplore the harassment, the violations of workers' rights and human rights, the denials of human dignity, and the systematic attempts by the South African government to destroy the emerging free black trade union movement in that country.

"We call upon all Americans to denounce these reprehensible actions and demand the elimination of the repressive and inhuman system of apartheid and the implementation of majority rule," he said.

"In defiance of world opinion, the current South African regime has run rampant over human rights, workers' rights, and the principles of democracy, justice, and equality.

"Our presence here today expresses our unity with our black brother-and-sister trade unionists and their commitment to equity in South Africa and the rise of a strong black trade union movement."

Barbara Van Blake, director of the Teachers' human and civil rights department, stressed that apartheid has its most devastating effect on women and children, some of them barely surviving. Their men are sent to distant mines or factories and used as virtual slave labor, she said.

Families suffer

"Apartheid denies black women and children the right of family life and support from family. It separates fathers and mothers when they have to work away from their children," she said.

"As long as we fight in the United States for equal rights, women in labor unions cannot stand and watch the destruction of black families in South Africa. Constructive engagement practiced by President Reagan and his Administration reinforces the South African government in destroying black families."

Biller, Young, Pollard and Van Blake were among those arrested, strapped in plastic "flexicuffs," and driven away to police stations where they were charged with violating statutes prohibiting demonstrations within 500 feet of an embassy. None of those arrested was prosecuted.

As the 87 unionists were whisked away, cheers went up from the remaining pickets. Leading the cheers was AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, himself jailed after an earlier labor protest.

Among the 300 picketing men and women were members of the Teachers, Electronics Workers, Service Employees, Graphic Communications Union, Steelworkers, Food & Commercial Workers, Government Employees, Postal Workers, Office & Professional Employees, State, County & Municipal Employees, Machinists and Communications Workers. The demonstration was coordinated by the Washington Metropolitan AFL-CIO.

International Harvester pact regains benefits, raises pay

Chicago—Members of the Auto Workers overwhelmingly approved a new three-year contract with International Harvester Co. that restores many of the concessions the union granted the company in 1982 to stay alive.

The agreement, which ended a two-day strike, covers some 11,000 workers throughout the country.

Three years ago, to help the firm out of its financial difficulties, the workers agreed to a wage freeze, a deferral of three cost-of-living adjustments for 18 months, and a reduction of paid holidays. The concessions saved Harvester an estimated $200 million.

Under the new agreement, workers will receive a substantial wage increase. An initial boost of 31 cents an hour retroactive to last October will go to all workers, who will receive another 2.25-percent hike this October.

In addition, the new contract restores three days of paid personal absence at the worker's choice, adds five additional paid holidays to give workers a total of 44 over the entire agreement, and improves the profit-sharing plan set up in 1982.

It also maintains the old cost-of-living adjustment provision, and calls for payments to be rolled into base pay rates.

Also, the settlement greatly improves job security by committing Harvester to provide a guaranteed level of straight-time wages to UAW members.

The union's Supplemental Unemployment Benefits fund is maintained under the agreement through a $3-million infusion of funds. Worker safety and health protections were significantly expanded, and a provision for labeling hazardous materials is included in the pact.

The parties also agreed to set up a committee to look into ways to reduce the cost of health care without reducing benefits.

The union struck the company on Jan. 18. Negotiations first began last summer and recessed Dec. 30.

The company, which manufactures medium and heavy-duty trucks and diesel engines, has plants in Springfield, Ohio; East Moline, Rock Island and Melrose Park, Ill., and Memphis; parts distribution centers in Kansas City, Kan., Atlanta, Dallas, and St. Paul, Minn. and a design facility in Fort Wayne, Ind.

ITU members to vote on merger pact Mar. 27

Colorado Springs, Colo. — The Typographical Union will conduct a membership referendum Mar. 27 on a proposed merger with the Graphic Communications Union, the ITU executive council reported after it approved the merger document.

ITU President Robert S. McMichen said, "We are one step closer now to realizing a dream of total unity among working people in our industry."

GCIU's general board is expected to approve the merger and set a date for a referendum at its meeting in Annapolis, Md., the week of Feb. 4.

Tax policy tilts burden, benefits

New hope for Dorothy Six

Once the most productive blast furnace at U.S. Steel Corp.'s now idle Duquesne, Pa., works, the facility known as Dorothy Six was slated by the company for demolition. But a study commissioned by the Steelworkers shows that Dorothy can be revitalized and operated competitively, holding out new hope to save thousands of jobs in the Monongahela Valley. ## Shifts impose heavier load on paychecks

By Susan Dunlop

The tax burden on lower income families has gone up over the last 20 years while the share carried by the richest families has dropped substantially, a new study reports.

The study, Who Paid the Taxes, 1966-85, by Joseph A. Pechman, also found that there has been a dramatic shift in the tax burden loaded onto labor income—wages—and away from capital income such as investment income, interest and dividends, over the period.

Pechman is an economist and a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, the Washington-based research organization that published his findings. He is considered one of the country's leading tax experts.

He concluded that the shift in the tax load to lower-income families is mainly a result of increases in payroll taxes and reductions in corporation income taxes and property taxes over the period. The individual and corporation federal income tax cuts passed in 1981 speeded up the downward shift of the tax burden, he pointed out.

Pechman's calculations were based on a range of assumptions that took into account many different methods of calculating the effect on income of different kinds of taxes—federal, state and local, corporate and property.

Taxing load

The study showed that regardless of which assumptions were used, the trend toward a heavier tax burden on lower-income families held up.

Pechman's research also showed that the before-tax distribution of income among various groups has stayed about the same over the last 20 years, largely because of the nation's progressive system of federal transfer payments, such as social security and aid to poor families.

After taxes are taken into account, Pechman said, "the decline in the progressivity of the tax system" has led to a more unequal distribution of income now than two decades ago.

The situation would have been worse without the transfer payment system since it helped offset an increase in effective tax rates for lower-income groups brought on by the increase in payroll taxes and drop in the corporate tax rates, the data showed.

Incentives fail to encourage investments

By David L. Perlman . .

Reagan Administration "tax incentives" have rewarded companies that have done the least to expand and modernize while adding billions of dollars to the federal deficit.

The chief beneficiaries were stockholders who pocketed increased dividends made possible by tax advantages that were supposed to encourage investment in new plants and equipment.

That's the startling conclusion of a study of 238 major U.S. corporations by Citizens for Tax Justice. The study covers a three-year period after enactment of the package of business tax cuts that plunged the corporate share of federal tax revenues to a low of 6.2 percent by 1983.

Key funding

Here are some of the findings of the study that was based largely on reports companies made to their own stockholders:

- The 50 corporations with the lowest tax rates—presumably the chief beneficiaries of the range of tax loopholes—actually reduced their new investment by 21.6 percent between 1981 and 1983.
- The 50 corporations that paid the highest tax rates—averaging above 33 percent—were the ones that increased their investment during this period.
- But it was the low-tax companies that stepped up their dividend payouts to stockholders the most. They increased their dividends at a pace more than 30 percent greater than the high-tax and high-investment firms.
- Overall, the 238 companies covered by the study enjoyed close to $90 billion in tax incentives over the three-year period, while reducing new investment by 15.5 percent and raising dividends by 17 percent.
- The five companies that enjoyed the largest tax subsidies over the 1981-83 period each cut investment and increased dividends. The companies were General Electric, Boeing, Dow Chemical, Tenneco and Santa Fe Southern Pacific. Together, they reduced investment by 29.8 percent, paid no federal income taxes, and received tax rebates of $1.1 billion on top of their $13.1 billion in domestic profits.

The authors of the study, Robert S. McIntyre and Dean C. Tipps, termed massive tax avoidance by corporations "an affront

Trade deficit ravaging industrial jobs, output

By James M. Shevis

The Reagan Administration's unwillingness to rein in the nation's soaring trade deficit is costing workers and communities jobs, income and industrial production, the AFL-CIO warned.

The 1984 deficit reached a record $123.3 billion, far exceeding the previous record of $69.4 billion in 1983, and it could go higher this year, the Commerce Dept. reported.

"In a very real way, these deficits describe a situation where the American economy is living off the production of other countries," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald observed.

"By permitting their growth, we are mortgaging the future economic well-being of the American people. The short-term costs of these deficits are equally severe.

"Millions of jobs, particularly in manufacturing, have been lost or not created because of these unbalanced trade flows."

Analysts blame the overvalued U.S. dollar for much of the imbalance. Since 1980, the value of the dollar has risen by 41 percent against other major currencies, making foreign goods cheaper in this country and American wares more expensive and thus more difficult to sell abroad.

American exports last year increased a modest 8.7 percent, but imports shot up 26.4 percent. For manufacturing, the deterioration of the U.S. position was even more dramatic.

The United States recorded a manufacturing trade deficit of almost $89 billion in

Conrail unions back Alleghany's bid

The nation's railway unions threw their support behind Alleghany Corp.'s proposal to buy Conrail, the government-controlled Consolidated Rail Corp.

The decision to support the $1.2-million bid by Alleghany, a New York holding company, was announced following a meeting of the Railway Labor Executives' Association. The RLEA is made up of 19 unions representing Conrail's 35,000 unionized employees.

Conrail is a quasi-government corporation that runs a 15-state, 15,000-mile freight line. It was formed in 1976 when the government took over the operations of several bankrupt northeastern railroads. The government owns 85 percent of Conrail and its employees own 15 percent.

RLEA Chairman Ole M. Berge, who is president of the Maintenance of Way Employes, announced at a Capitol Hill news conference that "railway labor is unanimous" in its endorsement of Alleghany, a company which has a long history of railroad involvement.

AFL-CIO Vice President Richard I. Kilroy, who is president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, said the unions arrived at their unanimous decision to back the Allegheny bid as "the only one we could all agree on."

Earlier, BRAC had supported a proposal made by Conrail management to offer the railroad's stock for public sale.

In addition to $1.2 million in cash for the freight line, Alleghany has offered to restore Conrail's employees to full industry wages. They are currently working for 12 percent less than the full rates as part of an agreement with the carrier to help it out of financial difficulties.

Alleghany also offered Conrail employees 35-percent ownership of Alleghany Corp., three seats on the Conrail board, and one seat on the Alleghany board.

Other finalists in the bidding are Norfolk Southern Corp. and an investment

Mon Valley gains new hope for its steel industry

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers welcomed the results of a study that points out how one of this region's key steelmaking facilities can be saved from the wrecking ball by enlightened cooperation between labor, management and the community. The findings hold out new hope that thousands of jobs in steel and related industries in Pennsylvania's Monongahela Valley can be saved.

The feasibility study was commissioned by the USWA and released Jan. 28. It found that U.S. Steel's Dorothy Six blast furnace at its Duquesne Works not only could be revitalized, but also streamlined to become a primary supplier of semi-finished steel products capable of overcoming competition from imports. It all can be done, the study found, without cutting workers' wages or benefits.

The union commissioned the study by Locker/Albrecht Associates, Inc., in late 1984 after U.S. Steel announced it was shutting down most of the "hot end" of its Duquesne Works and scheduling Dorothy Six—the largest blast furnace in the Mon Valley—for demolition.

A closer look

The union won a reprieve to Feb. 2, and U.S. Steel Chairman David Roderick now says the company will hold off its plans to destroy the blast furnace while taking a closer look at the study's findings.

Part of the cost of the feasibility study by the New York-based consulting firm was paid by the City of Pittsburgh and by Allegheny County.

USWA President Lynn Williams said at a press conference the preliminary results confirm the union's belief that Dorothy Six and other facilities can be saved.

"Although the study most directly affects the people of the Mon Valley and U.S. Steel," Williams said, "its results can have a profound effect on the entire industry, its customers and suppliers and for America's workers."

If Dorothy Six is destroyed, he said, as many as a million tons of semi-finished steel that could have been made there will be replaced by imports, and thousands of jobs will be permanently lost.

Time, money, hard work

Williams said the revitalization of the facility would take "time and money and hard work" from all parties concerned, "the union, the company, the employees and the community. But it can and must be done."

The USWA has said it will go to court if necessary to block destruction of the works.

The union has asked the company to extend its deadline for demolition of Dorothy Six for a minimum of six months. Williams challenged U.S. Steel "to join the USWA in fighting imports with American workers' sense of skill and competitiveness."

"The Steelworkers have done their share and then some," Williams told reporters, pointing to conclusions in the study that Dorothy Six could again be made a going concern without wage cuts.

The union has also been cooperating in efforts to save the blast furnace—and steelmaking throughout the once-humming Mon Valley—with the Tri-State Conference on Steel. The group was launched in 1979 as a coalition of labor, church and community groups and local, state and national elected officials determined to fight the steady stream of plant closings—and the rising tide of unemployment—in the Mon Valley, the heart of the nation's steel industry.

In addition to its participation in the effort to save the Duquesne Works and other facilities, the group has called for the establishment of a "Steel Valley Authority" that could function as a broker to sell off unused facilities to other investors.

Another approach that could be called into play by local authorities is the principle of "eminent domain" that would let local governments acquire the threatened steel mills in return for "just compensation."

Williams pointed out that among the "most viable" options for revitalizing the Duquesne Works examined in the study are those "based on a significant ownership stake by the employees." He stressed that the workers "have a willingness to consider discussing employee ownership and involvement in any new enterprise."

Company profits

At a separate news conference, U.S. Steel's Roderick announced that the company had posted earnings of $493 million in 1984 compared to a loss of $1.16 billion in 1983. The company's fourth-quarter profits last year were $29 million.

The closing of the Duquesne Works, where 2,000 workers were laid off, was one of a long list of shutdowns announced by the company in 1984 in what it billed as an effort to "streamline" its operations. Thousands of jobs were lost, and the Mon Valley was among the hardest hit areas.

The Tri-State Steel Conference estimates that in Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia 70,000 of the 90,000 workers who held jobs in the recession and import-battered basic steel industry in 1979 are now unemployed. At least 20,000 of those are jobless Mon Valley workers.

But a major conclusion of the feasibility study suggests that the Duquesne Works can be revved up to compete efficiently with foreign steel for a growing U.S. market for semi-finished steel products.

Upgrading possible

To compete, the study stressed, the United States must have efficient facilities. And the findings indicate Duquesne can be improved by such measures as the construction of a continuous caster for a fraction of the price tag of brand-new facility elsewhere.

The facility would have to reduce operating costs to be competitive, but those economies can all be achieved in "non-wage related areas," the study said. Although some staffing reductions would be necessary, as many as 600 jobs could be created.

The study also warned that if Dorothy Six and the "hot end" Duquesne Works are demolished, the damage to steelmaking in the Mon Valley and the eastern United States could be "irreversible." But if the furnace is successfully revived, it could be economically beneficial to the company in its operations throughout the region.

The study praised the workforce at Duquesne as "exceptionally skilled and highly motivated." Combined with "enlightened and innovative management," the report said, the works have the potential to be a going concern.

group led by Washington hotel executive J. W. Marriott, Jr.

Conrail management, led by Board Chairman L. Stanley Crane, had hoped to get support from labor for his proposal of a public stock offering.

Transportation Sec. Elizabeth Dole, who had been awaiting labor's preference in the sale, depicted labor's choice of Alleghany as a victory for a private sale over the rival public offering proposal.

Sec. Dole to act

The unions "clearly endorsed a private sale," she said, adding she "will take their recommendation into consideration." She is expected to announce her own choice and recommend it to Congress soon, possibly by the end of this week.

Kilroy pointed out that the railroad unions "would fight in Congress," however, if Sec. Dole's choice among the bidders is unacceptable.

Alleghany at one time was involved with the now-defunct Penn Central Railroad.

Alleghany President John J. Burns said, "We're happy with the news and are pleased with the support of labor."

Current law specifies that Conrail employees are to receive 15 percent of the carrier's stock by 1991 under an employee stock option plan. Thus the sale actually is for only 85 percent of the railroad.

Labor's preference came after a seven-hour meeting in which a five-member task force set up by RLEA to evaluate the prospective bids made its report.

The 19 unions belonging to the RLEA are the Train Dispatchers, Maintenance of Way Employes, Signalmen, Carmen, Railway & Airline Clerks, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Machinists, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Longshoremen, Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, Yardmasters, Sheet Metal Workers, Seafarers, United Transportation Union, Transport Workers, Masters, Mates & Pilots, the American Railway & Airways Supervisors Association, a division of BRAC, and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Suit by Service Employees charges asbestos 'coverup'

The Service Employees accused the Environmental Protection Agency of continuing a historic pattern of "covering up" asbestos dangers and filed a federal court suit to force the agency to strengthen its asbestos-in-the-schools program and extend it to all public and private buildings.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney said upon filing the suit, "Scientists, medical experts, asbestos manufacturers and the government have known for 50 years that asbestos is a highly dangerous carcinogen and for all those years there has been an effective coverup of the truth."

"EPA officials know their program isn't working and they know the risk to school children and school workers is much greater than originally estimated," he said. "Yet the agency has made a political decision to hide the facts and continue the asbestos coverup."

Sweeney backed up his charges with internal EPA memoranda showing concern that the agency's current asbestos program may be increasing the risks to children and workers in the schools because of a lack of guidelines and performance standards.

At present, EPA requires only that schools inspect for friable (flaking) asbestos and report the results of those inspections to parents, teachers and school employees. There are no abatement requirements and no regulations on how local school systems should proceed with abatement.

The lawsuit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, follows from EPA's denial in November 1984 of an emergency petition by SEIU for stronger performance standards for abatement, including standards for protecting workers involved in the abatement activities.

Federal action needed

Sweeney scored the Reagan Administration's belief that there should be no federal regulation on asbestos abatement. He said, "Our union believes the federal government has a constitutional as well as a congressional mandate to provide federal regulation and enforcement when confronted with a problem of this magnitude."

The lawsuit noted that the EPA is hailing the success of its program even though its own survey found in 1980 that three million students were being exposed to friable asbestos in some 14,000 schools. Its latest survey estimates that asbestos is a problem in more than 30,000 schools and "this means 15 to 16 million kids as well as up to a million teachers and school workers are potentially being exposed," the union said.

The SEIU represents some 85,000 school, custodial and maintenance workers.

CWA asks low-income phone rates

The Communications Workers and a coalition of consumer, senior citizen, religious and public interest groups are pressing for legislation to assure basic telephone service for low-income households.

Legislation introduced in the new Congress by Rep. Mickey Leland (D-Tex.) with 17 cosponsors would set up a fund to help meet the cost of "lifeline" local phone service for the elderly, poor and jobless. It would be financed by a small surcharge on interstate long-distance telephone service.

At a news conference on the introduction of the bill, CWA Legislative Rep. Leslie Loble said the combination of divestiture and deregulation of the telephone industry has profited large business users but penalized "virtually everyone else."

The CWA statement stressed that "telephone service can be a life-and-death matter," as the union's members who handle emergency calls daily can testify.

While divestiture can't be undone, universal service can be maintained through action by Congress, the states and the FCC, the union statement urged.

At the Capitol Hill news conference, participants cited a recent study showing that some 750,000 households have been forced to give up telephone service since divestiture of the Bell System and AT&T sent local phone bills skyrocketing.

Voluntary restraints

Kirkland asks renewal of auto import curbs

American labor expressed sharp criticism to both the Reagan Administration and the Japanese government over proposals to end a four-year Voluntary Restraint Agreement (VRA) on Japanese auto imports, warning of the high cost in American jobs if the quotas are lifted.

"Should the VRA not be continued, the bilateral trade deficit with Japan is certain to become even worse," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed in a letter to Sec. of State George P. Shultz.

With its current bilateral trade deficit with Japan at about $37 billion, Kirkland warned, "our nation faces a problem that is getting worse rather than better." He acknowledged the complexities involved in the issue, but pointed out that as the trade deficit escalates, "so does the friction between the United States and Japan."

In 1984, well over half the $37 billion deficit with Japan was attributable to auto imports.

On a recent visit to Washington, leaders of Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic Party told Reagan Administration officials there would be no surge in exports if the quotas are removed.

But Auto Workers President Owen Bieber challenged those statements.

Incredulous remarks

In a letter to Susumu Nikaido, LDP Vice Chairman who headed the Japanese delegation, Bieber said the UAW is "incredulous" over his remarks in Washington that Japan's manufacturing capacity limits exports to the United States to 2.5 million cars. Even at that, 2.5 million is 650,000 more than the limit in the VRA that has been in effect for four years.

"An increase to 2.5 million would result in more than a $25-billion bilateral auto deficit with Japan for our country," Bieber wrote Nikaido.

"It would contribute to an overall trade deficit costing America hundreds of thousands of jobs. There is absolutely no way this trade imbalance that causes such dislocation here can be tolerated."

Kirkland, in Tokyo for the 16th annual meeting of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei), asked Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone to continue the auto export restraints.

In his letter to Shultz, Kirkland said lifting the VRA "can be expected to result in . . . an imbalance that probably would exceed hoped-for gains resulting from the open market initiative you will be seeking." Shultz is embarked on an effort to win greater access to certain Japanese markets.

Kirkland said that allowing the U.S. auto deficit with Japan to climb above the 1984 level of $19 billion is "unacceptable." He said allowing the VRA restraints to expire on Mar. 31 as scheduled would permit a flood of imports" that will cost the jobs of about 200,000 workers in auto and related industries in the first two years."

More jobs lost

Japan's market share would soon rise to 40 percent or more "and even more American jobs would be lost," Kirkland predicted.

Nikaido was quoted as saying that if auto exports to the United States jumped too high upon removal of the VRA, the Japanese government would intervene. But Kirkland scoffed at this. He wrote Shultz:

"It is doubtful that the Japanese government could enforce restraints on its competitive auto industry without the U.S. government instructing them . . . on what level of car imports would be acceptable.

"In addition, the lack of a VRA could open up the possibility of antitrust suits being brought by U.S. import dealers or others."

Bieber, contradicting the view of the visiting Japanese, said in his letter to Nikaido that Japan's auto industry has the capacity to produce an additional 2 million cars a year or more.

"Any suggestion that the Japanese automakers would be unable to exceed 2.5 million is totally unfounded," he said. "With virtually every other auto-producing nation in the world limiting Japan's access to their market, the United States would become the dumping ground for that excess capacity."

No permanent barriers

Bieber reiterated the position he expressed last April in a visit with Nakasone in Tokyo that the UAW does not want to see permanent barriers erected that would be harmful to the two countries, a concern that Kirkland also expressed in his letter to Shultz.

But, he said, there are three factors that must be addressed successfully before restraints can be lifted on the import quotas.

- The dollar and the yen must return to some semblance of balance. With the exchange now at 255 yen to the dollar, up from about 200 when Reagan took office, Japan enjoys a $1,500 cost advantage on a $6,000 car here.
- Action is needed to redress the current imbalance caused by Japan's lifting of its commodity tax on exported vehicles.
- Continuation of the VRA should be on a multi-year basis, rather than the current annual basis, until Japanese automakers achieve sufficient investment in the United States.

Conventions

The Woodworkers 1985 convention will be in Portland, Ore., Apr. 20-26.

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers convention will be in Denver Aug. 19-23.

The Police Associations convention has been rescheduled to July 22-24 in Tacoma, Wash. It was previously scheduled for July 15-17.

The Arkansas State AFL-CIO convention will be June 3-5 in Hot Springs.

AFL-CIO representatives meet in Tokyo with the leadership of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei) for an exchange of views. President Lane Kirkland, his executive assistant Kenneth Young, right, and International Affairs Director Irving Brown represented the federation.

Shanker presses upgrading of teaching standards, pay

Higher teacher standards and higher teacher pay will mean a better education for the nation's children, American Federation of Teachers President Albert Shanker said.

Shanker's speech to the National Press Club urged a professionally rigorous national examination for licensing new teachers—comparable to the tests now in effect for the right to practice medicine or law.

Most current teacher examinations test only minimal competency, and that isn't enough, he stressed. Teachers have to be "smarter than students."

New teachers should be tested on the subject matter they will be teaching as well as their knowledge of teaching methods, the AFT president urged. He proposed an internship of one to three years for beginning teachers since "practice and performance is as important as intellectual knowledge."

The higher standards that would be required would need and justify fully professional salary levels, Shanker said. The relatively low salaries for teachers constitute the biggest barrier to upgrading standards, he suggested.

Shanker urged a single national passing score for teacher certification, with standards set by a board of education experts.

Teachers are entitled to the pay standards accorded professionals in other fields, Shanker said. And parents and children are entitled to the high standards that should go with professionalism.

If nothing is done, he warned, low pay will bring about a teacher shortage that many states will meet simply by hiring less qualified teachers.

Economic indicators flash new warnings of slowdown

The index the government uses to predict the course of the economy in the months ahead set off flashing alarms as it posted its fifth decline in seven months.

Its clear warning was that the economic slowdown that has dulled the recovery since mid-1984 is still troublesome.

Some analyists had hailed November's reported rise of 1.3 percent in the index of economic indicators as evidence that the economy was back in an up cycle and had predicted a further healthy increase in December.

Instead, the December index showed a decline of two-tenths of 1 percent and the Commerce Dept. revised its November figures sharply downward to show an increase of six-tenths of 1 percent, less than half the original projection. That left the index as of December just barely above the same month a year earlier. The strong gains in the first half of 1984 were largely wiped out by summer's steep decline.

Some of the signals were mixed.

Orders to factories for durable goods fell 2.1 percent in December, the third decline in four months. But they ended the year with a 14.9-percent gain, reflecting two successive years of strong recovery from recession.

Business productivity for 1984 increased 3.1 percent, considered a good showing despite the slip from 3.5 percent in 1983. But it rose at a rate of only 1.7 percent in the fourth quarter of the year.

Machine tool orders, which reflect manufacturing modernization and expansion, are up from the previous year but have been on a relative plateau for the past nine months. But an increasing percentage of machine tools ordered by U.S. companies are imported, reflecting the overvaluation of the dollar which makes U.S. goods more costly to foreign buyers and imports cheaper for American purchasers.

A private sector forecaster, F. W. Dodge Co., reported that new construction contracts decreased 6 percent in December on a seasonally adjusted basis. But the 1984 totals were up 8 percent from the previous year.

Over the year, the total compensation cost of wages, salaries and benefits rose by 5.2 percent, down from 5.7 percent in 1983 and 6.6 percent in 1982, according to Bureau of Labor Statistics reports.

There were significant differences within that statistic, however. The employment cost index for private-sector workers rose 4.9 percent over the year while state and local government employment showed a 7.1 percent increase. School system increases paced that category.

Trade deficit ravages jobs, communities

1984, more than double the 1983 level. As recently as 1980, the nation showed a surplus of more than $12 billion in this important sector of the economy.

In 1984, imports of clothing shot up by 22 percent, machine tools 29 percent and iron and steel mill products 61 percent. Similar large increases were posted for electrical machinery, telecommunications equipment, transportation equipment, and a whole range of goods essential to the economy.

The nation's trade deficit with Japan alone was $37 billion, $11 billion with Taiwan, and $13 billion with members of the European Economic Community.

It has been estimated that for each $1 billion in trading deficit some 25,000 U.S. jobs are lost.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber has warned that the flood of imports from Japan "will quickly become a tidal wave" if the Administration allows the Voluntary Restraint Agreement (VRA) on Japanese automobile imports to lapse after March.

"The trade deficit — particularly with Japan — is already a national disaster," he declared. "With more than half of the $36.8 billion (deficit with Japan) attributable to the auto sector, it is difficult to imagine that the Administration would let the VRA lapse, permitting last year's figure to soar by an additional $5 billion or more."

Footwear impact

The domestic footwear industry, also hard-hit by imports, noted that foreign-made shoes captured 72 percent of the U.S. market last year.

"Almost three-fourths of the shoes sold in this country were made somewhere else," the Footwear Industries of America said. "Yet our own factories shut down at the rate of one every four days last year, and almost 11,000 workers lost their jobs.

Oswald noted that the value of the dollar has risen by more than 70 percent against the currencies of U.S. major trading partners since July 1980. The effect, he said, "is no different than a 70-percent tax on U.S. exports and a 70-percent price advantage for imported goods."

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldridge estimated that "resumed growth in the economy and the continuing impact of the dollar's rise during 1984 indicate higher imports in the months to come and another record trade deficit for 1985."

There was a slight narrowing of the trade gap in the fourth quarter of 1984, the Commerce Dept. reported, as the annual rate of the deficit eased to $109 billion from $146 billion in the preceding quarter.

Prime architectural design

Machinists Placid Harbor Education Center in Hollywood, Md., won the American Institute of Architects honor award at the AIA Virginia Society's annual convention. The design was selected from among 86 entries. The contemporary three-level building overlooking the Patuxent River was praised for its "interpretation of a southern plantation-style architecture." The designs are judged on usefulness, lasting qualities and aesthetics.

NLRB policy switch limits union access to workplace

President Reagan's National Labor Relations Board has raised another barrier to the exercise of workers' rights under federal law by imposing new limits on a union's ability to gather information within the workplace.

The board ruled for the first time that a union's duty to represent its members must be weighed against an employer's property rights in determining whether to grant access to the workplace. The decision also overruled previous cases where the union's request for access was held to be equivalent to a request for information and granted.

The NLRB's decision involved Electrical Workers Local 455's unfair practice charge against Holyoke (Mass.) Water Power Co. for denying a union hygienist access to a fan room at the company's Mt. Tom power station to measure noise levels.

Board Chairman Donald Dotson and Members Robert P. Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis agreed with the company's contention "that an employer's right to control its property is a factor that must be weighed in analyzing whether an outside union representative should be afforded access to an employer's property."

Unfair practice

In January 1983, Local 455 asked that its industrial hygienist be given access to the fan room. The company denied the request, instead giving the union general information on noise levels in the plant. After the union filed its unfair practice charge with the NLRB, Holyoke Water Power Co. provided it with the results of noise level tests conducted by a company supervisor.

NLRB Administrative Law Judge Martin J. Linsky held that the company's refusal to grant access to the union amounted to an illegal refusal to bargain. He rejected the company's contention that access to the plant was not relevant to the union's duty to represent its members. Linsky noted that health and safety conditions are terms and conditions of employment and, therefore, "the employer is obligated to bargain upon request."

The board rejected Linsky's analysis that the union is entitled to access if it is shown that the information sought is relevant to the union's representation duties.

Conflicting rights

"We disagree that that alone obligates an employer to open its doors. Rather each of two conflicting rights must be accommodated," the board said.

In making that determination, the NLRB kicked open the door for every union access case to be contested through to a full board ruling.

"Where it is found that a union can effectively represent employees through some alternate means other than by entering on the employer's premises, the employer's property rights will predominate and the union may properly be denied access," the board ruled.

It added that "the circumstances presented in each case involving a request for access must be carefully weighed, and each of the conflicting rights must be carefully balanced and accommodated in reaching a decision." The board said it will analyze all future cases "in this fashion," and added it was overruling "those prior board cases . . . to the extent that they set forth an inconsistent analysis."

Access granted

In the Holyoke case, the NLRB decided that Local 455's request for access should be granted. It rejected the company's contentions that allowing the union hygienist on its property would interrupt production and that it had given the union enough information on fan room noise levels.

The board noted that the fan room, which the company agreed was noisy, "is not a production area and no employees work there full time." Mechanics and maintenance personnel are required periodically to work in the fan room.

The NLRB also held that the noise level tests conducted by a supervisor who was not an industrial hygienist did not provide the union with the type of information it was seeking.

In permitting access to the fan room, the NLRB modified the law judge's order to provide that "access be for a reasonable period sufficient to allow the union hygienist to fully observe and survey noise level hazards." The board rejected the union's appeal that the ALJ's decision be modified to allow plantwide access.

Pilots win order for arbitration of Continental claims

Houston—The owner of Continental Airlines has been ordered by the U.S. District Court here to accept arbitration of damage claims filed by the Air Line Pilots following the carrier's 1983 bankruptcy and its abrogation of the union's contract.

In its decision, the court ruled against Texas Air Corp. (TAC), Continental's owner, which had tried to have the issue settled in bankruptcy court. TAC had vigorously opposed arbitration of the millions of dollars in damage claims.

In August 1982, the ALPA signed a labor contract that gave Continental major cost concessions. In return, TAC—the parent corporation—agreed that it and all its subsidiaries, including Continental, would observe all terms of the contract for the life of the agreement. Any disputes were to go to a neutral arbitrator.

When Continental filed for bankruptcy and rejected the pilots' contract, TAC became liable by refusing to arbitrate.

In its Jan. 23 decision, the federal court held that the bankruptcy court has no jurisdiction over the case, and ordered that the dispute be arbitrated.

In a separate action, the public debt committee of Texas International Airlines, Inc., composed of holders of notes and debentures now in default as part of the Continental bankruptcy, filed suit Jan. 24 in the Houston Bankruptcy Court against TAC, Jet Capital Corp., Frank Lorenzo and Robert Carney, all involved in the corporation.

The suit leveled charges of insider trading, breach of fiduciary responsibility, breach of covenants, defrauding creditors, and other financial double-dealings.

Average wage gain lower in '84 contracts

Major collective bargaining contracts negotiated during 1984 yielded increases averaging 2.4 percent in the first year of the agreements and 2.3 percent annually over the life of the pacts, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Just over three-fourths of the workers covered by the settlements had wage gains averaging 3.8 percent in the first contract year, nearly 20 percent had no wage change, and the remainder took pay cuts.

"Developments that were noted in 1982 and 1983 persisted through 1984, and helped dampen specified wage adjustments during the year," BLS said in reporting trends in 539 contracts covering some 2.3 million workers last year. The agreements are for workers in bargaining units with at least 1,000 members.

The pattern of restraint began in 1982, when the Reagan recession led to concession bargaining in key sectors of the economy. Narrow construction wage gains helped to hold down last year's averages.

While the 5 percent of all employees who received decreases under last year's contracts held down the average gains, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald noted that "the typical worker—three out of four—still netted an average increase that was above the average price increase" for the year.

As measured by the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (CPI-W), prices rose an average 3.5 percent in 1984.

Industry problems

"What the report shows is that there are still serious problems in particular industries and that's where the cutbacks occurred," Oswald said.

First-year increases negotiated last year compared with first-year gains of 2.6 percent in 1983 and 3.8 percent in 1982. The average annual increase of 2.3 percent over the life of the pacts compared with 2.8 percent in 1983 and 3.6 percent in 1982.

A separate BLS measure showed that in key contracts—those covering at least 5,000 workers—total compensation, or wages and fringe benefits combined, rose by an average of 3.6 percent in the first contract year, compared with 3.4 percent in 1983. Over the life of the contracts, the average increase was 2.8 percent annually compared with 3 percent in 1983.

In its report on gains under contracts covering 1,000 or more workers, BLS noted that wage increases in 1984 construction settlements averaged five-tenths of 1 percent in the first contract year and 1 percent a year over the life of the agreements.

The bureau noted that lump-sum payments went to about 700,000 workers in 37 contracts settled last year. Lump-sum payments do not affect future paychecks and are excluded from all wage and benefit measures in the BLS series.

Job security viewed as major issue

Job security has emerged as the key issue for a large segment of American workers in the aftermath of the Reagan recession, a survey by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. shows.

In an analysis of 100 major union contracts covering a wide range of industries, the IUD found that 75 percent of the 1984 agreements contained some provision to strengthen worker protection for technological change, work transfer or plant closings.

Seventy percent of the surveyed contracts contained limits on subcontracting and over half called for severance pay, with increased emphasis on provisions such as workers' rights to in-plant transfers as a response to layoffs and shutdowns.

The survey, carried out by IUD's research department, is the ninth in a series of biennial studies of contracts in major U.S. industries. The analysis examined firms in 37 industries, ranging from apparel and textiles to transportation, mining and building maintenance.

In the last such survey, cost-of-living protection emerged as the top issue.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel told a news conference the study reflects agreements negotiated during a period in which unions were perceived to have lost ground in contract bargaining, but actually held their own and posted increases in many non-monetary benefits.

Workers' interests

"There is no question that American industry has problems," Samuel told a press conference, "and there is no question that we are willing to work with management to keep American industry alive. But we have a primary obligation to represent the best interests of our members, and this study shows that we have, in fact, been successful in doing so."

IUD is made up of 55 affiliated unions, representing more than 5.5 million members. The surveyed agreements for the most part were in the industrial sector and negotiated by IUD affiliates. They were largely concluded in 1984. In each case, the contracts were selected because they have tended to be bellwether agreements within their respective industries.

The survey includes a new section on occupational health and safety, reflecting increased attention to this area of bargaining in the recent past.

IUD Research Director Richard Prosten noted that 84 percent of the surveyed contracts contained language on health and safety matters.

Other findings of the survey showed that union security remains a high priority for union bargainers. The 1984 analysis showed a slight increase in union shops, up to 63 percent of the total from 61 percent in the last two surveys.

A Keyhole View: The Press and the Campaign

By Murray Seeger

In Cleveland, where I learned the most about being a reporter, we called it the "up-one-side-of-the-mountain-down-the-other-school-of-journalism." The reporters who engaged in this art form had to be equipped with exceedingly short memories, lack of historical perspective and iron constitutions which enabled them to contradict themselves within a few weeks.

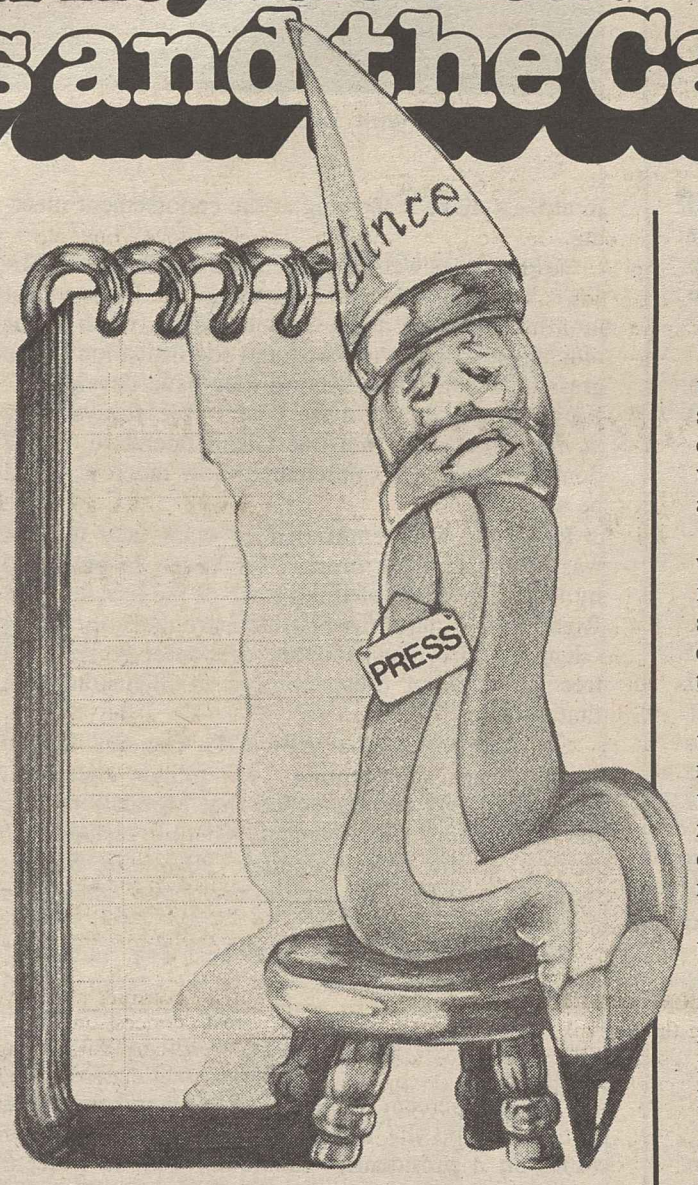
One of the rules James W. Collins, the legendary city editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, taught his troops was to beware of being too sure of their conclusions.

I thought about these lessons from my journalistic past as I watched the unfolding of the 1984 presidential election campaign. After 30 years of writing about politics from the outside, I watched the 1984 campaign unfold from the inside. This was a narrow perspective, to be sure; a sort of keyhole view since it came from the position of organized labor, specifically the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

I joined the AFL-CIO staff in January 1982, just in time to witness the federation's historic decision to endorse a candidate for the Democratic nomination before the party convention. As a newspaper junkie, I expected the campaign to be an exciting experience. It was, but it was also a revealing experience. I discovered failings of the press—print and electronic—far beyond what I had learned from three decades as a practitioner.

I am troubled by the ignorance, arrogance and plain foolishness I found in dealing with reporters. I am appalled at the laziness, lack of curiosity or enterprise and continued herd-mentality of so many reporters.

Two phenomena particularly impressed me: the very deep impact television has made on all reporting in the last decade and the mesmerizing effect public opinion polls now have on journalists.



My portion of this year's political merry-go-round started early in 1982, shortly after I crossed the street from the sunny reporter's side to the shady flack's side. Lane Kirkland, president of the AFL-CIO, started things with an interview with Jack Germond and Jules Witcover, the columnists, where he said he was considering asking the AFL-CIO Executive Council to attempt a consensus endorsement of a Democratic presidential candidate before the 1984 convention.

The Executive Council, at its meeting in May 1982, discussed Kirkland's suggestion and went a step farther than he expected. The council voted unanimously to ask the federation's member unions to desist from any presidential endorsements until the federation, itself, explored the possibility of a unified position.

A few days later, David Broder wrote in the Washington Post that it was not clear that the AFL-CIO could find a consensus: "But the very existence of the Kirkland plan changes the dynamics of the Democratic contest in fundamental ways."

"No one can ignore—or discount—a pre-primary endorsement by the AFL-CIO," Broder went on. "Union members surely will not vote as robots for the endorsed candidate. But the endorsement carries with it not just blessings and good will, but money and propaganda and a ready-made campaign machine in every state."

The federation's endorsement convention, he continued, would be "at least as important" as the Iowa Democratic caucuses or the New Hampshire primary, the first two hurdles in the 1984 race for the nomination.

"Candidates—and reporters—will have to learn as much about the internal dynamics of a big UAW local in Dearborn or AFSCME in New York City as they do about the characters in Black Hawk County, Iowa, or Dade County, Fla.," Broder added.

The political expert noted that Sen. Edward F. Kennedy and former Vice President Walter F. Mondale were the "main contenders" for the endorsement but that Sens. John Glenn and Alan Cranston would have "leverage" on the decision because of the heavy union membership in their home states.

Oddly, few reporters paid heed to Broder's sound advice. A conventional wisdom developed that this endorsement was just a publicity gimmick to puff up the failing political prestige of the labor movement. Several reporters scoffed that the federation would never be able to decide between Mondale and Kennedy and that, therefore, we were engaged in an exercise in futility.

Reportorial interest picked up in August 1982 when the Executive Council interviewed two candidates, Glenn and Sen. Gary Hart, in New York City. Germond and Witcover explained the reasoning in a November column:

"There already is talk of endorsing Kennedy and Mondale, and that would mean no advantage for either in union money or manpower. And there is the possibility that other candidates might get enough support to deny anyone Big Labor's endorsement."

Since a split endorsement was exactly what Kirkland was trying to avoid, this item must have been inspired by sources less than well-informed. The entire strategy was to avoid the kind of split in the ranks labor suffered in 1980 when some unions supported Jimmy Carter for re-election and others wanted to dump him in favor of Kennedy.

This first wave of conventional conclusion-making ended abruptly in December when Kennedy took himself out of contention for the 1984 nomination. Suddenly, for reporters and the other Democratic contenders, labor's endorsement took on new meaning.

The new tack suggested that the endorsement would be a negative for the candidate who won it. "It is probably no coincidence that the warnings of the 'perils' of winning the AFL-CIO endorsement started coming shortly after Sen. Ted Kennedy, one of labor's all-time favorites, announced that he would not seek the Democratic nomination next time around," Germond and Witcover wrote.

"But, with Kennedy out, the prospect that there will be an endorsement increases with Mondale, the favorite, as of now, to be the recipient. . . . It's not surprising then that other 1984 aspirants might be questioning the endorsement's worth—while hoping to get it."

Sens. Cranston and Ernest F. Hollings met with the Executive Council in Bal Harbour, Fla., in February 1983. Kirkland urged the union presidents to take wide soundings among their members before making any conclusions about candidates. The officers agreed to make no individual union endorsements before the next council meeting in May.

Former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew appeared at that May meeting, but reportorial interest in the process was at a low ebb. Although the council meeting was held near the Baltimore airport, a 45-minute drive from Washington, only the hard-core reporters covered it. The negative theme was still playing.

"There is an opportunity for one of the Democratic contenders for President to seize the initiative in the current campaign for the nomination," Steven Stark, Carter's issues director in his 1976 campaign, suggested in a New York Times opposite-editorial page article.

"Although at first it might seem crazy, the candidate with the imagination and courage to declare that he won't seek organized labor's endorsement could propel himself to the nomination and the White House."

Of course, all the candidates in the running were seeking the endorsement except Askew. But he, too, assured the Executive Council he wanted labor's support without a formal endorsement.

Stark was one of the first commentators to attach the term "special interest" to the labor movement, a theme that was to emerge more clearly as the campaign progressed. We were not without defenders, however.

'A political ten-strike'

"The AFL-CIO's decision to consider endorsement in the primary process has turned out to be a political ten-strike," Ben J. Wattenberg, the neo-conservative Democrat, wrote in The Washington Post. "Proof: a year ago it was said that labor's clout was gone; now, it's said labor has too much clout."

Leon G. Billings, former director of the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, put it this way in the Post: "Now, suddenly, someone has turned a page of the book on politics when I wasn't looking. Political columnists and former campaign managers tell me that working people, blacks and women, are not constituencies of the Democrcatic Party but special interests, and that concern for them makes a Democratic candidate a captive of special interests. . . . It is hogwash. . . ."

Robert Shogan of The Los Angeles Times and pollster William Schneider put together a long analysis which thoroughly trashed the federation's program.

"Question: What presidential candidate wants the endorsement of an organization whose leadership's reputation for rectitude rates twenty-third among twenty-four occupations, ranking higher only than car salesmen?" they asked in Public Opinion in June. (The same article ran in The Los Angeles Times.)

"Answer: Walter Mondale. Also, in alphabetical order, Alan Cranston, John Glenn, Gary Hart and Ernest F. Hollings."

Of course, the data they quoted never asked how the public rated the President of the AFL-CIO, or other union leaders by name and union. They simply grouped all union leaders together, the great and the weak, the indicted and the most respected.

Shogan and Schneider acknowledged that 65 to 80 percent of the sample asked said labor's endorsement would not change their votes.

And they admitted that the public took a negative view of endorsements by 17 of 19 political action committees—only the environmentalists and consumer groups got positive ratings. They also agreed that unions have high public standing for what they do to improve the working lives of millions of Americans.

In the end, Shogan and Schneider concluded: "In simplest terms, most citizens think organized labor is fine as long as it stays in its place—the workplace."

Lou Harris, in a poll for Business Week published in 1984, pointed out that the low public esteem for union leaders has not changed in a decade. On the other hand, "Americans to an amazing degree have mainitained a 'positive view' of unions, says Harris," Business Week reported.

Shogan and Schneider erred in their conclusion because they did not understand that the AFL-CIO's activity would be confined to the ranks of the membership of its 96 unions.

An unanswered question

A legitimate question never answered was why the writers did not explore in the same detail the potential effects of endorsements by the National Association of Manufacturers, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, National Rifle Association, National Association of Real Estate Boards and other groups that generally work the right wing of politics and which are generally seen by the public to be "special interests."

All of this research did not explain why each Democratic candidate asked to be heard by the AFL-CIO leadership. "It is not compulsory, you know," Lane Kirkland told reporters.

The negative idea had been planted, however, and it was to persist through the agonizing nomination struggle of the first half of 1984. At the same time, some reporters questioned labor's wisdom in favoring Mondale over the apparent strong position of Glenn in public opinion polls.

A New York Times/CBS survey published in July 1983 showed Mondale preferred by 34 percent of the Democrats and Glenn by 32 percent. Hart, at that time, got only 1 percent support.

At a meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Detroit that month, Mondale said he was offended by criticism of his labor support. "Since when is it a special interest to be for organized labor?" he asked. Glenn said he, too, was seeking labor's endorsement and thought, "it is not a kiss of death."

Alan Baron, the political analyst, told The Wall Street Journal that labor should not choose between candidates but should "be in more than one camp."

The news focus moved quickly to Boston in August 1983, when the Executive Council decided to set the date for making a formal presidential endorsement to coincide with the federation's biennial convention scheduled for October. Most observers had expected the endorsement to be made in December.

Reporters interpreted the decision as an indication that Mondale was the heavy favorite to be endorsed. However, the reporters continued to think that Glenn was the chief challenger when, in fact, only Cranston among the other hopefuls had any support within the council.

A typical commentary was written by Don Campbell in USA Today: "There's no denying that the 23-6 vote by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to advance its endorsement of a candidate from December to October will give the recipient, presumably Mondale, an important organizational advantage.

"It could mean maybe $20 million worth of help in voter identification and registration, computerized 'personal' communications, from labor leaders, get-out-the-vote drives, etc."

That dollar estimate for the value of labor's campaign was plucked out of thin air by Glenn who happened to be campaigning in New England when the council met. He had paid little attention to the endorsement's value until that meeting when he sent some staff members to express his belated concern. Glenn told reporters he was now going to take his case to the rank-and-file union members in order to at least make a showing at the endorsement meeting.

"Glenn aides were surprised and awed at an AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Boston last month, according to several of them, when labor officials described the scope and sophistication of the grassroots political operation they have developed," Kathy Sawyer wrote in the Post. " 'We always knew it was important,' said one Glenn operative, 'but I don't think we ever anticipated' how much it would be worth."

Reporters were enthralled by what they thought was strong popular support for Glenn in polls and by the likely effect of the release of the movie, "The Right Stuff," about the original astronauts, including Glenn. No previous candidate ever received so much free publicity for doing nothing as Glenn did with that movie.

On October 1, the AFL-CIO General Board, casting votes representing 14.7 million members, overwhelmingly recommended that Mondale receive the federation's endorsement. Glenn received 3.3 percent of the votes, Mondale 90.7 with the remainder cast for "no endorsement" or "abstained at this time."

The New York Times, the next day, published one of the oddest poll analyses of the season. It had found that among AFL-CIO union members, Mondale was preferred by 30 percent and Glenn by 27 percent.

"Seventy percent of the AFL-CIO members polled last week said the leadership had not sought their views on a presidential candidate, and 23 percent said they had been consulted," Joseph B. Treaster wrote.

If this were true, about 3.4 million union members had been asked about their political preferences before the endorsement was made. This would constitute one of the largest public opinion samples ever made. All the major pollsters, including the Times/CBS, base their conclusions on samples of about 1,500 individuals out of the entire U.S. population. Still, it was suggested that since 70 percent of union members had not been surveyed, somehow the AFL-CIO unions failed.

It turned out, of course, that it was the Times and CBS that failed. Their sample of union members had been extrapolated from a national population sample and, therefore, did not conform to the specific demographic profile of the labor movement.

The poll contacted only 162 union members of whom 81 were Democrats. From that sample, the Times and CBS drew a series of conclusions about the labor movement. The professional pollsters we conferred with called the Times/CBS work "shoddy."

Still, many reporters, notably Irving R. Levine of NBC, scoffed at the convention decision as unrepresentative. The fact that all of the major unions of the federation had conducted some kind of membership sampling, including professional polling and complete membership surveys, cut no ice with critics.

Frank Van Ripper, writing for the Cox Newspapers, referred to the Times/CBS poll as proof of Glenn's charges that the AFL-CIO endorsement would not pass the "smell test." The poll seemed tailor-made for Glenn to charge that Mondale was the handpicked choice of the labor bosses—a rap no Democrat wants these days if he expects to win a general election."

The "kiss of death" theme was muted during the early winter except for an occasional barb thrown by Jesse Jackson. Blacks, Hispanics and women "don't have a snowball's chance of being heard" by the federation's leadership, he said in November. Naturally, Jackson did not recount that before the AFL-CIO meeting he, too, had met with Kirkland.

The AFL-CIO leader offered to call an extraordinary meeting of the Executive Council to hear Jackson before the convention. But Jackson said he had not yet decided if he were going to be a candidate.

By January, the autumn soar of Glenn had turned into a tailspin. The Times/CBS survey published in late January showed Glenn tied with Jackson with support of 14 percent of registered Democrats while Mondale had 44 percent. Hart ranked with the other candidates below 4 percent.

Most interesting in that poll was the chart of Glenn's standing from June 1983 to January 1984. This showed Glenn and Mondale in a virtual tie in June. In September, when the movie was taking up free space in all the press and on television, Glenn's standing was falling.

Mondale's position took off simultaneously and rose sharply through the period when both the AFL-CIO and the independent National Education Association gave him their allegedly deadly caresses.

Shogan and Schneider wrote that the impact of the AFL-CIO endorsement "would be likely to increase considerably because of the big splash the endorsement would make in the press." The decision did make a major splash, but the January polls indicated it was positive for the winning candidate in the eyes of the general public, and with union members.

Only a handful of reporters went into the fields to see if labor's campaign could be seen in action. Kathy Sawyer of the Post, Harry Bernstein of The Los Angeles Times and Howell Raines of The New York Times, explored our organization most thoroughly, but most other reporters wrote or talked about labor without bothering to do original work; they simply reworked what they borrowed from others.

Through the entire caucus and primary campaign, this was the pattern. A few enterprising reporters would actually attend meetings we held across the country for local labor leaders; television crews showed special interest in seeing telephone banks in operation.

TV's big names

The Iowa caucuses drew big television names like Dan Rather of CBS and Tom Brokaw of NBC. Brokaw interviewed John Perkins, AFL-CIO political director, using questions prepared by a young producer, while Rather misrepresented labor's telephone campaigning.

"There's another whole campaign being waged on Mondale's behalf, a campaign with a legally unlimited budget and no outside fiscal accountability," he reported. "That campaign is being fought by organized labor . . . there's no legal requirement to report how much was spent or where it went."

Apparently, Rather never heard of the reports of "in-kind" spending for political campaigns which labor does report to the Federal Election Commission.

There was a flurry of excitement in Iowa, when Glenn charged that telephone banks were improperly operated for Mondale from union halls. William White, Glenn's campaign manager, said he was going to make formal charges to the FEC. Reporters hardly noticed that no such charges were ever filed. Glenn was the first to make labor an issue, but it did him little good in Iowa where Mondale won handily.

From that first series of caucuses, a pattern for reporting about labor developed. When the federation and its affiliates performed well for their candidate, they got little media attention. When it appeared that labor had failed, it got all kinds of attention.

Germond and Broder talked about the Iowa results with Ken Bode and Bryant Gumble on the NBC "Today" show on February 21, the day after the caucuses, without discussing labor's role.

Yet, as Sawyer reported in The Washington Post, NBC exit polls found that 75 percent of the union participants had voted for Mondale. Labor, in fact, produced 40 percent of Mondale's strength in Iowa.

Broder, usually a cautious observer, told the television audience that George McGovern was "in a position to hurt Gary Hart" in New Hampshire and that some of Glenn's supporters would slide over to Sen. Hollings.

"Well, Mondale doesn't have to take note of anybody," Germond said. "I mean, after all, he did win big and he beat his closest competition better than two to one. Mondale needs to keep the same kind of posture he's had, where he is above the fray a little bit."

This was the new conventional wisdom put down by the two best political analysts in journalism.

'It's only television'

All through the campaign, television brought print journalists to the tube, apparently in the belief its own highly paid performers lacked credibility. From their perspective, writing journalists have found television to be a lucrative outside source of income as well as a great builder of reputations, egos and speaking fees.

The writers learn quickly that to be successful on the visual medium they must perform to the extent of saying things differently than they would in print; taking positions that are controversial; drawing conclusions, and arguing with each other. Otherwise sensible writers will say outlandish things on television if for no other reason than to be invited back for another performance.

Morton Kondracke of The New Republic, who plays the "liberal" on televised verbfests, acknowledged the phenomenon in a conversation. "It doesn't make any difference; it is only television," he said.

The conventional wisdom about New Hampshire was enhanced on February 28, the day of the balloting, when the newest New York Times/CBS poll was printed, showing Mondale ahead of Hart and the other challengers by 50 points, "the most commanding lead ever recorded this early in a Presidential nomination campaign by a nonincumbent," Hedrick Smith wrote.

Twenty-four hours later, the conventional wisdom had again been trashed. Hart, who used the anti-labor issue in attacking Mondale for making "too many promises to special interests," upset the prognosticators and won New Hampshire.

Looking back at all the pre-primary predictions, Richard Cohen of the Post wrote: "Fortunately, these stories now rest at the bottom of bird cages."

The New York Times/CBS exit poll showed that only six percent of the New Hampshire participants were union members, but labor was singled out as a major cause of Mondale's loss.

Overnight, the political momentum shifted. Germond and Broder both told the "Today" audience that the Colorado senator had just about knocked Mondale out of the race; it would be hard for Mondale to recover.

USA Today carried a headline, "Labor Muscle Won't Deliver Mondale the Nomination," over a story by Don Campbell which did not say that. Mondale's "constituency might be too narrow and too shallow," he wrote.

In the Post, Mark Shields explained: "Labor, to its credit, may be the last Democrat constituency that still imposes a call upon both the consciences and the checkbooks of party members. Labor, to its credit, wants to spend more money to buy better public education.

"But labor is not fashionable; labor wears pinky rings, too often, and dresses in suits that shine like aluminum. So, labor, which is easy to caricature, is available for cheap shots."

The shots came fast; Newsweek, which had paid little previous attention, decided after New Hampshire, Maine and Vermont went for Hart, labor's support "may be doing Mondale more harm than good."

Only a few reporters realized that Mondale's loss in Maine was actually more damaging to labor's campaign than the New Hampshire primary or Vermont popularity poll. Maine was a caucus state and far fewer union voters took part than had been expected. As a result of Maine and New Hampshire, the AFL-CIO changed strategy and tactics, but few reporters noticed.

". . . Gary Hart is hard for unions to fight," Leonard Apcar wrote in The Wall Street Journal. "Both the AFL-CIO and NEA have backed him in his Senate races."

While the media moved its attention to "Super Tuesday" — primaries in Massachusetts, Florida, Georgia and Alabama—labor experimented with new techniques in Delaware and Oklahoma. In the smaller state, Mondale won big; in Oklahoma an expected Hart sweep turned into a standoff. The results were heartening to labor strategists, but they accepted the sense that Hart's momentum had to be stopped in the South if Mondale's candidacy was to be resuscitated.

Ken Bode of NBC caught labor's odd situation in the South. "Organized labor is about as weak in the South as it is anywhere in the country, yet a South-wide poll taken last month shows that 60 percent of the people here still think the unions have too much influence." This was the new approach to the "kiss-of-death" argument; it is the opposite side of the argument which says unions are archaic—dinosaurs toddling off to extinction.

Lane Kirkland signaled the change in strategy for the nomination campaign in a little-noticed speech at an AFL-CIO regional conference in Miami shortly before Super Tuesday.

Through the first primaries and caucuses, labor had told its members that all eight Democrats were good men; that all were qualified to be president, but that Mondale was the clearly preferred candidate for working men and women.

Research by the American Federation of Teachers and the AFL-CIO found several instances where Hart had taken clear anti-labor positions in committees or "non-record" votes which would not go into his file kept by the Committee on Political Educate (COPE). Thus, he could have a good voting record—over 80 percent "right"—with COPE and still have enough red marks in his copy book to be vulnerable.

Most of all, Hart had decided he could be nominated by attacking labor as a special interest and by charging that labor leaders somehow did not represent the interests of their members. "The Democratic Party that was once the party of workers on the assembly lines of America is in danger of becoming the party of a handful of organized leaders in Washington," the Senator said in a typical statement.

This line, adopted by the so-called neo-liberals, runs parallel to the argument used by Ronald Reagan in trying to split workers from their elected leaders. The neo-liberals take the arrogant position that they know what is best for workers, although they have never bothered to consult with any.

The worst phase

Campaign coverage by March was in its worst phase when the traveling claques with each candidate moved across the political landscape like so many locusts. The reporters and television crews descended on meetings just minutes before the candidate was to speak, and they rushed out a few minutes later. They often did not know where they were; they saw the world through the windows of chartered buses.

Bernard Weinraub, in the Times, said Mondale had addressed 2,000 union "organizers" in Miami. I sent him a note saying that those were mostly real, live working folks in that hall; we wish we had 2,000 organizers in all of the southeast states, much less Dade County.

Mondale, campaigning better than ever before, did what he had to do; he won Georgia and Alabama and renewed his own energy and the campaign's spirit.

The New York Times/CBS exit polls showed labor produced 16 percent of the voters in Georgia and 28 percent in Alabama. In Alabama, voters split about even (51 percent "yes," 41 percent "no") on the question of does labor have too much power? In Georgia, the vote was negative for labor by two-to-one, bearing out a personal impression that where unions are best known, they are least offensive.

Within the Georgia and Alabama results, there was evidence, largely overlooked by reporters, that Hart was not the barrier to Mondale's nomination, but that Jackson was.

Only 3 percent of Hart's supporters in Alabama and 5 percent in Georgia were black, while Mondale scored well with blacks in both states and Jackson led in that vote.

Reporters all through the campaign wrote about the Mondale-Hart contest as if it were one event and the Jackson campaign another. Actually, if Jackson had not been in the race, Hart's campaign would have ended early.

The media, in early spring, concentrated on the race-horse character of the campaign, emphasizing the popularity voting and paying little attention to the more important element of delegate selection. Reporters kept looking for that time when Mondale might quit. Similarly, they wanted to know when labor might start hedging its bets by making overtures to Hart.

In fact, the AFL-CIO never considered changing its course. The decision was to stay with Mondale as long as Mondale stayed the course. And, always, the selection of delegates was the prize. The only alternative result suggested was a possible stalemated convention. With a maximum count of delegates, labor would be assured of a role in any event.

Irving R. Levine reminded the Today show audience that George Meany, Kirkland's predecessor as AFL-CIO president, never endorsed candidates before party conventions.

"The ultimate test of whether Kirkland and other union leaders are in step with their members will come in the big industrial states—Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania," he said. "If Hart gets the nomination, big labor will swallow its pride and kiss and make up, but Hart will owe Kirkland nothing, which would prove that George Meany was right."

David Fink in USA Today returned to the question, "Can labor deliver?" With caucuses in Michigan and primaries approaching in Illinois, New York and Pennsylvania, he wrote, "Indications are that organized labor . . . can't and perhaps never could wield enormous election day clout."

Reporters tended to belittle the Michigan voting since it was done in open caucuses. They pointed out some of the meetings would actually be held in union halls.

Some writers showed their ignorance of unions by suggesting that union members would be intimidated by the presence of their elected officers and, therefore, unlikely to exercise their private choices. But, in union politics, the pressure works the other way—elected officers tend to bend with the pressure of their members, not the other way around.

The omnipresent polls confused reporters more than ever. After using polls as crutches to make up for their unwillingness to do old-fashioned street reporting, reporters could not keep up with the wild swoops the so-called scientific measures took.

In two weeks, Mondale went from commanding 57 percent support in the New York Times/CBS poll to 31 percent. Hart went from 7 percent to 38 percent. "A comparable transformation of public opinion on any subject is hard to recall," Martin Plissner, executive political director for CBS News, observed. "Certainly, in the history of the polling of presidential preference, there is none."

Newsweek, among others, was caught going in the wrong direction in its pre-primary analysis of Illinois. "While it is not inconceivable that Mondale could resurrect his stumbling campaign in Illinois, it now appears far more likely—and, indeed, ironic—that a state synonymous with old organization politics may write its epitaph in election year 1984."

Wrong again. As it did all through 1984, the media underestimated Mondale as a campaigner. He made good use of Hart's stand as a "free trader," at a time when American jobs are being exported instead of American goods, and Hart's errors under pressure.

Mondale won big in Michigan and Illinois and went east with a new burst of enthusiasm and confidence. Despite the many doubters, Barry Cronin of the Chicago Sun-Times concluded: "Walter Mondale's victory in the Illinois Democratic primary gave new credence to big labor's ability to deliver for its endorsed candidate."

True Democrats

The real lesson that many reporters still had not learned was that in contests where only Democrats made the decisions, Mondale usually won. Hart's supporters, to a large extent, were people who did not declare their party preference and Republicans who wanted to influence the Democrats' choice. By the same token, within the Democratic Party, there is little resentment toward labor. What kind of Democratic Party would there be without strong labor participation?

This lesson was proved in both New York and Pennsylvania where, again, Mondale scored strong victories.

By the third week of March, Mondale was again leading in the polls. His standing continued to improve through April. Adam Clymer, on March 27, wrote in the Times: "The volatile nature of this year's Democratic electorate, demonstrated repeatedly in sharp swings in the closing days of primary races, was shown again in this poll." He then quoted Peter Hart, the Mondale pollster: "The shelf life of a survey in this election may be about 48 hours."

The New York primary, won by Mondale, reinforced the view that when labor did well, it was taken for granted. Hedrick Smith, analyzing for The New York Times, had explored labor's problem before "Super Tuesday," especially in Massachusetts where he said the unions failed Mondale. But when he wrote about the New York primary, he did not mention labor's role at all.

He concluded that the unemployment issue worked in Mondale's favor and that Jewish and female votes went for Mondale. He also mentioned that Mondale did better in primaries restricted to Democrats.

Yet, the poll Smith was analyzing showed that 40 percent of the New York primary voters came from union households, a group larger than those who described themselves as Jewish or Catholic. Mondale carried 48 percent of that vote, Hart got 22 percent and Jackson got 30 percent. The writers looking for Hart's white, upward-bound young professionals overlooked the evidence that many of those New Yorkers are union members.

At about this time, William Schneider returned to his theme that labor's political involvement was a negative for its chosen candidate. "What the evidence suggests is that it helps a Democractic candidate to be perceived as a supporter of labor," Schneider wrote in the National Journal. "But it does not help for labor to be perceived as a supporter of the candidate."

He then charted results in the early primaries without mentioning the substantial labor vote that Jackson was receiving. Jackson was still the "invisible man."

Although the election-eve polls showed Mondale and Hart nearly even in Pennsylvania, the former vice president won the state by a large margin. Forty-four percent of the primary voters came from union households, and Mondale got 52 percent of their votes. According to ABC exit polls, Jackson got 17 percent. Hart had 30 percent.

USA Today and The Los Angeles Times credited Mondale's win to the issue of unemployment; labor was hardly mentioned. Still, an analysis by Lucinda Fleeson of The Philadelphia Inquirer found: "By delivering the largest union turnout in the presidential campaign so far, organized labor proved that in Pennsylvania it still can be a powerful asset that effectively gets out the vote."

The industrial states

Looking back, it is clear that Pennsylvania was the real end to Hart's dream of winning the nomination through the primaries and caucuses. As Germond and Witcover wrote a few days later, Hart's position was now "downright desperate."

"Whatever opinion polls may show, it is extraordinarily difficult for Gary Hart to make the case he is stronger than Fritz Mondale when—in less than a month—he has lost to Mondale in Michigan, Illinois, New York and Pennsylvania, four major industrial states that are by any reckoning requisite elements of any winning Democratic electoral-vote combination against Reagan in the fall."

At that breathing point, Kathy Sawyer in the Post concluded: "In the first round of Democratic presidential primary and caucus contests, organized labor's lift as a vote-producer ultimately outpulled its drag as an albatross of 'special interest' around the neck of its chosen candidate, Walter F. Mondale."

Mondale now had more than half of the delegates he needed for a first-ballot nomination. With Mondale again the front runner, Hart was under heavy pressure and the media microscope.

"But now the media-induced euphoria that once propelled Hart's candidacy has been replaced by growing voter skepticism about who and what he is," Patricia O'Brien and Robert D. Shaw, Jr., wrote for the Knight-Ridder newspapers.

The labor issue in the campaign shifted direction as reporters learned of the existence of committees formed to promote the candidacies of individual delegate candidates. These committees were created originally to help union members contest other delegate candidates. Of course, the labor delegates were Mondale delegates.

While he attacked the delegate committee set-up, Hart also tried to make gestures toward union members in the remaining state contests. He visited a closed steel mill in Youngstown and criticized Mondale's economic industrial policy plank and repeated his earlier denunciations of federal government guarantees which helped the Chrysler Corporation regain economic health.

Hart faced a new disaster in Texas, one of those western states that were expected to save his campaign. But after a few days of campaigning, in which he repeated his attacks on labor, Hart decided to invest the greater portion of his time in Indiana and Ohio.

Mondale took the opposite tack and invested energy and time heavily in Texas. The result was another win for him. Here, The New York Times/CBS exit poll found that 23 percent of the participants came from union households. They provided Mondale with 31 percent of his support, and Jackson 21 percent of his. The labor vote was 13 percent of Hart's total.

Still, analyses of the caucuses gave more credit to Hispanic-Americans—about 10 percent of the participants—than the labor vote. Hispanics provided Mondale with 17 percent of his support. Of course, since there are many Hispanic-American union members, the numbers include duplicates.

"In recent weeks, Hart's attacks on labor union financing of the Mondale delegate committees have intensified," Plissner wrote. "The state of Texas, which does not have a heavily unionized population, seemed ideal for this tactic. However, it did not help him to win. . . ."

The inevitable question

Buried in the poll results was an interesting result on the inevitable question, do unions have too much power? Of Texas Democrats, 48 percent said "no" and 46 percent, "yes."

In analyzing the Ohio results for the Times, Hedrick Smith had to discard his unemployment factor since Hart won in a state that had seemed natural for Mondale. Smith pointed out that "well over half" of the voters in the Ohio Democratic primary thought unions had too much power, and that this indicated the different nature of the state from its industrial neighbors.

Actually, the final polls showed 53 percent of Ohioans took that position compared to 51 percent of the Pennsylvanians polled and 49 percent of the Illini. That was hardly a difference since the margin of error was four percent.

The real difference between Ohio and Pennsylvania was that Ohio permits independents to take part in its primary. In Ohio, 72 percent of those polled said they were Democrats and 24 percent declared themselves independents. In Pennsylvania, 80 percent of the participants said they were Democrats and only 16 percent said they were independents.

The nomination fight ended, mercifully, and the summing-up began. Howell Raines in The New York Times:

"And while few doubted the importance of the AFL-CIO endorsement, perhaps no one suspected its absolute indispensability. Labor deserves the major credit for engineering the massive turnout of union and elderly voters that helped Mr. Mondale overcome the drain on this electoral base caused by the Rev. Jesse Jackson's ability to capture huge majorities among black voters."

In The Los Angeles Times, Harry Bernstein: "Most political observers agree with the unions that they were the single most important force in Mondale's campaign."

The Los Angeles Times was schizophrenic about labor's role in the campaign. Robert Shogan, who had concluded with William Schneider that the labor campaign would hurt Mondale, hardly mentioned the AFL-CIO in his reporting. Anticipating the convention, he and Sara Fritz acknowledged that the federation's "organizational help was a key factor in many Mondale primary victories. . . ."

In the same paper, Schneider, the pollster, barely mentioned the unions in his summation of the campaign. Perhaps he saw what the New York Times/CBS found in its June national survey. Asked what they did not like about Mondale, only 2 percent—all whites—responded that he was "close to unions." The same percentage, including blacks, said his closeness to unions was one of the things they liked about Mondale.

Asked what they considered to be "special interest groups," 11 percent said unions, an increase from 8 percent who answered the same way in February. Business, which was seen by 12 percent as a special interest in February, slipped to 9 percent in June. Minorities went from 10 to 15 percent in the same period. The campaign had apparently heightened sensitivity to the term.

Still, after all the attacks on Mondale, and on labor, in June roughly the same percent of voters thought he was "too attached" to special interests (34 percent) as in February (33 percent). Ronald Reagan, in the view of the same sample, was "too attached" to special interests by 40 percent in June compared with 38 percent in February.

Andrew Mollison, of the Cox Newspapers, made an analysis of ABC exit polls and concluded that Mondale received 44 percent of the votes from union households, Hart 28 percent and Jackson 18 percent. "Mondale's 16-point advantage among union families offset Hart's 12-point advantage among the more numerous non-union families," he wrote.

The Times/CBS summation gave Mondale 45 percent of all union household votes. This survey also showed that in all the primaries, union voters amounted to a third of the participants although they are 25 percent of the total population.

For the AFL-CIO, the long campaign produced the results it sought: the nomination of Mondale, a record number of union delegates to the convention, a new unity within the movement, and added respect, however grudging, for its campaign efforts.

In San Francisco, however, the labor presence drew only modest attention from the media. The fact that we did what we set out to do became a non-story.

Lane Kirkland gave a speech to a labor dinner just before the convention opened and only a handful of reporters covered it. He led a parade down Market Street and addressed some 250,000 trade unionists on the Sunday before the opening and was interviewed by local reporters.

On Monday, the opening convention day, the AFL-CIO held a caucus for its delegates and alternates. We announced it would be open for coverage, but only writing journalists appeared. One television crew from Jacksonville, Fla., wandered in, found some Floridians, and left without knowing it had scored a video scoop.

The lesson, of course, is that television lives on staged events; it was not interested in news for its own sake. The AFL-CIO operated a full network of whips and sector leaders and all the other paraphernalia common to floor operations at a convention, but only a few reporters showed any interest.

There were several printed observations about labor's "low profile." Some writers noted the discreet behavior of labor's delegates—no funny hats, colorful jackets, no fist fights. But most reporters covered the convention action from television screens in the hall; when labor did not appear on the screens, the writers accepted that as evidence that labor did not exist at the convention.

In spite of all the earlier journalist thumbsucking, labor did not develop as an issue in the first half of the fall election campaign. Commentators, instead, found the two parties fighting over the workers' votes.

Ronald Reagan did not attack Walter Mondale for seeking and receiving labor support. Instead, the Republicans did their best to create the impression that they were the workers' friends. Reagan made some of his earliest appearances in the campaign in front of blue-collar audiences.

The GOP strategists sought desperately to win the endorsement of the one major labor organization that had not supported the Mondale-Ferraro ticket. George Bush was dispatched to Columbus to accept the strong backing of Jackie Presser, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. Other Republican union officers were importuned to endorse Reagan-Bush, both to discount the AFL-CIO support for Mondale-Ferraro and to make it possible for the GOP to argue that it had labor support.

Privately, most reporters I talked with were chagrined how badly they had called the 1984 spring campaign. Still, they repeated many of the same errors in the beginning of the fall campaign.

Reporters continued to use polls as current facts and projections for the future instead of "snapshots in time," as the pollsters, themselves, say. They were distracted by minutiae of the campaign—personalities and such things as seats on airplanes.

Herd journalism

While speculating about the success of the campaign managers at staging "media events," reporters allowed themselves to be used as stage extras in the events. Herd journalism—in which a few reporters set a pattern and others follow—dominated the coverage.

Reporters continued their long ignorance of economics. Even so careful a writer as Broder referred in late September to the atmosphere of "burgeoning economic growth" as helping the Reagan campaign. This, a few days after the government announced economic growth had slowed by 50 percent during the past six months and when unemployment had rested at a high 7.5 percent for four months.

Part of the problem is that so many of the reporters covering the major stories are younger than those who covered the same assignment years ago. The new reporters are better educated than their predecessors, but they do not know as much; they are excellent at communicating information, but they lack historical background and experience.

Because there are so few major newspapers now, the writing reporters on the assignment have less competition than before. The major networks still use The New York Times for setting their evening news budgets, but the Times and other papers make sure they report what television has shown the home audiences even when that view is badly skewed.

Perhaps, most troubling of all is the feeling that newspapers are becoming a class media, edited and written by upper-middle class individuals for an audience that is largely upper-middle class or higher.

At atomic fuel center

Unions press probes of radioactive hazard

Fernald, Ohio—Mounting worker and community concerns over the release into the atmosphere over the past 30 years of some 100 tons of radioactive uranium oxide from the Dept. of Energy's Feed Materials Production Center has triggered an avalanche of investigaitons at local, state and federal levels.

The 15-union Fernald Atomic Trades Council, which represents more than 1,000 workers at the production center and is affiliated with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., pressed for the investigations after the release of nearly 300 pounds of uranium oxide late last year.

The center produces enriched uranium ingots fór federal reactors in South Carolina, Colorado and Washington, which turn the ingots into plutonium for weapons.

The Atomic Trades Council joined with the Fernald Residents for Environmental Safety & Health in pressing state and federal officials to act.

Labor action

The Cincinnati AFL-CIO also asked the state Dept. of Health to "intervene on behalf of both workers and the community" and sought a congressional investigation of the release of uranium oxide and of the management of the plant by NLO, Inc. NLO, formerly National Lead of Ohio, has been under contract with the energy agency for the past 30 years.

Energy Sec. Donald P. Hodel, in response to questions from Rep. Thomas A. Luken (D-Ohio), attributed the latest release of the radioactive material to a malfunction in an air cleaning system.

Hodel's report indicated that over 105 tons of uranium were discharged to the environment in the past 30 years, with the bulk of the discharges occurring in the 1950s and 1960s.

His report said that on Nov. 29, five workers who were repairing the air cleaning system were exposed to a "puff" of uranium oxide. The workers were later checked for radioactivity by a DOE "whole-body counter" that measures the presence of radioactive materials in the lungs. DOE insisted that the "counter" showed their "lung burden" has not increased over previous levels.

Radiation checks

After that exposure and the subsequent releases of uranium oxide at the plant, the Dept. of Energy offered both workers and the community the opportunity to be checked for radiation.

At issue, according to the trades council, is whether DOE should be permitted to investigate itself and whether other agencies should regulate it.

Ohio Gov. Richard Celeste, at the request of the trades council, asked the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health to investigate the effects on the health of the workers.

Jerry Flesch, assistant chief of NIOSH's hazard evaluation and technical assistance branch, said NIOSH has begun gathering medical information on the workers and has chosen Argonne National Laboratory in Chicago to conduct separate "whole-body" scanning of the workers for radiation.

Key to NIOSH's investigation, however, was gaining the participation of the plant's workforce. But fear of reprisals from either DOE or the company prevented the workers from cooperating with NIOSH. Last week, NLO and the energy agency agreed in writing to the unions' demand that there would be no reprisals against workers participating in any of the various health and safety investigations.

Flesch said NIOSH expects to have results from its testing within the next few weeks.

Contaminated wells

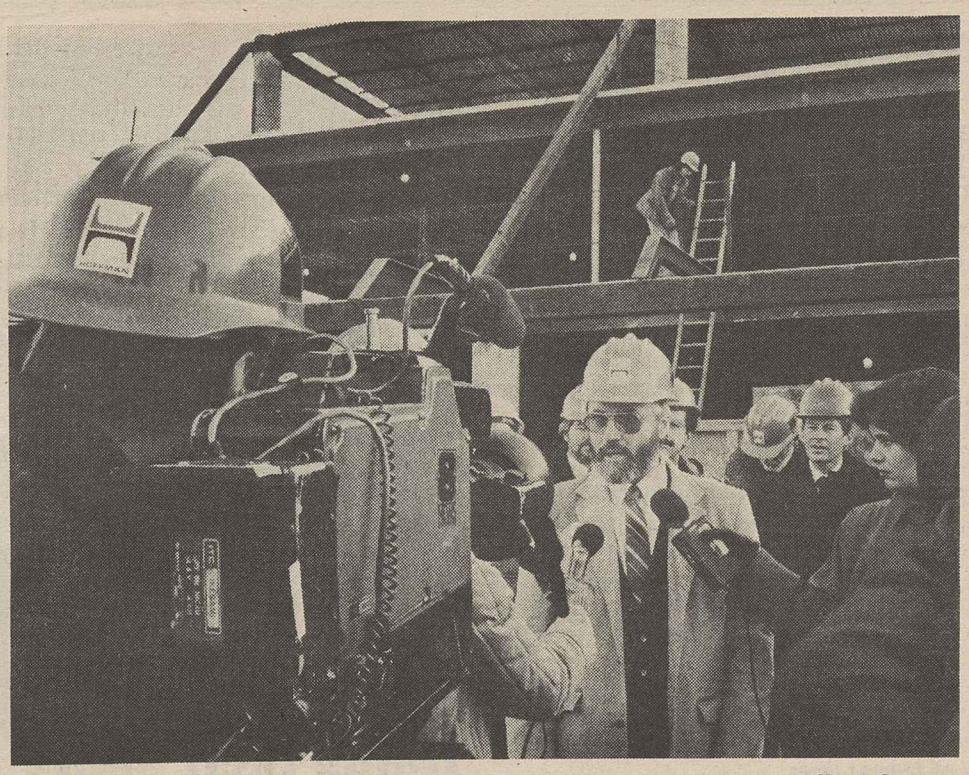
Meanwhile, the state health department is checking area wells for radiation contamination. Thus far, three wells have been found to be contaminated. And Ohio Atty. Gen. Anthony J. Celebrezze is preparing a suit against NLO and DOE, citing 26 violations of state regulations on waste and water contamination.



As a part of DOE's actions at Fernald, the agency for the first time in 30 years is seeking competitive bids for the operation of the plant, forgoing the opportunity to automatically renew NLO's five-year contract again. That contract expires this September. After the announcement of competitive bidding, NL Industries, Inc., parent corporation of NLO, said it would not re-bid, but would agree to operate the plant under a contract extension.

Of mice and men

Nearly three-fourths of a group of test mice were killed in a recent cancer study by exposure to butadiene gas at levels far below those the government allows for workers.

The study, performed for the National Toxicology Program, is featured in the latest issue of Science magazine. The authors note that of 100 mice tested at 625 parts butadiene per million parts of air, 74 mice died of cancer. So lethal was the concentration of gas that the two-year study had to be ended after just one year.

The AFL-CIO and several of its affiliates petitioned the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in January 1984 to reduce the ceiling on worker exposure to 1 ppm from the 1,000 ppm level currently allowed. OSHA denied the union petition for an emergency standard and so far has not moved to lower worker exposures. Some 70,000 workers, mostly in the rubber and chemical industries, face the risk of exposure to the gas at their workplaces.

Oregon Building & Construction Trades Council President Bill Belanger details $103,000 labor-management contribution to Red Cross construction.

Oregon building trades aid Red Cross in two projects

Portland, Ore. — Construction trades unions here are supporting the Red Cross by helping to reduce the cost of its new office building now under construction and by improving the agency's ability to respond in case of a disaster.

Labor's successful coastline disaster project has been extended to the West Coast with the designation of Steamfitters Local 235 and Carpenters Local 247 as headquarters for the Red Cross disaster response teams during emergencies.

The agreement between the Red Cross and the unions provides for the installation of special telephone lines and auxiliary power generators at the union halls to prepare for their use as disaster relief centers. Similar agreements have been negotiated between the Red Cross and unions from Texas to Maine and in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

"This is part of the continuing good relationship between organized labor and the Red Cross," said E. R. (Del) Ricks, executive director of Labor's Community Services Agency in Portland. He noted that the 1980 eruption of Mount Saint Helens, just 40 miles away, provided the impetus for improving disaster preparedness in the area.

A total of $103,000 will be saved on the cost of the Red Cross's new $2 million headquarters building in Portland. The savings result from a labor-management program and from direct contributions of union members.

The general contractor, Hoffman Construction Co. of Portland, bid the project under the new Union Contractors Association (UCA) collective bargaining agreement which provides for a 20-percent labor cost reduction by members of the building trades unions that are signatory to the UCA agreement. This resulted in a $55,000 savings.

In addition, a unionized subcontractor, Streimer Sheet Metal Works, Inc., bid its portion of the job under the UCA agreement, resulting in another $12,000 savings.

Others pitch in

And, members of non-UCA crafts — Iron Workers, Electrical Workers, and Plumbers and Steamfitters—pledged the equivalent of one day's pay a month to the Red Cross building fund.

Their contributions will amount to $18,000 in a plan worked out by EXCEL, another union-contractor committee. Hoffman Construction agreed to match the workers' $18,000—for a total of $36,000.

UCA and EXCEL were established in 1983 to help union contractors and union building tradesmen reclaim their share of the construction market.

Representing organized labor in UCA negotiations are Earl Kirkland, executive secretary of the Columbia-Pacific Building & Construction Trades Council, and William Belanger, executive secretary of the Oregon State Building Trades. EXCEL's executive director is James Fox, who is also research director for the Oregon State District Council of Carpenters.

Accord in sight following sale of struck bakeries

Alexandria, La.—The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers ended a 17-month strike at Cotton Bros., Inc., here after the company announced it would sell its bakeries to American Bakeries, Inc., an all-union firm that has already agreed to bargain with the employees.

BC&T President John DeConcini said American, which has contracts with the union nationwide, "has agreed to sit down with us and negotiate a contract and return the strikers to their jobs" at the five struck Cotton plants.

The union has called off its strike at plants in Monroe and Shreveport, La., and Natchez, Miss., and ended its local boycott of Cotton baked goods, BC&T said.

The 118 employees were forced to strike in August 1983 when Cotton continued to demand deep wage and benefit concessions and changes in the contract that would have made it difficult for the union to represent its members effectively, BC&T said.

Although the workers had agreed to reductions in wages and benefits, the company "was determined to destroy the union," DeConcini charged. The outlook changed, however, when American successfully concluded six weeks of negotiations that led to the purchase of the company.

'Blue-ribbon panelists' hit deception

The National Committee to Preserve Social Security, already under fire for alarmist fund-raising tactics, has stirred new controversy with a clearly deceptive brochure.

The brochure purports to be an "analysis" of recent changes in the social security law by a "blue-ribbon panel" of experts set up by the committee.

The presumed panel members, listed as "sources of information," include AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman and others with high credibility as experts in the field.

But as Seidman said in a Cable News Network television interview, "I never heard of this blue ribbon panel. I was never asked to serve on this blue ribbon panel."

Neither, it turns out were other experts who, along with Seidman, were quoted as if they were taking part in a round-table discussion. The so-called discussion is apparently based on comments made by the experts on other occasions or in interviews with persons not identifying themselves with the committee.

Seidman termed it "outrageous" that the brochure purports to be the product of a "so-called blue-ribbon panel" that turns out to be "a figment of somebody's imagination."

Scare tactics

Earlier, the committee had come under sharp criticism for playing on the fears of the elderly for the continuation of their social security benefits and the respect that the name of Roosevelt receives from a New Deal generation.

James Roosevelt, the 77-year-old son of Franklin D. Roosevelt and a former congressman, set up the organization and linked up with a California direct-mail operation that had helped push through Proposition 13, the anti-tax referendum.

Fund-raising letters signed by Roosevelt proclaimed, "My father started social security. Now we must act to save social security and Medicare."

CNN Reporter Jack Mitchell said some fund-raising letters appeared to be government communications. "Some elderly people apparently thought they had to donate money to the committee in order to continue receiving their social security benefits."

While organizations such as the National Council of Senior Citizens were organizing coalitions and mobilizing its chapters across the country, the Roosevelt organization was raising millions of dollars in funds and veering erratically across the political landscape. Roosevelt himself supported Reagan's re-election.

Workers get heavier load as rich gain

As an example of calculations tracing the change in the effective tax burden, one variant described by the study showed that in 1966 federal, state and local taxes were at 16.8 percent of adjusted family income in the lowest income group and at 30.1 percent of adjusted income in the highest group. In figures projected for 1985, the tax burden has gone up to 21.9 percent of income for the lowest group and declined to 25.3 percent for the richest group.

Pechman said the decline in progressivity of the tax system over the last 20 years was caused by a decline in the progressivity of federal taxes.

Individual income taxes remained progressive over the period, but less so at the end than at the beginning because of the effect of "bracket creep" resulting from the growth of real incomes as well as inflation and the 1981 federal tax cuts.

Using the same set of variables, Pechman found that federal taxes alone rose from 7.8 percent of adjusted family income for the lower income groups in 1966 to 13.9 percent by 1985. For the upper income groups, however, federal taxes declined from 21.1 percent in 1966 to 17.1 percent of adjusted income in 1985.

Pechman's research also underscored a dramatic shift in tax burdens from capital to labor income. Using the same set of assumptions as above, the tax burden on capital income was almost twice as large in 1966 as it is now. Other variants described in the study show that in 1985, the effective tax rate on labor income is almost twice as large as on capital income.

Reagan responsible

The study points out that while other changes in the federal tax system have taken place since 1966, the figures show that the 1981 changes enacted at the urging of the Reagan Administration accelerated the shift in the tax burden.

Between 1980 and 1985, according to the data, the effective federal income tax rates rose in all the lower- and middle-income groups and remained unchanged or declined for the richest family-income groups—people with incomes of $50,000 and up.

Even though lower-income groups also received some of the tax cuts, much of that was eaten away by inflation that had put those families into higher tax brackets, the study found.

At the top end of the scale, meanwhile, the federal income tax burden dropped from 11.5 percent of adjusted family income to 10.3 percent because of the rate reduction and other changes enacted. Among those, the study said, were the reduction in the long-term capital gains tax rate and the increase in deductions for Individual Retirement Accounts. Those factors more than offset increases in incomes during the period.

Doing their share

Big boost to fund-raising for the United Cerebral Palsy Telethon in Chicago is provided by the city's labor movement. Nearly $175,000 in contributions were pledged in just the hour sponsored by the Chicago AFL-CIO. More than $40,000 in contributions were made by local labor groups in on-the-air presentations. During the telecast, reporter Mary Ann Childers interviews Chicago Federation Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Healey, left, and President Edward F. Brabec.

First of Reagan Cabinet shifts gains confirmation by Senate

The Senate confirmed President Reagan's nomination of James Baker III to be Secretary of the Treasury, clearing the way for the other half of the big White House job swap.

As Baker moved across the street to the Treasury Dept., former Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan replaced him as the President's chief of staff—the central figure in the White House hierarchy.

A somewhat reluctant promise by the President not to seek abolition of the Dept. of Education cleared the way for quick Senate confirmation of William J. Bennett as Secretary of Education.

The department's future was a major issue at confirmation hearings by the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee. Senators from both parties sought a firm assurance that Bennett was not being put in office to preside over the dissolution of the department.

Reagan then wrote Committee Chairman Orrin B. Hatch (R-Utah) that he still favors abolishing the department. But recognizing that there is "very little support in Congress" for such an action, Reagan wrote, "I have no intention of recommending the abolition of the department to Congress at this time."

The Senate was in no hurry, however, to take up the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General.

Meese, a top aide to the President throughout his first term and a close associate before then, has been under heavy criticism for his past financial dealings and appearances of conflict of interest.

The White House view is that a special counsel's finding that Meese had not violated any law proves that he is "not a crook" and should be confirmed. But Democratic senators and some Republicans have insisted on a more thorough probing of Meese's conduct and qualifications to be the nation's chief law enforcer.

The latest stumbling block to Judiciary Committee approval of his nomination was the disclosure that staff attorneys in the Office of Government Ethics had reported that Meese had "probably" violated federal ethical standards, but they were overruled by their superior.

Lawyers' fees

Meese has applied for reimbursement from the federal government for more than $720,000 in legal fees he said he incurred in defending himself during the investigation of his conduct. The fees include $225-an-hour pay for his principal attorney, even though the Administration has proposed limiting the reimbursement of lawyers who are on the winning side in civil rights cases to $75 an hour. Meese said he supports the $75 ceiling, but since it is not yet in effect he considers the $225 fee request proper.

On deck, although with less controversy, are the nominations of John S. Herrington as Secretary of Energy and Donald P. Hodel as Secretary of the Interior.

The other Cabinet members are holdovers from Reagan's first term, although Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan remains on unpaid leave while defending himself against criminal charges based on actions he took as a construction company executive before his appointment to the Cabinet.

New push starts for civil rights bill

A labor-supported civil rights bill that was derailed in the last Congress has been reintroduced with bipartisan sponsorship.

It carries the title of the Civil Rights Restoration Act, and its intent is to undo the damage inflicted by the Supreme Court's controversial Grove City College decision a year ago.

As in the last Congress, there is a difference of opinion over the scope of the legislation.

The Reagan Administration and its allies in the Senate have taken the position that any remedial legislation should deal only with the 1972 education law which bars sex discrimination in educational programs and activities receiving federal funds.

There is general agreement that the Supreme Court misread the intent of Congress in holding that the ban applied only to specific programs using federal money, not to the educational institution as a whole.

But the civil rights coalition, including the AFL-CIO, considers the court's ruling to be a threat to other anti-discrimination laws.

Their bill, like the version the House passed last year, would apply to portions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the 1973 Rehabilitation Act and the 1975 Age Discrimination Act, as well as to the education law, which is generally referred to as Title IX.

Bill sponsors

The House bill's co-sponsors include Chairman Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) and Rep. James M. Jeffords (R-Vt.), the ranking minority member of the Education & Labor Committee, and Rep. Don Edwards (D-Calif.), whose Judiciary subcommittee will handle the bill.

The legislation is similar to the measure the House approved by a 375-32 vote in the 98th Congress, with changes to clarify its intent.

There is less unanimity in the Senate, where Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.) has introduced an Administration-backed bill considerably more limited than the civil rights coalition has urged.

It would partially remedy the Grove City decision, but leave in doubt the status of other civil rights laws applying to federally assisted programs.

Despite the Administration position, a number of Republicans have aligned themselves with the civil rights coalition on this issue. The counterpart to the House bill will have as principal Senate sponsors Republicans Lowell P. Weicker (Conn.), Charles McC. Mathias (Md.) and Bob Packwood (Ore.), as well as Democrat Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.).

Tax incentives fail to expand investments

to every taxpayer." It shifts the tax burden from profitable businesses to middle-income and low-income taxpayers, they stressed, while enlarging the federal deficit.

McIntyre and Tipps found the largest loophole to be the Accelerated Cost Recovery System—the big write-off for business investments in plant and equipment adopted in the 1981 Reagan tax bill.

With other loopholes, such as the investment tax credit, the revenue loss is more costly than any other program in the budget except defense and the self-financing social security system.

The cost to the Treasury—estimated at some $100 billion a year—is "far more than all federal programs for the poor combined," the study notes.

The reason why tax incentives didn't produce the investment gains anticipated, the study suggests, is that "in the real world, companies invest only when they need new plant and equipment to produce products they can sell to consumers. When consumers don't spend money, plants are idled and new investment drops."

The chairman of a major U.S. corporation is quoted as explaining to the New York Times that "with or without the tax bill, we would have done what we did in 1981 and what we plan to do in 1982."

The tax breaks did indeed increase cash flow for corporations, making it possible for firms to use the added funds for additional investment. But the study notes that the extra cash is equally available for increasing dividends, corporate acquisitions or raising executive salaries.

It terms the revenue waste "intolerable" when domestic needs are squeezed and the government faces annual budget deficits over $200 billion "for as far as the eye can see."

Yale University blue-collar unit ratifies contract

New Haven, Conn.—Intense bargaining between Yale University and Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 35 produced a new three-year contract without a strike. It was ratified by a vote of 362-17.

The contract provides the 1,000 blue-collar service workers improvements in job security, wages, pensions and retirees' health benefits, as well as adding a dental plan for the first time, Local 35 Business Agent Frank Robinson said.

Local 35 reached the agreement a week after white-collar workers of sister HERE Local 34 settled its contract dispute with the university.

Local 35 members stood firm in honoring the picket lines of Local 34 during its 10-week strike last fall. Local 34's unit of 2,600 ratified its first contract with the university Jan. 22, and voted to honor Local 35's picket lines if a strike occurred.

Under the Local 35 agreement wages were increased 15, 30 or 50 cents an hour, depending on job grade. All increases were retroactive to Jan. 19. The contract retains the cost-of-living adjustment formula from the previous agreement.

The union negotiated limits on the university's contracting out of work normally performed by unit members. Robinson said the university and the union will jointly decide what construction and maintenance work can be subcontracted.

Another key item concerned the guarantee of work for 52 weeks a year for those workers who are normally on layoff during the periods when the university is shut down for vacations and semester breaks. Robinson said the guarantee was necessary because of changes that were made in the eligibility requirements in the state's unemployment compensation law.

The New Regulations

BY TEXTBOOK definition, regulations are the device by which Executive Branch agencies administer laws enacted by Congress.

That's the way government is supposed to work. But don't count on it. Not under this Administration.

Increasingly, regulations have been used to bypass Congress and change the intent of laws.

Congress mandates a safe and healthy workplace. But the Occupational Safety & Health Administration grants dispensations instead of cracking down on offenders.

The Davis-Bacon Act prescribes prevailing wages and benefits for federally funded construction. It's not politically feasible to repeal the law. So, bypassing Congress, the Labor Dept. undercuts long-established protections through the regulatory process. Similarly, the department set up to advance the interests of American workers flouts the intent of the Service Contract Act and opens the door for a return to the evils of industrial homework.

Established policies of the National Labor Relations Board are reversed without changing the law.

NOW, we read of new rules being reversed by the Immigration & Naturalization Service to make it easier for large growers to bring foreign workers into the United States to harvest fruit and vegetables.

There is already a program under which temporary foreign workers can be let in if employers can demonstrate that "qualified persons in the United States are not available" and that the employment of aliens would not impair the wages or working conditions of "similarly employed U.S. workers."

But employers, seeking a ready supply of cheap and preferably docile workers, have long complained that the procedure is too cumbersome and restrictive. To get around the rules, they've been "forced" to seek out and use illegal aliens.

In the last Congress, some otherwise desirable features of immigration reform legislation were fatally flawed by a House-passed provision opening the door to greater importation of foreign workers.

Congress didn't change the law. The legislation was not enacted. But the Immigration & Naturalization Service is apparently going ahead with plans to achieve a greater influx of foreign farm labor through regulation.

THE FEDERAL COURT system does provide a check, though often inconsistent, of the more extreme violations of congressional intent by the Executive Branch. But in the historic pattern of courts following the election returns, the influx of Reagan appointees increasingly is reflected in judicial decisions.

That kicks the ball back to Congress. It must spell out its intent in such an unmistakable manner that neither government agencies nor the judiciary can find grounds for an alternate interpretation.

Such rigidity eliminates the flexibility that has been considered desirable in the regulatory process. But if you can't trust the regulators, there's not much alternative.

Lesson in Unionism

YALE UNIVERSITY'S white-collar employees celebrated their first contract with cheers and labor songs. Not many of the members, mostly women drawn to unionism by resentment of second-class pay, had known the words of Solidarity Forever when they took to the picket line last fall. But they learned its message quickly.

The university's already organized service and blue-collar workers had helped their cause by refusing to cross the picket lines of the new unit.

Now the blue-collar unit was approaching its contract deadline. An agreement was reached without a strike—after the clerical workers made it clear they were not going to cross anyone's picket line.

That's what solidarity is all about.

Reagan budget priorities point to more hard times

By Press Associates, Inc.

On Jan. 20, the front page of the Baltimore Sun described the opening of President Reagan's second term in these headlines: "Reagan sworn in officially today," "Inaugural a mecca for opulence," and "U.S. budget aides drop 1,500 medical grants—$1.5 billion in cuts targeted, program at Hopkins to close."

If these stories reflect Reagan's priorities, the next four years look like hard ones for workers, the elderly, minorities and the needy.

The inaugural was opulent, indeed, as befits an Administration for the rich and by the rich. But its budget cuts already under way, in defiance of Congress, show a pennywise, pound-foolish callousness toward the needs of the American people.

Reagan's Office of Management & Budget, according to the Sun's story, aims to save $1.5 billion on medical research over the next four years by ordering the National Institutes of Health to cancel 1,500 grants approved last year by Congress.

Medical researchers are alarmed because, according to Dr. John Sherman of the Association of American Medical Colleges, the cuts come just as 15 years of basic research in biochemistry now make it possible to advance into diagnosis and treatment.

Medical research cut

The Sun said neurologists at Johns Hopkins Hospital and medical school cite their Huntington's disease project as an example. Researchers at Hopkins and Harvard University in the past four years have developed a test that would tell a person early in life if he might develop this devastating, degenerative disease. Half the children of a parent with Huntington's disease inherit it, but they do not know until middle age whether they carry the disease gene. Reagan's cutbacks would end this project.

In another area, the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) identified 249 workplaces in 42 states where more than 200,000 workers face high risks of developing cancer, heart or lung disease or other ailments. Yet the Dept. of Health & Human Services killed a $4 million budget request for a "worker notification" program, citing cost and fear of alarming the communities.

These two decisions—ending vital medical research and letting workers die a slow death—represent the trench warfare in Reagan's Washington.

Deficit thinking

Reagan, at 73 the nation's oldest president, in his inaugural address repeated his notion that economic growth "will be our strongest tool to bring down budget deficits." His next words were, "an almost unbroken 50 years of deficit spending has finally brought us to a time of reckoning."

This incredible statement ignores the fact that Reagan himself nearly quadrupled the federal deficit he started with. In his second term, the New York Times observed, Reagan "will have borrowed more than all previous presidents combined."

The chief reason for today's deficit crisis, of course, is the $750 billion in tax cuts and give-aways to business and the rich in 1981, depriving the government of revenue while Reagan pursued his military build-up.

Reagan has a knack of making a majority of people feel good about themselves and their country. But what about the rest of America?

In recent years, some 35 million people have been forced downward out of the middle class. Medicaid supposedly covers the needy, but an estimated 25 million poor people lack medical care. Some estimates put the homeless at 3 million. Nearly 10 million people are jobless or workforce dropouts and less than a third of the unemployed receive jobless benefits.

During the campaign, Reagan told a rally, "You ain't seen nothing yet." That's something to worry about.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Deficit and Taxes Major Themes of 99th Congress

Deficit Cuts Could Peril Thousands of Union Jobs

Congress will be looking under every rock and behind every tree to uncover new places to cut programs, reduce costs and make a dent in the deficit.

One plan being tossed around Congress would involve stopping all scheduled increases in federal outlays. This means freezing items like federal pay, Social Security payments, and stopping proposed budget increases in everything from assistance programs to the defense budget.

The plan has two serious weaknesses. First, if all increases were stopped cold, it would still fall far short of the $50 billion sought to put a dent in the deficit. Second, the largest bite would come out of the defense budget -- something few believe Congress will attempt.

Another alternative is outright cuts in existing federal programs. This would be a phase two of the infamous Reagan budget cuts of his first term.

These cuts would threaten the pay or security of virtually every union family in one way or another. Some of the cutbacks now being eyed by Congress for fiscal year 1986 include:

*$1.8 billion from railroad retirement, black lung benefits, food stamps, Social Security, veteran's pensions, and other programs.

*$248 million from Civil Service Retirement

*$120 million from the job corps

*$535 million from Amtrak

*$798 million from mass transit

*$4.5 billion from revenue sharing programs.

These programs are not government give-aways, but represent much of the backbone of our economy. They support thousands of jobs in government, and in the private sector in construction, transportation and other critical industries. However, these programs and many more are on the chopping block this year when Congress begins wrestling with the deficit.

The Legislative Alert! resumes regular publication now that Congress is back in session.

Reagan Administration Seeks to Tax Workers' Benefits

As the new Congress begins to wrestle with America's near-trillion-dollar deficit, efforts will be made to find new revenues by taxing health care programs and other life support benefits most Americans rely upon during medical and economic emergencies.

Congressional leaders seek to reduce the nation's deficit by at least $50 billion, and the Reagan Administration is already working on a $25 billion tax on the health insurance and other life support benefits.

The plan is part of a so-called "Tax simplification" program, submitted recently by the Treasury Department. However, it is expected that when budget debate fails to bring substantial reduction through program cuts, Congress will look to tax areas for a "quick fix" to bring in large sums of revenue.

Despite the fact that the yearly deficits are largely due to the massive 1981 tax cuts to corporations and wealthy individuals, the likelihood is that Congress will ignore the fat cats and look at the taxation of health care programs, workers compensation, all of unemployment compensation and employer-provided legal services, education benefits and life insurance.

Never mind that millions of working families rely on their health insurance to protect them from medical disaster; never mind that the employer-supported health plans have been an economical alternative to a national health insurance system; the Reagan Administration has decided that these benefits are only "perks" and should be taxed like any other income.

Will Congress go along with the idea? If workers and their families don't speak up, Congress will see this as an easy way to pick up $25 billion. Whether we can stop this assault on the health and economic security of our families will be one of the major struggles in Congress this year.

The AFL-CIO and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce have both issued statements condemning the proposed taxes. Other business and labor groups have announced opposition and have vowed all-out fights.

"The AFL-CIO supports just and fair measures to reduce the deficit," Kirkland said, "but to heap more of the tax burden on working people -- particularly in the areas of health, education, pensions, unemployment insurance and worker compensation -- would result in more injustice, not less."

The Chamber of Commerce statement declared: "From day to day, our social insurance and employee benefits systems help tens of millions of Americans...it makes neither social nor economic sense to reduce these benefits through increased taxation."

A preliminary check of the House and Senate reveals that the overwhelming majority of members have not taken a position and could go either way on the issue. Thus it is important that they hear at once from you voicing your opposition.

Here's how the tax on health care will increase taxes for anyone with a health care program.

If an employer pays more than $70 per month for health insurance for a single person, or more than $175 per month for family coverage, the amount above these figures would be added to the income a worker pays taxes on. If an employer pays $250 per month for family coverage, for instance, taxes would be owed on $75 per month, or a total of $900 at year end.

Federal Judge Rules for Union

Last Year's Bankruptcy Law Victory Continues to Save Jobs and Contracts

A federal judge recently stopped a Minnesota company from using Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy law to break its contract with a local of the Teamsters union. The ruling saved the jobs and contract benefits of the union workers. The Wisconsin action continued the string of successes wherein not a single company has been able to use Chapter 11 proceedings to break a union contract since the law was changed last year.

In deciding against the company, Judge Robert J. Kressel applied the new law, which the AFL-CIO and union activists across the country helped enact with a massive grass roots letter-writing campaign to congressmen and senators. The law overturned a 1984 Supreme Court decision which allowed employers to tear up their collective bargaining agreements whenever they found them to be a financial burden.

Judge Kressel ruled that the company had the burden of proof in asking for a wage reduction during a reorganization, and American Provision Company had not met that test. He pointed out that the proposed wage reduction would have represented about two percent of the company's total expenses and would be borne disproportionately in relation to total costs. He also ruled that the company had failed to confer with the union in "good faith" on the wage reduction proposal.

Reagan budget blueprint seeks wipeout of domestic programs

Battling union-busters

Idaho union members march on state house to protest the anti-union "right-to-work" law passed over the governor's veto and to serve notice on the Republican-dominated legislature that the battle is far from over. The next step is a petition campaign to reverse the action through referendum. (Story, Page 4.)

Kirkland says council will shape alternative

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan asked Congress to shrink the non-military functions of government permanently and drastically to keep the deficit generated by his tax policies from bursting out of control.

Reagan claimed victory for his economic program, but said the domestic cuts and military increases enacted during his first term weren't enough.

More must be done, he insisted, "to reduce excessive federal benefits to special interest groups."

The new budget proposal continues to gnaw away at programs for the poor, the elderly and the ill. But it targets also student loans and housing programs. It would cut the pay and pensions of federal workers, scrap the Amtrak passenger train network, encourage shipping companies to have their vessels built abroad instead of in the United States and make veterans over 65 pass a means test before getting VA hospital care.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed labor's dismay at the Reagan budget. He said the federation's Executive Council will propose "alternative solutions" to the deficit problem at its winter meeting, which starts Feb. 18.

Kirkland said the deficit stems largely from the "enormity" of the tax cuts enacted in 1981, which tilted heavily toward the wealthy and businesses. The deficit should be addressed by closing tax loopholes, he urged, and by slowing defense spending.

Reagan asked for a $285.7 billion national defense budget for the fiscal year starting next Oct. 1. That's a $58.3 billion rise from last year and a $31.9 billion increase from the estimate for the current fiscal year.

Labor's position, Kirkland noted, has been that any justified increase in military spending should be accompanied by a tax earmarked to pay for it—not left as a burden for future generations or paid for by cutbacks affecting primarily "the less privileged sectors of our society."

Unfairness admitted

In his budget message and especially in his State of the Union address later in the week, Reagan acknowledged "unfairness" in the tax system. But he insisted that the goal should be "tax simplification" along the general lines of the controversial Treasury Dept. proposal rather than increased revenue.

Reagan reiterated support for several revenue-losing measures that would add to the budget deficit, including income tax credits for private school tuition and a higher ceiling on tax-deferred IRA accounts for non-working spouses. The top tax bracket, reached only by the highest income households, should be dropped from 50 to 35 percent, Reagan urged. He also backed a rise in the personal income tax exemption to benefit families.

In both messages, Reagan renewed his call for a cut in the minimum wage for teenagers during the summer months—touting it as a "youth employment opportunity wage." His solution to urban pov-

Labor hits scheme to tax key life support benefits

The trade union movement opened a major legislative campaign to defeat proposals to impose a new tax on workers that would target their health insurance and other employment-related benefits.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland wrote members of the House and Senate to express labor's concern at the threat to "life support benefits" that were pioneered by unions but have now become "a fixture in American life."

Employer-provided health and life insurance, dental coverage, child care, prepaid legal plans and other job benefits would be taxed under various "flat tax" measures and the "tax simplification" proposals advanced by the Treasury Dept.

The Treasury proposal would require American workers to pay an additional $24 billion a year in taxes by 1990, Kirkland noted. "Since 75 percent of workers covered by health and life insurance plans earn less than $25,000, this benefits tax would hurt those working people who could least afford it," he stressed.

Such a tax would build pressure on employers in both union and non-union establishments to freeze or reduce employee benefits, Kirkland said.

"Young and single workers would be pitted against older workers and those with families," he warned.

Kirkland's letter to members of Congress noted that more than 90 percent of all full-time workers are covered by health insurance plans and many millions have other job benefits that have become commonplace "with the support of Congress."

Legislation to tax these benefits would breach "a long-standing congressional commitment to encourage these programs," he said. Such a tax scheme unfairly penalizes workers and prevents the continued development of privately financed social and economic benefits.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said federation affiliates are planning a grass-roots lobbying and postcard campaign to emphasize worker concerns about the attack on benefits and wages.

Reagan economic forecast called rosy and unrealistic

By James M. Shevis

Four more years of pie-in-the-sky, "supply-side" Reaganomics and the nation's economy may be beyond repair, the AFL-CIO warned as the Administration presented its economic outlook for the rest of the decade.

In a detailed analysis of the President's Economic Report to Congress and the annual report of the President's Council of Economic Advisers which accompanied it, Deputy Research Director Henry B. Schechter challenged its claims and assumptions.

The President's seven-page report, along with the 343-page CEA document, takes full credit for the recovery of the past two years. It virtually ignores the severe Reagan Recession of 1981-82, with its double-digit unemployment and finds scapegoats to blame for all economic problems.

The Republicans insist that they inherited problems from the preceding Administration, and it is the fault of the Federal Reserve Board that the recession was so long and severe and that economic growth has slowed markedly since last summer.

Classic squeeze

Rather than the optimistic assessment offered by the President, Schechter noted that a more realistic analysis of economic developments of the past four years shows the Administration resorted to a "classical economic squeeze to reduce economic activity in order to bring down inflation."

True, the Fed played a major role in this effort by pursuing a tight-money, high-interest rates policy, he observed. But the

Rising unemployment trend puts rate at 7.4% for January

The nation's civilian jobless rate rose to 7.4 percent in January, the highest level since last September and a portent of bleaker times for American workers.

The increase of two-tenths of a percent was the second consecutive monthly advance and brought the rate to virtually the same level as last May's 7.5-percent rate. If workers employed part-time because full-time work was not available and "discouraged" workers were factored into the count, the rate would have been much higher.

"This lack of improvement in the unemployment picture over eight months suggests there is little hope for the 8.5 million unemployed unless major efforts are undertaken to provide job opportunities for those who want to work and cannot find a job," the AFL-CIO declared.

President Reagan's latest budget figures show no signs that the Administration is going to do anything to create jobs, Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland confers with Japanese Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone in Tokyo. Others in the delegation included Kirkland's executive assistant, Kenneth Young; International Affairs Director Irving Brown, and Charles Gray of the Asian American Free Labor Institute, a foreign policy arm of the AFL-CIO.

U.S., Japanese labor stress need for 'social criteria' in trade policy

Tokyo—Leaders of the labor movements of the United States and Japan joined in urging their governments to take "social criteria" into account when they negotiate international trade rules.

In a joint statement following the federation's 16th annual meeting with the Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei) here, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Domei President Tadanobu Usami said the case for social clauses in trade agreements between their two countries has become "a greater necessity" in the face of the continuing worldwide economic recession.

"Labor standards—wages and labor costs and their determination, working time, health and safety, social security provisions—become an increasingly important factor in determining the comparative position of trading partners," the statement said.

"Erosion of these social safeguards becomes, in effect, a strong protectionist device."

Addressing the opening-day session of the three-day meeting, Kirkland said social criteria must weigh heavily, not only in bilateral trade agreements, but also in the loan and credit decisions of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

"The policies of international bankers should not be governed by narrow monetary considerations alone without regard to their impact on the living standards and political rights of working people," he declared.

Kirkland was accompanied by his executive assistant, Kenneth Young, AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown, and Charles Gray, deputy director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute. They also met with leaders of Sohyo, Japan's other major labor confederation, and other labor organizations with an eye toward seeking their eventual affiliation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Nakasone meeting

Kirkland also used the occasion of his visit to speak with Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone and other Japanese government officials about the concern of American labor over violations of trade union rights by Japanese companies with manufacturing facilities in America.

He spoke about the use of union-busting management consultants by these companies to advise them on how to get around U.S. labor laws.

The joint AFL-CIO/Domei statement affirmed that the two labor organizations would cooperate in the ICFTU, the International Labor Organization, and the Trade Union Advisory Committee of the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development in a number of activities to promote a world in which workers "may live in peace and prosperity."

The statement called on the governments of major countries to seek agreements to abolish weapons of war that threaten human survival and to bring about disarmament through negotiations.

"The free trade unionists of the world stand ready to engage in all efforts to reduce both nuclear and conventional arms through mutual agreements and reject any approach based upon unilateral disarmament," the two organizations declared.

The AFL-CIO and Domei also noted that, notwithstanding some slight recovery in the world economy, high unemployment remains a primary concern "and there is the threat of a further increase in the number of unemployed workers throughout the world."

Rights violations

Participants in the annual meeting also expressed concern over continuing violations of human and trade union rights of workers by governments and multinational corporations in many countries, including Poland, Chile, and South Africa.

"The absence of freedom, especially in the aggressive totalitarian countries, constitutes the greatest barrier to the attainment of world peace," the joint statement observed.

It also pledged the cooperation of the two trade union organizations to strengthen the ILO so that it is able to achieve the objectives for which it was originally established—to set fair international labor standards and protect trade union and human rights.

"It has become more important to achieve international harmonization of labor standards, especially in international trade," the statement said.

The two organizations also agreed to urge the governments of advanced nations to adopt recovery policies that recognize the need for lower interest rates, greater domestic demand, and reduced working hours.

The AFL-CIO also pledged strong support for Domei's efforts to obtain the return of the Northern Territories, occupied and annexed illegally by the Soviet Union.

Coalition formed to preserve policy on media fairness

The AFL-CIO is working with a coalition of concerned groups in an effort to prevent the Reagan Administration from tampering with the "fairness doctrine" that covers broadcasters.

The fairness doctrine, established 50 years ago with the passage of the Communications Act, guarantees that the public receives a diversity of viewpoints on important issues.

This policy is especially important to labor, the federation said in a statement at the announcement of the formation of the coalition—the Campaign for Free Speech.

"Those who control the electronic media are themselves employers, and have a natural alliance with other employer groups," the AFL-CIO noted.

"Where disputes arise between employers and employees pertaining to employee rights, the fairness doctrine permits the workers' side of such disputes to be aired over commercial television and radio.

"Without the fairness doctrine, only one side of such issues would be aired in many communities throughout the nation. It is no coincidence that the most anti-worker Administration in more than 50 years is behind the effort to repeal the fairness doctrine," the AFL-CIO stressed.

The coalition of 17 member organizations—representing labor, religious, education and civil rights groups—is seeking to prevent the Communications Commission from scrapping or significantly altering the doctrine. Its formation was announced at a Capitol Hill press conference called by Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Energy & Commerce Committee, which has jurisditcion over the FCC.

EPA scored for delay on asbestos rule

The Environmental Protection Agency's decision to delay regulations on asbestos and to refer questions on the cancer-causing mineral to other agencies is "a blatant kind of action that is being orchestrated by the President's Office of Management & Budget," the AFL-CIO charged.

EPA's unpublished proposal to ban asbestos is still under review by the White House and "OMB is making them do this because it doesn't want asbestos banned," charged Margaret Seminario, the federation's industrial hygienist.

Seminario said EPA has the right and the duty under the Toxic Substances Control Act to regulate asbestos and to phase in a ban over a period of time, while safer substitute substances are introduced. Further, it can require testing of those substitutes, she said.

Instead of regulating the cancer-causing substance, EPA resorted to a never-before used procedure in calling on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Consumer Products Safety Commission to review the need for regulation.

"The bottom line on this is that industry doesn't want asbestos banned, and therefore, OMB doesn't want it either," Seminario charged. OSHA is already considering stiffening its standard on asbestos to provide somewhat better safeguards.

Although EPA has been considering an asbestos ban since 1978 and OSHA has worked nearly as long on a revised standard, EPA is now buying more time before probably deciding not to take any action, Seminario said. She noted that EPA is more likely to deem the actions being taken by OSHA and the CPSC as sufficient.

Languishing proposal

EPA's proposal to ban asbestos was made in July 1983. It would have ended some uses of asbestos immediately with others phased out over 10 years. But OMB blocked the regulation, claiming that the costs would be excessive.

Under the EPA action, the two agencies will have 90 days to respond to the questions about asbestos and another 90 days to begin actions of their own if they find EPA's position is valid.

EPA is already under fire from labor for "covering up" asbestos dangers. The Service Employees filed suit in January to force the agency to issue stronger regulations for the removal of asbestos from schools and to extend it to all public and private buildings.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney noted that asbestos manufacturers and the government have known for 50 years that "asbestos is a highly dangerous carcinogen and for all those years there has been an effective coverup of the truth." He charged the agency made a "political decision to hide the facts.

Job safety agenda

Labor's 1985 agenda to eliminate workplace hazards is drafted by the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health. The committee, chaired by Vice President J. C. Turner, explored actions needed to prevent tragedies, such as the chemical accident in Bhopal, India, which killed more than 2,000 persons. Panel members also focused on the need to improve right-to-know regulations on toxic substances.

Budget ax aimed at vital programs

There is scarcely a non-military aspect of government that would not be damaged by the budget President Reagan submitted to Congress, and a full accounting requires hundreds of pages of budget documents.

Many programs on Reagan's chopping block are of special concern to the trade union movement.

Other proposed cutbacks threaten to wipe out the remnants of America's family farms, severely reduce federal support for education, performing arts and humanities, and abolish help for small businesses.

State and local governments would be especially hard hit. General revenue sharing would be ended, reducing federal funds at the same time that federal matching grants and other assistance programs are targeted for major cuts. The inevitable effect would be to force cities and states to severely curtail services or raise taxes substantially.

Here is how some key programs would be affected:

Workers' needs

The Labor Dept.'s budget proposal calls on Congress to reduce the minimum wage for young workers and eliminate the Job Corps, the residential training programs for disadvantaged school dropouts. It also would cut back funds for public-sector summer jobs.

Congress last year ignored the Administration's proposal to lower the minimum wage for workers under 20 from $3.35 an hour to $2.50 during five spring-to-fall months. But Under Sec. of Labor Ford B. Ford said the Administration will renew its push for enactment of what he termed the Youth Employment Opportunity Act. He said lower pay will help young people gain "skills and experience that will enhance their long-term career prospects." Critics suggest the goal is to let fast-food chains reduce their payroll costs.

The Administration said it wants to close down the Job Corps because the residential training program is too costly. It costs about as much as sending a student to Harvard, the budget proposal explained. But it's cheaper than keeping an inmate in prison, a staff analysis by the House Budget Committee retorted.

There is no provision in the budget for continued funding of national programs under the Job Training Partnership Act and staff cuts are mandated for virtually all of the department's components. The prestigious Monthly Labor Review would become a quarterly publication.

The Administration insisted that staff cuts would not reduce the number of workplace inspections by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, or the number of mine inspections. It said enforcement of wage-hour laws and federal contract compliance "will continue to emphasize voluntary compliance."

Education

The Reagan Administration proposes to "reform" the college student aid program by drastically reducing both the number to be assisted and the amount of help they can get. The budget explanation complains of a "20-year-binge" of low-income grants, subsidized loans and work-study programs that have "indiscriminately sprayed assistance at students."

It would tighten eligibility for all forms of assistance and limit total federal help, including loans and work programs to a maximum of $4,000 a year. The family income limit for direct federal aid would be set at $25,000 instead of $27,700, and without any offset for high medical expenses or education costs for other family members. The guaranteed student loan cutoff would be set at a $32,500 family income. Low-income families would be required to provide a larger share of education costs and the number of students receiving grants would be reduced by 800,000. Interest rates on loans would be brought closer to the market levels.

Overall spending for elementary, secondary and vocational education would be held under current levels. The Administration budget again calls for a tuition tax credit for parents of children attending private elementary and secondary schools that would reduce federal revenues by $359 million in its first phase and $885 million when fully effective in its third year.

Transportation

Amtrak is a failure and the United States should abandon the concept of a national passenger railroad system, the Administration contends.

It would end all federal subsidies and let Amtrak fall into bankruptcy, sell off its profitable segments and abandon routes that states and localities don't wish to take over. The amounts due laid-off Amtrak employees under their union contracts would have to come from the sale of Amtrak assets. The Administration does not consider the commitment a government obligation.

The Reagan budget would eliminate operating subsidies for local mass transit and all other assistance except capital grants that are now financed by a penny-a-gallon of the federal gasoline tax. It said some bus drivers are paid too much and subway fares are too low in comparison with the cost of driving private cars.

It would end remaining subsidies for small city airport service, saying passengers can take buses or limousines to larger city airports instead.

Having already eliminated ship construction subsidies, the Administration now wants to end the requirement that U.S.-flag vessels qualifying for operating subsidies be built in the United States. Allowing ship operators to build or acquire their vessels in foreign countries will be more "cost effective," the budget document asserts.

In another transportation-linked change, the Administration also proposes ending the management-funded system of sickness and unemployment insurance for railroad workers and putting them under the regular state unemployment insurance programs. Such a change would have virtually no budget impact, but it is favored by management and opposed by unions.

Health

While spending for Medicaid benefits for the poor and Medicare for the elderly would rise, both programs would be cut substantially from the level needed to maintain present services.

The projected $1.3 billion "savings" in federal grants to the states for medical care of the poor would require state governments either to increase their share of the cost or cut back benefits.

The Medicare proposals include a freeze on hospital and physician reimbursement. But they also involve higher premium charges on the elderly for Part B medical insurance, a rise in out-of-pocket deductibles which the Administration terms "long overdue," and charges imposed for home health services that are now free.

Veterans over 65 would no longer be eligible for "space available" treatment at VA hospitals unless they meet strict income limitations.

The program of federal subsidies to help reduce the cost of training health care professionals would be totally eliminated because, the Administration contends, "the supply of trained personnel has outstripped the need."

Housing, development

There would be a two-year moratorium on new commitments for federally assisted housing. It would mean for future years a substantial reduction in public housing construction, rural housing and housing for the elderly and handicapped. The rental housing rehabilitation program, touted just last year as a Reagan Administration "initiative," would be ended.

The Urban Development Action Grant program would be abolished and community development grants reduced.

Again, the Reagan Administration is seeking to end the Economic Development Administration, which it claims has failed to help distressed areas or generate employment, and the Appalachian Regional Commission, which it says is no longer needed because Appalachia is sharing in national economic growth.

Poverty

There was a pre-budget consensus that programs to help the poor had been so battered in the first Reagan Administration that there wasn't much left to cut. But the President's budget planners found a way.

The work incentive program, which was supposed to make it easier for mothers on welfare to take jobs, would be abolished and more stringent work requirements would be mandated. Unmarried minor mothers who do not live with their parents would no longer be eligible for Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). As the Administration sees it, putting the responsibility for support on parents would "enhance family stability."

Child nutrition outlays would be cut $654 million by dropping a cost-of-living increase in payments for school breakfasts and lunches and by tightening eligibility requirements to reduce the number of children eligible.

The Legal Services Corp., which provides legal help for the poor, would be abolished and low-income energy assistance would be held to present levels without regard to higher costs.

Federal employees

The federal civil service has been President Reagan's perennial scapegoat. But government employee unions have good reason for viewing the new budget as the most savage attack yet.

It proposes a 5-percent pay cut for the government's one million civilian employees next January, plus slashes in pension benefits for both active workers and retirees.

The minimum retirement age would be raised, penalties for early retirement increased, the cost-of-living adjustment on pensions eliminated for one year and then permanently reduced through changes in the formula. Computation of the initial pension would be based on a five-year rather than a three-year salary range, and unused sick leave would no longer be credited toward length of service.

Health benefit contributions by the government would be reduced through a new voucher system and some 35,000 jobs would be targeted for elimination on top of cuts made during Reagan's first term.

The Administration defends the proposals by claiming that government pay is "relatively high" and employee benefits are "liberal."

Reagan uses deficit as excuse for more slashes

erty again was to urge enactment of "enterprise zone" tax and regulation concessions intended to attract businesses and "create a new generation of entrepreneurs."

As he had in proposing earlier cuts in social programs, Reagan insisted that "the social safety net for the elderly, disabled and unemployed will be left intact."

But in fact, his budget would require additional out-of-pocket payments by the elderly and poor for health care, the Job Corps would be abolished as too costly, and low-income workers would be taxed on unemployment benefits.

The President proposed to make it easier for public housing residents to acquire ownership of the apartments in which they live. At the same time, his budget called for a two-year halt to any new housing assistance or construction for low-income families.

He called for still further deregulation, an end to farm price supports, lifting of all controls on natural gas prices—and a new round of tariff cuts.

"We have seen the benefits of free trade and lived through the disasters of protectionism," the President said. His budget included a request for Congress to "rescind" a $5 million appropriation for a study of plant closings, many of which have stemmed from import policies. Such a study isn't needed, the Administration contends.

Reagan's first budget after taking office projected that his economic policies would produce a balanced budget by the 1984 fiscal year, with a surplus for both the current year and fiscal 1986.

Deficit spending

The President's proud claim in his State of the Union speech that "we did what we promised" clearly did not refer to budget deficits that the Administration estimates will total $587.6 billion over the three years. But as he has in proposing previous high-deficit budgets, Reagan said the solution is a constitutional amendment that would "require that the government spend no more than it takes in."

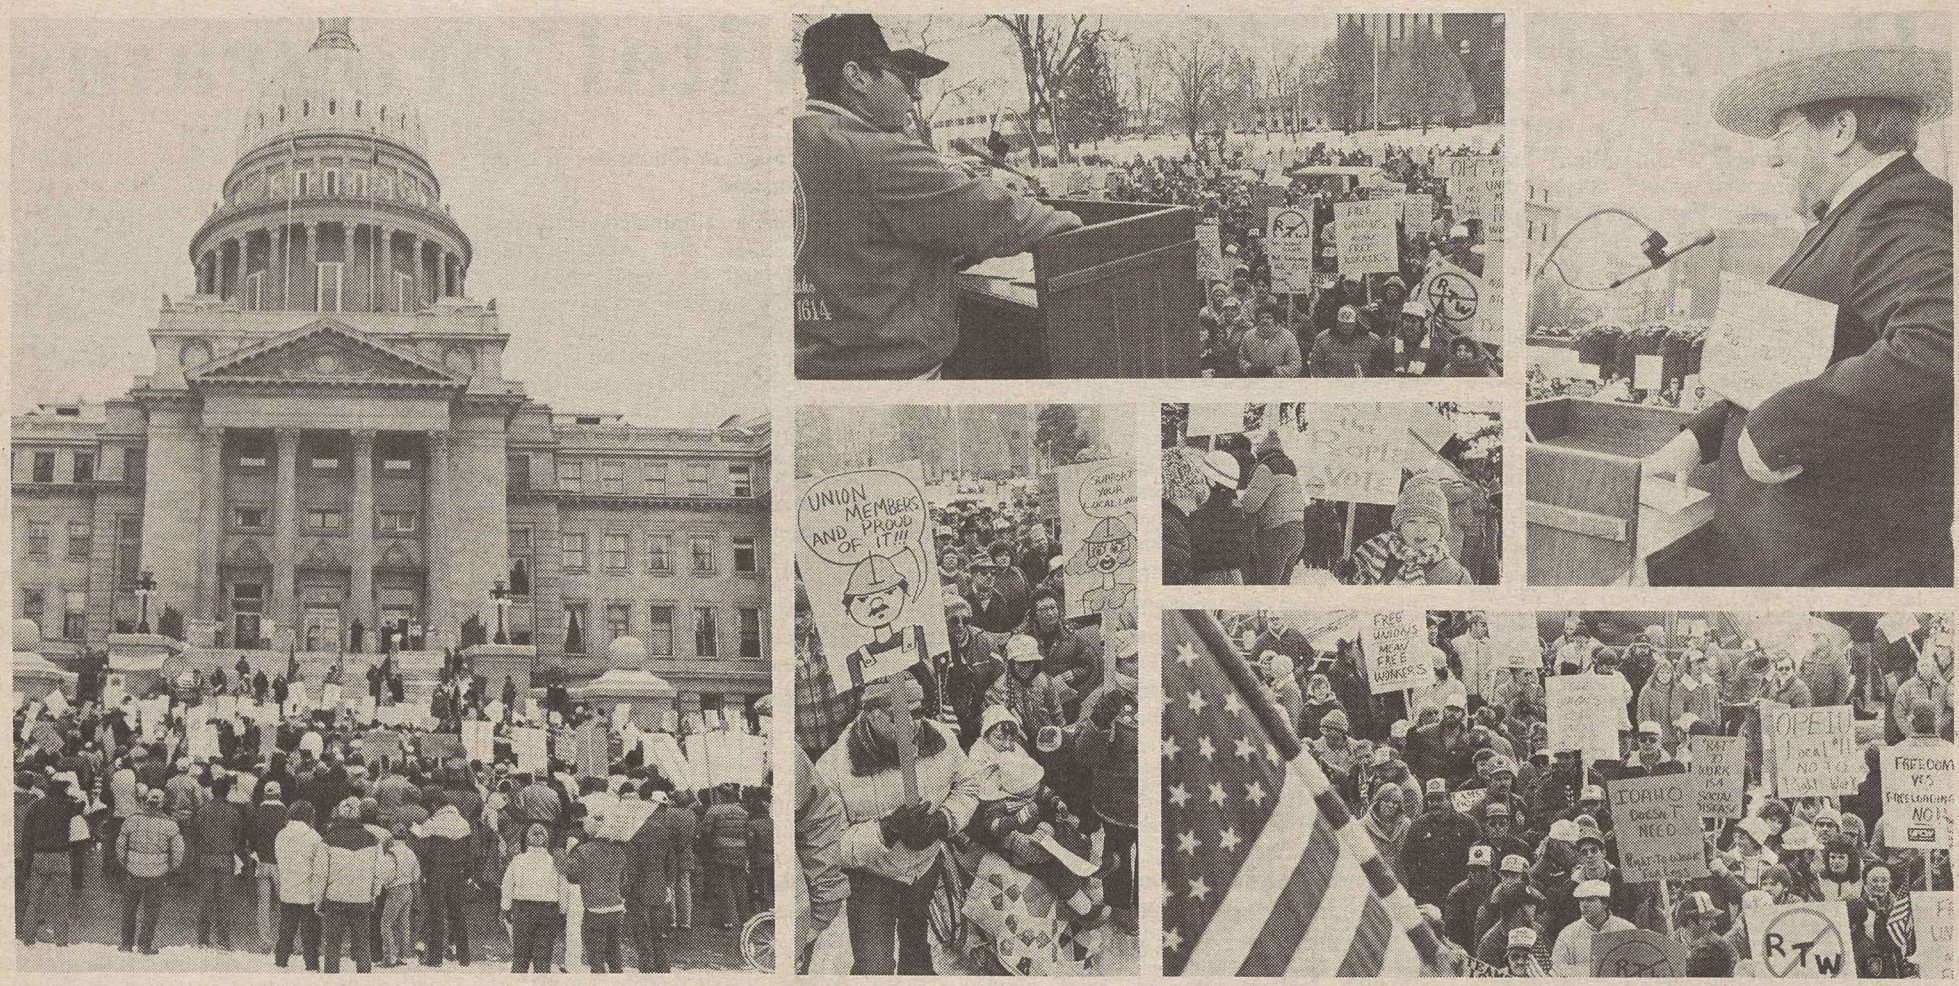
Overall, the President's budget request is for $974 billion in outlays and it estimates $794 billion in revenues. Both the outlays and revenues are substantially increased by inclusion of the self-supporting social security system.

The budget terminology often makes exact comparisons difficult, since programs are sometimes measured against a "current services" figure which represents the amount needed to keep a program on its present course. In entitlement programs, that might mean benefits adjusted for cost-of-living changes. In a military budget, that might involve plans for multi-billion dollar expenditures stemming from weapons decisions previously made.

In the budget documents, spending cuts proposed by the Administration are invariably referred to as "reforms." Thus the proposed cut in federal pensions is described as "civil service retirement and disability reform." A proposal to raise postage charges for publications of nonprofit organizations, including unions, is a "postal service subsidy reform."

The President's budget proposals go now to the congressional committees responsible for shaping the budget resolutions to be acted on by the House and Senate.

An analysis by the staff of the House Budget Committee reinforced labor's criticism.



The rise in the deficit under Reagan, the staff report stressed, "is not the result of uncontrolled domestic spending, but rather of large tax cuts, rising defense spending, and rising interest rates resulting from these policies."

O'Neill's pledge

Senate Republicans, unhappy with the advance warnings of the Reagan budget, had hoped to have an alternative budget in shape that would pre-empt the White House version. But they missed their self-established deadline, unable to reach a consensus.

In the Democratic-controlled House, an apparent good-will gesture by Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., wasn't drawing any rave reviews from Republicans. O'Neill assured the President that the House will have an opportunity to vote on the Reagan budget.

But House Republicans, taking a good look at the budget's contents, didn't seem at all eager for the opportunity.

Union members from across Idaho rally at the state capital to protest the legislature's vote to outlaw union shops.

Battle rages against union shop ban in Idaho

Boise, Ida.—Angry and determined union members have launched a petition campaign to overturn a "right-to-work" law that would make union shops illegal in Idaho.

A legislature dominated by right-wing Republicans overrode a veto by Democratic Gov. John Evans. But a court challenge raised by the Idaho AFL-CIO raised serious doubts about the validity of its action.

The state's trade union movement is challenging the action of the legislature in designating the "right-to-work" measure an "emergency" bill—a category that allows it to take effect immediately on enactment.

Without such a designation, a petition signed by some 33,000 Idaho voters could keep the legislation from taking effect unless it is approved in a referendum vote at the next general election—in November of 1986.

The last time "right-to-work" was on the Idaho ballot—in 1958—it was rejected by the voters.

If the emergency clause is upheld, and if the legislation isn't invalidated by constitutional questions the state labor federation has raised, the union shop ban would be in effect until rejected in a referendum or repealed.

Thousands protest

One of the biggest and most colorful labor demonstrations of recent years brought thousands of union members to Boise for a march that ended at the steps of the statehouse. The protest was sponsored by United Labor of Idaho, which includes unions not affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

Workers carried American flags and signs proclaiming, "Right-to-work means work for less" and "I'm Idaho, I'm union and I'm Mad," among others. A state director of the Communications Workers dressed as a plantation overseer won cheers of his spoof of the anti-union organization pushing the legislation.

But the biggest cheers went to Kurt Julekowski, a native of Poland and a member of the Graphic Communications Union in Boise.

"I know about dictatorships. I lived in a dictatorship," he said. He came to America, Julekowski told the rally, "for the right to work in a union," under a union contract.

In his veto message, Gov. Evans said the legislation would disrupt labor relations in the state and interfere with efforts to revitalize the state's economy.

"Out-of-state interests promoting the 'right-to-work' issue are sowing dissension where none exists," he said.

At least one Republican senator had told reporters privately that he didn't see any need for the legislation. But he nevertheless swallowed his misgivings and the vote to override was by the same two-thirds margin by which the Senate had already passed it—with all Democrats opposed and all Republicans supporting it. In the House, three Republicans voted with the Democrats but the GOP majority had votes to spare.

Legal challenge

Apart from the effective date of the legislation, union attorneys have challenged provisions of the law that would impose criminal penalties for picketing to achieve a union shop, "intimidation" of a worker to join or pay dues to a union or refusal to work with non-union employees.

The legislature quickly let Idaho union members know that "right-to-work" wasn't the only gun in its anti-union arsenal. At the same time they were overriding the governor's veto, the House and Senate took up and passed a bill to repeal the state's prevailing wage law, which is based on the federal Davis-Bacon Act.

Athletes see hazard in bills to expand antitrust immunity

Legislation that would grant owners of professional sports franchises additional antitrust immunity and an open field to pool all revenues should be whistled dead, the Federation of Professional Athletes testified at congressional hearings.

FPA President Gene Upshaw, who is also executive director of the National Football League Players Association, charged that the bills would largely benefit NFL owners who are using franchise relocation curbs as a smokescreen, but "revenue sharing is what they really want."

Upshaw testified at Senate Commerce Committee hearings that the "NFL blatantly trades expansion franchises as the currency for obtaining additional immunity from the antitrust law."

He opposed a bill sponsored by Committee Chairman John C. Danforth (R-Mo.) because it "appears to confer unreviewable control over the franchise moves to sports leagues and displaces vital antitrust scrutiny by the courts."

Pooling prospects

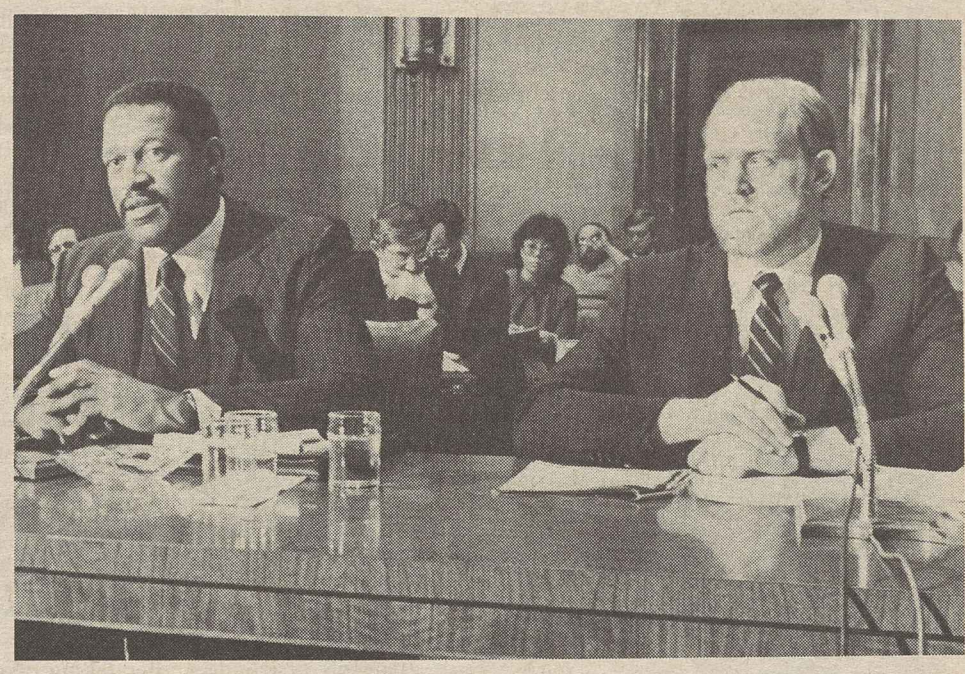
Upshaw warned that "any general exemption for pooling revenues could encourage the sale of championship games to pay or subscription television and remove such games from free network television."



Blanket immunity on revenue pooling will erode the ability of players to negotiate salaries that fairly reflect an athlete's true value, Upshaw told the committee. He noted that current revenue pooling allowed under 1961 broadcast exemption provisions has "contributed to a total lack of player mobility" within the NFL and has hampered other leagues' efforts to gain access to the networks.

Recycled measure

Upshaw branded another measure sponsored by Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.) "private special legislation for the sole benefit of the sports entrepreneurs." In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Upshaw said the bill strongly resembles a predecessor bill introduced by DeConcini in the 97th Congress that the NFLPA opposed as "unwarranted and unwise."

Legislation proposed by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and another bill cosponsored by Sen. Slade Gorton (R-Wash.) and Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.) both provide some form of review on the owners' franchise decisions and Sen. Specter's measure would not allow any extension of revenue pooling. Upshaw said these two measures were slightly more palatable.

He stressed that the FPA feels no additional legislative action is needed at this time. "The antitrust laws are sufficiently flexible to accommodate the special needs of professional sports. . . . There is simply no warrant for insulating league decisions from judicial review or for permitting a group of owners to operate in ways that ureasonably restrain competition."

Pro Athletes President Gene Upshaw and Sec.-Treas. Doug Allen testify.

Telegraph union OKs limited pay cut

Rockville, Md. — Telegraph Workers at Western Union voted two-to-one to accept a temporary, 10-percent pay cut to help shore up their financially troubled company. In addition to the 7,400 UTW members, about 600 Communications Workers agreed to a similar reduction.

UTW Sec.-Treas. Jerry Grim said the agreement on the temporary cuts also stipulates that the employees will be given a share of ownership in the company.

Grim stressed that the pay reduction will end with the July 28 expiration date of the current three-year contract, which has provided raises of about 22 percent. The accord for the temporary cuts specifies that when negotiations begin on a new contract, wage bargaining will begin from the full negotiated rates, not the cuts, he said.

Union employees at Western Union include technicians, operators, messengers and satellite controllers. The company said its 6,000 non-bargaining unit employees have also agreed to a six-month 10 percent pay cut.

Economic report takes cheery but unrealistic approach to problems

President's policymakers went at it with a vengeance, cutting taxes, primarily for high-income individuals and corporations, and meataxing budgets for social programs in favor of higher defense spending. These measures in turn led to gargantuan deficits and interest costs on the debt, which former CEA Chairman Martin Feldstein last year warned contain the seeds of economic catastrophe.

The CEA report characterizes the policy direction of the past four years as a "clear and consistent set of principles, of which the most important have been reliance on markets and maintenance of a long-run policy orientation."

So much hogwash, Schechter said in suggesting: "That policy might be rephrased as putting the economy on automatic pilot and praying for a soft landing."

Schechter said the Administration's rosy outlook for 1985 and for continued growth through 1990 doesn't square with reality, given the tremendously complex problems buffeting the economy.

"It's a fairy tale," he said. "No Administration is going to point to declines ahead, and there is nothing in the report about what they're doing to bring down the record merchandise trade deficit, the continuing strong dollar, historically high unemployment, and the soaring budget deficit."

The Economic Report, which is required to be submitted to Congress annually under the Employment Act of 1946, dismisses the effect of deficit spending on the economy yet attributes the fragile 1983-84 recovery to the President's 1981 tax reduction plan.

Stimuli to economy

"That stimulative effect of the tax reduction, plus the increased budget for defense expenditures, served as a Keynesian stimulus, which brought whatever recovery there's been," Schechter observed.

While stressing the need for action on the budget deficit — "the federal deficit must be reduced"—the report says merely that if federal spending is not slashed sharply, taxes will have to be raised.

"The decision to reduce expenditures or increase taxes is fundamentally a political choice," the report states.

"Reducing the growth of total federal expenditures may require a substantial reduction in expenditures for some programs and the termination of others."

As the President's fiscal 1986 budget makes painfully clear, any program reductions or terminations would come from federal social programs for the poor, the elderly and the middle class.

In a section on the economic status of the elderly, the report tries to make the case that the aged are no longer a disadvantaged group because of increases in social security benefit levels, expanded coverage, and cost-of-living adjustments.

But Schechter disputed that contention, pointing out that "there are still large numbers of elderly people living below the poverty level, particularly single elderly women and black elderly people."

At a White House briefing on the CEA report, William Niskanen, the only remaining member of the council, told reporters one reason why large deficits have been allowed to continue is that they have not produced the "apocalyptic" consequences, such as more inflation or a recession.

The deficits "are better described as a slow-acting but potentially lethal cancer that must be dealt with sooner rather than later," he said.

Other highlights of the report:

The 1985 Outlook—"Real" gross national product, or total output adjusted for the impact of inflation, is expected to increase 4 percent from the fourth quarter of 1984 to the fourth quarter of 1985. This is down from 5.6 percent during the comparable year-earlier period.

Civilian unemployment this year is expected to decline slowly to 7 percent in the fourth quarter. This compares with a 7.1 percent average rate last year and January's rate of 7.4 percent.

Other economic assumptions call for moderate expansion in the money supply, an average inflation rate of 4.3 percent over the four quarters of 1985, and a 1.7-percent rise in output per hour. The price rise, as measured by the government's broad GNP "implicit price inflator," is above last year's 3.5-percent inflation rate and output is below the 1984 rise of 2.2 percent.

The Outlook for 1986-90—Real GNP is projected to grow at an average of 3.9 percent a year for the rest of the decade. The projection is based on an assumption that both employment and productivity will grow at an average annual rate of about 2 percent.

Even so, unemployment is projected still to be historically high, declining negligibly to 6.9 percent by the end of 1986 and not below 6 percent until 1990. Inflation is seen at about 4.2 percent through 1987.

Labor Force Growth—In an overview of labor market conditions, the CEA pointed out that labor force growth has slowed in recent years and its rate of expansion is expected to remain below the 2.4-percent average annual growth rate from 1973-81.

Due to a more modest influx of women into the labor force and a declining teenage population, the labor force is projected to rise by about 1.8 percent a year between now and 1990.

Average Weekly Hours—Average weekly hours of workers in the private nonfarm economy are projected to drop by two-tenths of 1 percent annually between now and 1990.

Home to Korea

Kim Dae Jung, Korean militant for political democracy, visits AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland before returning to his homeland after two years' exile in the United States. Their discussion at federation headquarters focused on human rights issues in South Korea. Although he faces possible imprisonment, Kim told Kirkland he plans to work to unite democratic opposition to the repressive incumbent regime of Gen. Chun Doo-hwan.

IUD prods Congress to act on occupational disease bills

Hollywood, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. called for new federal legislation to protect victims of occupational disease through notification, medical assistance and compensation.

In a resolution adopted at its January meeting here, the IUD executive council pointed out that "there is no national program either to systematically prevent disease among exposed workers . . . or to insure early detection, timely treatment, and fair compensation when work-related disease arises, or death strikes." The IUD called specifically for two new laws: a National Occupational Disease Compensation Act and a National Occupational Disease Notification & Prevention Act.

Assaults on OSHA

The resolution said the new laws are needed to protect workers and their communities from health hazards and exposure to toxic substances. According to the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, about 100,000 U.S. workers die of occupational diseases every year.

The department cited continuing assaults on the Occupational Safety & Health Act "by right-wing social revisionists" and urged that the program be protected from "weakening amendments and crippling budget and personnel cuts." The IUD called for action "against those in the Administration" who are eroding enforcement of the safety law.

The resolution also stressed the need for changes in the Superfund and Toxic Substance Control laws to assure adequate protection for workers and communities.

"Superfund must be re-written to create adequate financial and other resources to clean up toxic waste dumps and to compensate victims of toxic waste exposure," the resolution declared.

In other business, the council elected a board of directors for the IUD's Legal Rights Foundation, established to help win fair compensation for workers who contract occupational diseases. IUD President Howard Samuel and Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak hold the same offices with the foundation.

Board members are Owen Bieber, Auto Workers; Frank D. Martino, Chemical Workers; Jay Mazur, Ladies' Garment Workers; Joseph M. Misbrener, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Charles H. Pillard, Electrical Workers; Jack Sheinkman, Clothing & Textile Workers; Milan Stone, Rubber Workers; John N. Sturdivant, Government Employees; John J. Sweeney, Service Employees; J. C. Turner, Operating Engineers; Lynn Williams, Steelworkers; and William W. Winpisinger, Machinists.

Changes imposed on prevailing pay by Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. has put into effect two changes in Davis-Bacon Act regulations that were allowed by a federal appellate court over objections raised by building trades unions.

The new regulations were among those proposed by the department in 1982, some of which the courts have allowed and others which the courts invalidated.

Both of the new changes deal with the determination of prevailing wages that must be paid by contractors on federally funded or federal assisted projects.

One specifies that pay data from other area projects covered by Davis-Bacon will not be used to set wages for building contracts unless there is not enough other pay data to make a prevailing wage determination. However, federal project data will still be used in setting wages for heavy and highway projects.

The other change allows wage data from surrounding counties to be used in the absence of sufficient in-county data only if it does not involve using urban rates for a rural county or rural rates for a metropolitan area county.

A federal court injunction continued to bar the Labor Dept. from imposing a rule allowing greater use of semi-skilled and lower-paid helpers instead of journeymen. But the department has the right to resubmit a revised proposal along those lines for court approval.

Study shows highest-paid got biggest raises

A new government study of workers' earnings over the past year bears out the old saw, "The rich get richer, the poor get poorer."

In a complex report on usual weekly earnings of workers and their families, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said that among the major occupational groups median earnings were highest for those in executive, managerial, and professional positions. Their over-the-year pay gains come to nearly 10 percent while pay gains for production workers were held to about 2 percent.

Most workers found their earnings essentially unchanged and, when expressed in terms of inflation-free dollars, actually less than a year earlier in some instances.

On a fourth-quarter 1983 to fourth-quarter 1984 basis, median earnings for families with wage and salary workers rose by 5.9 percent to $513 a week, BLS reported. After allowing for price increases over the year, the rise was pared to 1.6 percent.

Contributing to the increase was a rise in the number of families with two or more workers and a drop in the number of families with only one worker. Multiworker families increased by 1.1 million while one-earner families declined by 672,000.

Individual raises

Median weekly earnings of individual wage and salary workers rose 5.4 percent to $337 over the year. But after allowance for inflation during the period, the rise was only 1.1 percent.

In terms of broad occupational groups, however, the only significant pay increases were pulled in by the bosses—those classified as "managerial and professional." Their median weekly earnings rose by 9.8 percent to an average $494, up $44 from the year earlier level. After allowing for inflation, the gain was 5.4 percent.

Workers in five other major groups—operators, service workers, production and craft, technicians and sales people, and farming, forestry, and fishing—showed either very small increases in "real," or inflation-free, earnings, or actual drops in purchasing power.

Workers in service occupations, for example, drew median weekly earnings of $209 in fourth-quarter 1984, up but $3 from the year-earlier level. When adjusted for the impact of inflation over the year, their earnings were actually down 2.6 percent.

Precision production, craft, and repair workers posted median earnings of $390 a week last year, up only $9 from fourth-quarter 1983 and, in real terms, down 1.8 percent over the year.

Labor studies graduates

Bachelor of arts degrees from Antioch University were awarded to Glenn W. Harris of the Food & Commercial Workers and Don A. Hampton of the Firemen & Oilers for work done at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. They are commended by Fred K. Hohler, Jr., right, executive director of the center, which operates the degree program with Antioch.

Rising unemployment trend puts rate at 7.4% for January

"Instead, the Administration would abolish such proven training programs as the Job Corps and abolish urban development programs and halt public assistance for low- and middle-income housing," Oswald pointed out.

"These few remaining job-creating programs which escaped earlier Administration budget-cutting should not now be sacrificed as an alternative to raising revenues to provide some hope for the unemployed."

The increase in the unemployment rate was the third recent piece of bad economic news. A decline in the government's index of leading economic indicators in December—the fifth drop in seven months—and the largest trade deficit in history—$123 billion last year—point to growing employment problems in the future, Oswald said.

"The fruitless job search is particularly disheartening for minorities whose unemployment rate stands at 15 percent, or one out of six black Americans," he said.

The economy must grow fast enough to meet the demands of a growing labor force, and to replace jobs lost to trade displacement and automation, Oswald observed.

"The so-called recovery of the last year has failed to meet this need, and the Reagan Administration offers little hope for improvement," he said.

Commissioner Janet L. Norwood of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which releases the monthly report on employment and unemployment, told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that it will be "very difficult" to reduce unemployment if the labor force continues to grow about 3.5 percent a year.

Growth falls short

"The employment gains in January were not large enough to absorb an increase in the labor force, and unemployment, therefore, rose," Norwood noted.

Total civilian employment last month rose a modest 118,000 to 106.3 million jobs, according to the government's survey of households. The labor force shot up by 411,000 to 114.8 million, however, resulting an increase of 293,000 workers officially without jobs, to 8.5 million.

In addition, there were about 5.4 million Americans employed only part-time because they could not find full-time work and 1.3 million who had given up looking for work in the belief they could not find any.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research calculated that if half the part-time workers and all the "discouraged" workers were factored into the equation, true joblessness would total 12.6 million for an unemployment rate of 10.8 percent.

The jobless rate for men last month was unchanged at 6.3 percent, but the rate for women rose from 6.4 to 6.8 percent, BLS said. The teenage unemployment rate rose from 18.8 to 18.9 percent.

Rubber Workers put top priority on catch-up pay gains

St. Louis—General wage increases will top the list of priorities in coming negotiations between the Rubber Workers and major tire manufacturers, the URW policy committee announced.

Master contract talks are scheduled to open in early March with Goodyear, B. F. Goodrich, Firestone and Uniroyal. Some 36,000 of the URW's 130,000 members are covered by three-year agreements at the "big four" companies which will expire Apr. 20.

During the depths of the Reagan recession in 1982, URW bargainers focused on job security and bypassed general wage increases for the current contract.

URW President Milan Stone told the 250-member policy committee conference here that the tire industry has bounced back from its financial problems.

"The rubber industry has done rather well since we last met and they are expected to do well in 1985," Stone said. "We realize the industry still has some problems. However, I think it is only right and proper that we get a fair slice of the economic pie."

The URW will also seek improvements in pensions, job security protections against plant closings and relocations, continuation of the cost-of-living increases won in 1982 with the big four companies and their extension to smaller companies, protection of workers against increased health care costs, a check-off for voluntary contributions to COPE, and higher shift-differential pay.

Rustin terms workers key civil rights force

By Gordon Cole

For nearly a half-century, Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, has been fighting for the extension of freedom in many parts of the world.

At the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, where he is a trustee, it was evident last month that his fires still burn bright at 75. The veteran civil rights leader was commencement speaker at the center's graduation exercises, and he enlisted his audience in the struggle. Rustin explained:

"Since 1938, wherever I was in this world, the one thing that could be depended on for the extension of democracy were the working men and women who were prepared to withdraw their services in the interest of freedom of all kinds."

Rustin recounted his experience in India where he visited Mahatma Gandhi in 1938. He found that it was trade union leaders who convinced Gandhi that Indian workers could free India from British rule by spinning their thread, weaving their cloth, and making their own clothes.

Worker power

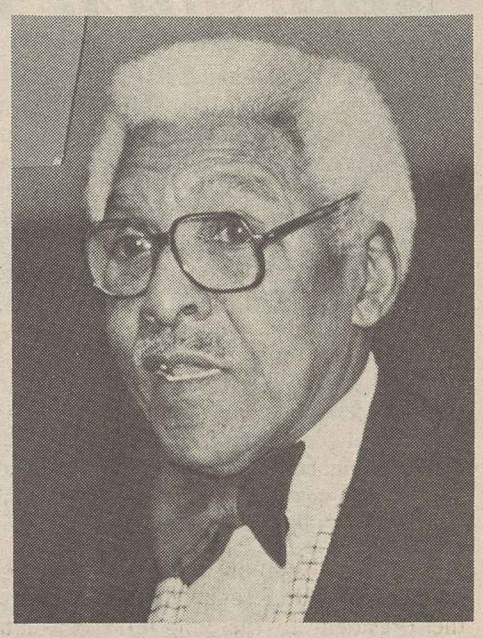
"Once the clothing industry was taken from the British and put in the hands of Indian workers, the British had to listen to Gandhi," he recalled.

In Israel, which he first visited in 1946, Rustin found that Israel was created and fought for by the trade unions as homeland for Jews. "It was union leaders who organized Israel's army and much of its industry," he said.

In 1952, the late A. Philip Randolph, then president of the Sleeping Car Porters, sent Rustin to Africa where he worked in Ghana and Nigeria. "In both countries, the freedom movement rested on the backs of workers," he reported.



In 1941, with the United States preparing for war, Randolph met with President Franklin D. Roosevelt. He threatened to bring 100,000 people to the nation's capital to protest discrimination.

Randolph reported that FDR told him he couldn't bring 100,000 blacks to Washington since there was no place for black people to eat, no place where they could sleep and no place where they could go to the toilet. Everything was segregated.

Executive orders

At Randolph's insistence, Rustin said, FDR issued three Executive Orders resulting in the creation of the Federal Employment Practices Commission (FEPC).

Randolph, who later became an AFL-CIO vice president, used the same tactics with President Harry S. Truman in 1947, when he threatened to ask young blacks not to register for the armed forces to fight for democracy when they lacked freedom in their own country. HST issued an Executive Order banning discrimination in the armed forces.

Bayard Rustin

"Two months ago workers called for a two-day strike and that strike was successful. Practically nothing in South Africa moved — buses, trains, mining. They arrested the leaders. A few days later they discovered that they had better let those leaders go."

To warm applause from the commencement audience, Rustin concluded: "Working men and women are at the heart of every movement to extend democracy."

"A union leader achieved massive miracles by asking workers to be willing to march to Washington," Rustin stressed.

Miracle in Poland

He reported on his more recent visit to Poland where he met with Lech Walesa:

"The miracle of Poland is that workers in a communist state have been able to do what couldn't be done in any totalitarian state. Solidarity still exists for the basic reason that if you have to produce goods as Poland does, and if the people who purchase goods will not cooperate, they prove the truth that in this world there are no masters, there are only slaves. And so long as people will submit to being dominated they will be dominated."

In Grenada, which he visited last year, Rustin found that only two groups fought the dictatorship there—churches and the workers. He reported that most of those jailed in Grenada and freed when the United States finally went in were workers.

In South Africa, which he visited twice last year, Rustin was told that only those who are in South Africa day in and day out can break the back of apartheid and bring about democracy. And that is why black workers in South Africa have become the spearhead of the anti-apartheid campaign.

Steel bargaining prep

Steelworkers President Lynn Williams addresses a luncheon session of the union's Basic Steel Industry Conference in Washington. More than 350 USWA local leaders took part in the conference, the first in a series to prepare for next year's contract talks. The financial condition of the industry was a focal point of the discussions. The USWA also held its first mini-mill conference for local representatives of smaller plants in Washington.

Reagan's Message

THE BEST and also the worst one can say about President Reagan's determinedly optimistic State of the Union address is that he probably believes it.

The President glowingly pictured a reborn America, freed from a choking web of government restraints by the unleashed forces of free enterprise.

The magic formula the nation has discovered, Mr. Reagan told us, is that on matters economic "conventional wisdom" must be challenged.

To refresh the record, it was once conventional wisdom of Republicans and conservatives generally that deficits do matter.

Was it really President Reagan, in his first inaugural address, who lectured us in these words: "You and I as individuals can, by borrowing, live beyond our means, but only for a limited period of time. Why should we think that collectively, as a nation, we are not bound by that same limitation?"

NOW, with lip service to a clearly unworkable constitutional amendment to compel a balanced budget, the President shares with us his discovery that "pushing down tax rates has freed our economy to vault forward to record growth."

Yet even Republicans in Congress who profess to be faithful acolytes of Mr. Reagan find it impossible to be as indifferent as the President to the long-term consequences of his budget and tax policies.

In their hearts, it seems, they know that deficits really do matter.

Within the Administration, the hard-line ideologues of the right see concern over the deficit as an opportunity to complete the conservative revolution and shrink the non-military role of the federal government to as near invisibility as modern society will allow.

The constitutional role of government to "provide for the common defense" would presumably be met. But only through neglect of the co-equal directive, to "promote the general welfare."

THERE WAS eloquence in the President's delivery of his annual report to Congress and the nation, and this is a President who has shown that he can inspire and reassure people.

But the eloquence, unfortunately, was too often the sugar-coating of an otherwise unpalatable message.

Who, on hearing it, would not welcome the President's call for passage of "our youth employment opportunity wage proposal" so that "we can help teenagers who have the highest unemployment rate?"

But would it go down so smoothly if Mr. Reagan said the minimum wage for teenagers should be reduced so that the fast-food chains can pay the youngsters they hire $2.50 an hour instead of $3.35 for frying hamburgers—or perhaps replace some older workers?

These are the things the labor movement must point out, over and over again if necessary.

We will join the applause when there is something substantive to applaud.

Not So Simple

EVEN AS the President was asserting the doctrine of lower taxes to unleash the genius of the private sector, his Treasury Dept. was advancing a proposal to tax employer-provided benefits that Congress has long encouraged as an alternative to government-funded programs.

In the name of tax simplification, workers would pay higher taxes if they were covered by such common work-related benefits as health and life insurance, or educational assistance.

The mischief goes beyond the issue of a concealed tax increase. As AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland noted in his lettter to members of Congress, employers would be under pressure to freeze or reduce worker benefits. And because of the varying tax impact, "young and single workers would be pitted against older workers and those with families."

Sniping attacks generate social security concerns

By Press Associates, Inc.

Congress in 1983 enacted legislation recommended by a bipartisan commission to ensure the solvency of the social security retirement program as far into the future as reasonable projections can be made; that is about 50 to 75 years.

That legislation was supposed to have ended the anxiety about the future of the 50-year-old social insurance program. That anxiety had been fueled by the Reagan Administration's continued attempts to slash the program's benefits in the name of saving it.

President Reagan's record-breaking $200 billion budget deficits resulting from his first-term tax giveaways and military spending excesses have created a crisis atmosphere. So, once again, social security is viewed as a target for deficit reduction.

A year ago, Reagan and his top Administration officials began raising doubts about social security and trying to associate the program, which is running healthy surpluses, with the federal deficit problem.

Former Treasury Sec. Donald Regan told NBC's "Meet the Press" last May that the government would "re-examine whether beneficiaries at the upper end of the scale really need social security," implying that the entitlement program should be a means-tested welfare program.

Early warning

Last March, Reagan told the New York Times that he would be looking at "revamping" social security after the November elections, especially for future retirees.

During the fall 1984 presidential debates, Democratic candidate Walter Mondale scored big points for social security when Reagan, on the defensive, pledged not to seek benefit cuts for either current or future retirees. Constrained by his campaign promise, Reagan exempted social security retirement from his proposals to cut domestic programs drastically.

But Reagan hedged on his pledge at a Jan. 9 news conference when he said that if "an overwhelming bipartisan majority of Congress" wanted to eliminate or reduce next year's social security cost-of-living adjustment to help reduce the deficit, "I would have to look at that situation." Such a move has been suggested by influential Republicans in Congress, including Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole (Kan.), who served on the bipartisan commission on social security.

Another 'flip-flop'

The National Council of Senior Citizens accused Reagan of "another flip-flop" on social security and promised it would, if necessary, "lead its members into the streets in protest against any attempt to freeze the COLA."

The NCSC cited a recent study by Data Resources that a one-year COLA freeze would push an additional one million senior citizens below the poverty line.

The 1984 Democratic Party platform stated, "There is no excuse for slashing social security to pay for excesses in other areas of the budget. We will steadfastly oppose such efforts, now and in the future."

One Democrat who plans to hold his party colleagues to that pledge is Rep. Claude Pepper of Florida, the 84-year-old chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee. Pepper is the only member of Congress who served during the presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt, when social security was created.

Speaking recently at the National Press Club, Pepper drew laughter and applause when, recalling Reagan's campaign pledge, he said, "We Democrats are supporting President Reagan in protecting social security."

When cutting COLAs are considered, "we're talking about the living standard of millions of Americans," Pepper continued. "One-half of all social security recipients rely on it for at least half of their income," he said.

MEMO FROM COPE

Maybe So . . . Maybe No

The GOP's 'Golden Era'?

Republican spokespersons are beginning to talk like they command an irresistible army. They envision their party and their candidates storming through the demoralized opposition like Patton charged through Europe.

One, Sen. Paul Laxalt (Nev.), by all accounts President Reagan's best friend and adviser in the Congress and the GOP's general chairman, enthuses this way: "We're on the threshold of a golden era in Republican politics."

Such a "golden era," should it materialize, would see the GOP in 1986 retain numerical control of the U.S. Senate (not easy—22 GOP seats and only 12 Democratic seats are up, and the present GOP Senate margin is only 53-47); and hold its own or even regain the ideological control of the U.S. House it had in 1981-82, even if it's unable to fully close the gap on the Democrats' present 70-seat lead.

A third GOP objective—less noted nationally but no less important—is massive 1986 gains in state legislative strength and governors' seats. At present, Democrats control two-thirds of the state legislatures and occupy the state house in 34 states to the GOP's 16.

Laxalt puts the case for GOP confidence succinctly: "We've got Ronald Reagan and the economy, plus a solid Sun Belt base, while the traditional coalitions in the northeast are crumbling." The case is hardly ironclad. A couple of missteps, and Reagan's popularity could take a quick nosedive; the economy rests on a foundation of egg-shells; Sun Belt support could melt with economic problems, as it did in 1982; older Democratic coalitions could well whip back into shape in face of the GOP threat.

GOP Chairman Frank Fahrenkopf shares Laxalt's optimism, saying: "The prospects and outlook are perhaps the best we've had in 50 years."

If there is a political equivalent to what is called "the pit" in professional football—that small piece of turf where 280-pound giants of two opposing lines smash one another around and barely get noticed by the fans, whose eyes are fixed on flashy runners and rifle-armed passers—it's in the fight for state legislative and gubernatorial dominance.

This is where Fahrenkopf, an excellent and imaginative technician, sees opportunities to build the GOP as a majority party

He knows if the local roots are weak, the national plant can't prosper. To strengthen them, he looks well beyond 1986 alone. While he and other GOP leaders would dearly love huge state legislative and gubernatorial gains next year, Fahrenkopf sees it more as a root nourishment process which might lead to true blossoming in the early 1990s.

His program anticipates modest GOP state legislative and gubernatorial gains (like those in 1984—see chart) in 1986-88-90, cumulatively adding up to a large pick-up. With more—far more, they hope—legislatures under GOP control, it will then be Republicans instead of Democrats redrawing congressional district and state legislative lines and gerrymandering them after the 1990 Census.

As a consequence of this from-the-roots-up approach, true party "realignment"—already claimed by many in the GOP—will actually show up in the 1992 House and Senate contests and, presumably, the presidential election of that year. At least, that's the Republican scenario.

Going for the GOP are a lot of impressive weapons: A use and understanding of available technology far more sophisticated and effective than any party has had before; oodles of money and a willingness to spend it; ever more committed activists attracted by the rightward turn of the party in recent years and by its successes.

It also has a national organization of rightist incumbent state legislators whose members keep a sharp eye out for districts in which pro-people Democratic incumbents are vulnerable, so that extra resources can be thrown in.

Of course, all of this about the GOP has a downside, too:

- The nature of parties and politics is chaotic, and the best anyone—even the GOP—can hope to introduce is a little sanity, order and direction.
- The best laid plans of mice and men go oft astray. (Not an original line.) And if anybody should know this, it's the Republicans. Recessions, Watergates, overconfidence, internal divisions—all at one time or another have blown their plans out of the water.
- History is not encouraging. In previous periods of high expectation, the GOP has started out from a higher base. It had 20 governorships after Eisenhower's second-term victory and 19 after Nixon's. It now has 16. It controlled both legislative houses in 17 states under Eisenhower, 16 under Nixon, but now only 11.

In each case, two years after setting out to make huge headway in the states, the GOP got bushwhacked—at a cost of five governorships and 650 state legislative seats in 1958 under Eisenhower and six governorships and 674 legislative seats in 1974 under Nixon.

- Finally, the GOP doesn't operate in a vacuum. There are Democrats out there, too, with tools, ambitions and programs. If their new national chair, Paul Kirk, can get disputatious elements to agree to mutual arms reductions, a little internal peace could lead to big external progress.

The Democrats—most, anyway—intend to be competitive. They're smart enough to see that right now the GOP works, and they're not too proud to borrow the techniques that help it work.

Cushion

Candidates elected to the U.S. House last November raised 17 percent more money than they spent. The surplus cash totals $38.5 million.

Louisiana's Rep. Henson Moore (R) finished his campaign with $722,000 left over. Forty-eight of the winners have a cushion of more than $200,000 each.

Members who were in Congress as of 1980, when the law was changed, can hang on to the surplus when they retire. As one observer commented, some members are not only financing their campaigns, they seem to be financing their futures.

Ooops!

A court victory by Indiana Democrats inadvertently could wind up helping Republicans pick up a mess of state legislative and congressional seats one of these days.

A three judge federal court ruled recently that districts used in 1982 Indiana state legislative elections had been drawn unconstitutionally because they failed to reflect the political makeup of the state as a whole.

While it will await action by the Supreme Court, the federal panel ruling suggests there ought to be closer correlation between the number of votes a party's candidates receive and the number of seats won. It noted that Indiana Democratic candidates for the state legislature got 49 percent of the total vote in 1982 but won only 43 percent of the seats.

In effect, it censured the practice of gerrymander where the controlling party arranges district lines to help it remain the controlling party.

The ruling, in a case brought by Democrats, ironically gives support to present GOP complaints that while its candidates got 49 percent of the U.S. House vote last year, the party wound up with only 42 percent of the seats in Congress.

Federal unions call Hatch Act charges intimidation tactic

By David L. Perlman

Postal and federal union leaders don't intend to allow Hatch Act charges brought by a government agency to silence their voices on political issues affecting the workers they represent.

That was the response of Presidents Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees, Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers and Moe Biller of the Postal Workers to what they see as a politically motivated harassment.

Their unions, the largest in the federal sector, represent some 1.3 million workers.

The offense charged, in the words of the official letter sent to each of the union presidents, is that they had "engaged in campaign activity in support of the presidential candidacy of Democrat Walter Mondale and against the re-election of Republican Ronald Reagan."

That crime, they were told, violates the Hatch Act, the 1939 law that was enacted to protect government workers from being pressured by the party in power for political contributions or campaign work.

None of the three is drawing any pay from a government job. Each had years ago received an unpaid leave of absence to enter full-time service with his union and has continued on an unpaid leave status.

Hatch Act penalties range from a minimum of 30 days suspension without pay—a difficult penalty, clearly, to enforce against a person not drawing a federal paycheck—to outright dismissal. The latter penalty, rarely imposed, could reduce the eventual retirement pension, which is based in part on duration of government service.

Another first

So far as can be determined, this is the first time that Hatch Act violations are being charged to anyone not on active government service. The Reagan-appointed special counsel of the Merit Systems Protection Board, K. William O'Connor, told the union presidents that they would not be prosecuted if they resigned or retired from government employment by Feb. 26.

Sombrotto said he is prepared to fight a court battle as high as necessary to defend his constitutional right "to speak to my membership on political candidates and issues that affect their families and their futures."

Biller termed the prosecutions "part of a continuing anti-labor attack" by the Administration. During the election campaign, the Postal Workers won a court battle upholding their right to conduct a nonpartisan voter registration program among postal service employees during off-duty hours or on lunch breaks.

Blaylock called the Hatch Act attack "politically motivated" and said the law was never intended to cover persons on a leave-without-pay status.

Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.), who heads a House Civil Service subcommittee, termed invocation of the Hatch Act "a punishment tactic," and indicative of a double-standard the Administration applies to its political supporters and political opponents.

A labor-supported bill to revise the Hatch Act so that it would continue to protect federal workers against political pressures from their superiors while freeing them to participate in the nation's political life passed Congress in 1976 but was vetoed by then-President Gerald Ford.

Battle over Conrail sale switched to Capitol Hill

The battle over the sale of the government-controlled Conrail freight line shifted to Capitol Hill, where stiff opposition is expected to the Reagan Administration's hand-picked prospective buyer—the Norfolk Southern Corp.

The selection of Norfolk Southern as Transportation Sec. Elizabeth Dole's choice among three final bidders on the 15,000-mile freight carrier was announced after railway unions gave their support to the Alleghany Corp.

Now Congress, which must make the final decision on the transaction, will look at the offers of the two corporations as well as a similar bid by a group headed by hotel magnate J. Willard Marriott, Jr., and a public offering proposal by Conrail management.

Norfolk Southern, a holding company that owns the Norfolk & Western and the Southern railroads, offered to pay at least $1.2 billion in cash for the government's 85-percent ownership of Conrail. Employees own the other 15 percent.

The company also agreed to either sell some of its rail lines or negotiate trackage rights agreements with smaller lines in the region to solve what the Justice Dept. views as potential anti-competitive problems.

Norfolk Southern officials said the di-

Bipartisan group in Senate spurs rights bill drive

Ten Republican senators have joined 36 Democrats in sponsoring a labor-supported civil rights bill, despite opposition from the Reagan Administration.

The legislation, needed to close loopholes in civil rights enforcement opened by a Supreme Court decision last year, now has close to a majority of the 100-member Senate as sponsors.

Only 13 senators, all Republicans, joined Majority Leader Bob Dole in sponsoring a narrower version backed by the Administration.

Both bills deal with the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decision in the Grove City College case, which involved federal enforcement of the ban on sex discrimination in education.

The Administration's position is that Congress should merely clarify its nondiscrimination intent in the program di-

States slow to update jobless aid

State unemployment insurance programs still haven't recovered from the financial battering of the recession years and continued high joblessness is delaying overdue improvements.

Over the past year, about half the states raised maximum benefits—in most cases under existing laws that adjust benefit ceilings automatically each year at a specified percentage of the state's average weekly wage.

The improvements were modest, however, for several reasons:

- Some states suspended automatic adjustments or withheld scheduled increases because their unemployment insurance reserves were depleted by the years of high joblessness and are in debt to the federal government.
- The average wage in many states rose so little that automatic wage adjustments were minimal.
- With the drain on unemployment insurance reserves, few states even considered labor-sought legislation to make benefits more adequate as a replacement for lost wages.

Trend reversed

Many of the states with automatic adjustments still set maximum benefits at 50 or 60 percent of the average wage. Before the Reagan Administration brought in double-digit unemployment that battered state resources, the trend was clearly toward a national standard that set benefit ceilings at no less than two-thirds of average state wages.

While state programs are generally geared to pay 50 percent of lost wages up to the ceiling set by state law, and some add on additional payments as a dependents' allowance, most workers end up getting a lower wage replacement. A survey by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security found that the average weekly benefit in the 1984 fiscal year came to only 34 percent of the average weekly wage.

A review of state legislative actions during 1984, carried in the January issue of the Monthly Labor Review published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, shows that most changes made were designed to replenish the unemployment funds. A number of states raised the payroll tax rate or taxable wage base for this purpose.

These are some of the state legislative

Steelworkers to challenge vote results

The Steelworkers will challenge the results of decertificaion elections at four Phelps Dodge Co. copper mines and smelters in Arizona where only strikebreakers were allowed to cast votes, USWA Sec. Edgar Ball declared.

After the National Labor Relations Board released results of the elections that went 1,908 to 87 against continued union representation, Ball said the USWA was "not the least bit surprised by the ballot count." He stressed that the unions involved in the bitter 18-month strike "are no less determined to carry out our mission of seeking economic justice from Phelps Dodge for destroying the copper workers' right to a union and devastating the lives of our strikers and their families."

The USWA represents the largest number of some 1,400 members of 13 unions that struck four Phelps Dodge facilities in Arizona and one in El Paso, Tex., in 1983. The company had refused to go along with an industry pattern settlement despite wage and benefit concessions in the package aimed at shoring up the ailing industry. Phelps Dodge demanded deeper cuts.

And even though it attempted to keep the Arizona works going with strikebreakers, it was forced to shut down its largest operations in Morenci and Ajo in December.

To file action

Ball, who is chairman of USWA's National Nonferrous Coordinated Bargaining Committee, said at a news conference that the union will file objections to the election with the NLRB, a move that will block decertification while the issue is resolved. Picket lines at the facilities in Arizona will stay up, the USWA said.

Ball charged that the labor board's ruling that strikers could not participate in the elections and the votes themselves "unjustly" denied the workers their right to continue a legal strike.

"There should never have been an election aimed at destroying the unions in the first place," he asserted.

He said the USWA will continue to provide financial aid to the copper strikers, and he pledged that the unions have made a "full commitment for a stepped-up corporate campaign against Phelps Dodge."

Lawsuits to continue

USWA District 39 Director Robert Guadiana told reporters that the USWA plans to continue its lawsuits against Phelps Dodge and the state of Arizona over the "massive violations committed against our members regarding civil rights, environmental laws and threats of evictions from company housing." The strike had been marred by the use of police and state National Guard troops to escort scabs into the struck facilities.

Ball, who is also chairing the multi-union corporate campaign, said it will escalate a program of informing other unions, major banks, creditors, investment institutions and stockholders about Phelps Dodge's "financial mismanagement" and continuing operating losses.

"The copper strikers are not going to be forced from their homes and communities by bulldozer tactics," Ball said, "because they have the greater strength of their support for each other, the moral imperative of their cause and solidarity of the labor movement behind them."

California Fed editor Doug Barrett dies

San Mateo, Calif.—Doug Barrett, editor of the California AFL-CIO News, died Jan. 25 of a massive heart attack. He was 64.

Barrett, named editor of the state federation's paper in May 1984, started his newspaper career at the Sierra Sun paper in 1936 as a writer and co-publisher. He joined the staff of the California AFL-CIO in 1968, and served as administrative assistant to Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning.

ILO committee drafts goals for waterway, road transport

Geneva—The International Labor Organization's Inland Transport Committee drafted a list of priorities to improve working conditions of inland waterway crews and truck drivers at its 10-day session.

Although employer representatives resisted many of the proposals, the thrust of the worker delegates' agenda was adopted, Robert B. Vahey of the Seafarers reported. The committee's report was approved unanimously.

"We have put together a very good program whose ultimate impact now rests with governments," he noted.

Vahey and Richard J. Daschbach, who are assistants to Seafarers President Frank Drozak, represented American workers at the session of 240 trade union, employer and government delegates from 29 ILO member states.

Daschbach said that among the committee's key actions was a call for the ILO to enlist the cooperation of the World Health Organization in studies to determine the stress and fatigue imposed on truck drivers by such factors as the hours of work, vibration and cab design.

Drivers should have a say in the design of new trucks, particularly in the layout of the cabin, the committee said. "The safety and health of the driver is paramount," it declared.

Daschbach welcomed the committee's call for international standards on accident data so a more accurate assessment of safety practices for the road transport industry can be drawn.

He also welcomed the committee's call for proper packaging and loading of cargo containers for the protection of the health and safety of drivers.

The committee said there should be the "greatest possible similarity" in the working conditions for the inland water transportation industry, regardless of the employer.

These working conditions, the committee continued, "should not be less favorable than those in other comparable industries."

Waterway compliance

The worker delegates hailed the committee action insisting that governments establish "efficient inspection systems" insuring that the entire inland water transport industry complies with the labor laws.

The workers overcame strong employer opposition to obtain the recommendation that the ability of crew members be recognized by "certificates of competency" backed by training and examinations.

Such a certificate serves as an industry "passport" that relieves a job-hunting crew member from depending on the reference from a former employer, Vahey said.

The committee also called on the ILO to "defend and promote freedom of association in inland transport." Studies should be undertaken to determine whether the industry's workers "enjoy the rights and guarantees which are essential for the normal exercise of freedom of association," it said.

Fund cutback targets HRDI job projects

Funding cutbacks sought by the Reagan Administration threaten to curtail drastically trade union involvement in programs to put jobless Americans back to work.

The Administration wants Congress to cancel, through a rescission resolution, funds already appropriated that enable the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute and other national organizations to help make the Job Training & Partnership Act (JTPA) more effective.

HRDI has been providing technical assistance and encouraging union involvement in training and employment programs at the state and local level. These include projects to help workers stranded by plant closings or large-scale layoffs.

Despite the continued need, the Labor Dept. has asked Congress to rescind $16 million of a $21 million appropriation that was to have been available for designated national activities for the program year starting July 1. The drastic cut would also affect programs of the National Alliance of Business, which works with employer groups, and projects of several other organizations which, as with HRDI, were funded at the insistence of Congress.

Up to Congress

To take effect, the rescission of funds would have to be approved by both the House and the Senate by Mar. 31. The Administration request will be one of the items on the agenda of a Senate Appropriations subcommittee at hearings starting Feb. 26.

Funding for national activities would be eliminated entirely the following year, under Reagan's budget. However, when the Administration last tried to eliminate most of HRDI's government funding, strong bipartisan support resulted in a congressional directive that the programs be funded. The Labor Dept. complied with the wishes of Congress, although contending at the time that it was not legally obligated to do so.

HRDI has worked closely with state and local central bodies and with unions whose members have been hard hit by layoffs to develop training programs and conduct workshops for dislocated workers. A recent HRDI survey showed some 93 labor-involved programs supported by JTPA funds operating in 40 states.

The Labor Dept. is also seeking rescission of $119.5 million in separate JTPA funding for dislocated worker assistance, by states.

Federal right-to-know laws sought

The AFL-CIO welcomed the introduction of a "right-to-know" legislative package in Congress that includes a measure to block federal pre-emption of stronger state and local laws governing disclosure of data on toxic substances used in the workplace. The proposed laws would also insure a community's right to information on the hazardous substances being made or used within its borders.

"A national minimum standard is needed to assure that all members of the public have access to information on toxic chemicals in their communities," said Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security. "We particularly support the bill dealing with pre-emption."

The legislation was introduced by Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.). He stressed that it is designed to help prevent chemical accidents "and to redress the injuries caused when such tragedies unavoidably occur."

At a press conference, Florio noted that in the past 11 weeks there have been 13 separate spill and emission incidents at Linden, N.J., chemical plants that "sent hundreds of New Jersey and New York residents to the hospital and kept thousands of others shut in their homes." At the same time, he noted, the Environmental Protection Agency announced that the accident that killed thousands of persons in India "could have happened in West Virginia." Union Carbide's plant at Institute, W.Va., produces methyl isocyanate, the same chemical that was released in India.

Florio cited a double impetus for his legislation: the incident in Bhopal and the pre-emption of New Jersey's strong right-to-know law by the weaker federal hazard communication rule. A federal district judge recently ruled that manufacturing concerns in New Jersey covered by the federal rule are exempt from all provisions of the New Jersey law.

National attention

Seminario said the introduction of the federal legislation indicates that the right-to-know issue "has finally reached the level of national attention. All this activity now is an attempt to set minimum standards on a community's right to know that do not pre-empt any state or local laws."

She noted that some 20 states are examining some form of right-to-know legislation, and 19 states already have such laws, along with a growing number of communities.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland congratulated state AFL-CIO officers in early 1985 on enactment of those state laws. He said proof of the effectiveness of the laws was evident in attempts by the Chemical Manufacturers Association to preempt them through Reagan Administration action on a watered-down federal version.

Florio's legislative package has six basic components:

- A national community right-to-know law that includes requirements both to inform communities about potential chemical hazards and to develop emergency response and evacuation plans.
- A federal right to sue for victims of chemical disasters, with strong provisions on liability and revised procedural rules.
- Regional training for police and firefighters, under the Dept. of Transportation, on dealing with truck and train accidents and fires involving hazardous chemicals.
- A provision blocking federal preemption of any state right-to-know laws that are more protective of worker health and safety than the current OSHA standard.
- Consideration by EPA of 36 substances for possible listing as hazardous air pollutants under the Clean Air Act and the issuance of emission standards for all listed hazardous air pollutants.
- EPA review of potential health and environment damage from accidents in the manufacture of pesticides and improved regulations on underground chemical storage tanks.

'Cynical tactic'

OSHA hit for stalling on formaldehyde rule

By Arlee C. Green

Organized labor told the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to stop stalling and produce a standard to protect workers from exposure to formaldehyde, calling its latest information-gathering meeting a contrived, delaying tactic that is politically motivated.

The Auto Workers and the Carpenters testified at an OSHA hearing and blasted the agency for its inaction. The AFL-CIO and several other unions will submit written testimony by the Mar. 1 deadline.

Franklin E. Mirer, director of the UAW Health & Safety Dept., said that although the union values any opportunity to present its views, "we have protested against OSHA's action of calling this meeting. The UAW believes it is a charade, a cynical tactic devised by OSHA, perhaps in concert with the chemical industry, to delay much needed government action to protect public health."

Joseph L. Durst, Jr., director of the Carpenters' Occupational Safety & Health Dept., cited the agency's "supposed controversy" over quantitative risk assessment, adding, "All of these controversies are truly a disguise for political decisions not to regulate. Formaldehyde has been studied intensively and we believe there is sufficient evidence to regulate it."

Mirer scored OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland's denial last Jan. 7 of the UAW's petition for an emergency standard on formaldehyde.

Rowland decision

It was Rowland's decision then to continue with the "public information-gathering process" to receive comments on risk assessments that try to affix a probable number of excess deaths due to exposure to a hazardous substance.

Mirer questioned whether Rowland was trying to invent a "Catch-22" situation by insisting that a risk analysis is a prerequisite for a health standard, but since there is no consensus on the best method, the agency cannot take action because risk assessments are unreliable.

"There is no new data on the horizon which will contradict the evidence of risk already at hand," Mirer said, calling the areas of disagreement "purely a matter of policy."

He stressed that the real issue raised by Rowland's action is "whether OSHA will set a standard to protect the public health if there is any uncertainty among scientists about the magnitude of human risk."

Dr. Michael Silverstein, an occupational health physician with the UAW, testified also about the "dubious value" of the meeting, and reviewed the legacy of delays that have prevented the formulation of a standard since studies in 1980 linked the chemical to cancer in test animals.

Significant risk

Silverstein noted the petitions by the UAW and 14 other unions that were denied in 1982 and 1985, the various risk assessments produced for the agency and the analyses that were rejected. In November 1984, OSHA's Office of Risk Assessment concluded that formaldehyde is a potential human carcinogen producing 8.3 cases of malignant tumors per 1,000 exposed workers and 104.7 cases of benign tumors per 1,000. "These are both clearly grave and significant" risks, Silverstein said.

In calling for review and comments, OSHA declined to send that risk assessment to any of the unions that had petitioned for an emergency standard, but it did seek the comments of the formaldehyde manufacturers.

Durst's testimony stressed that the hearing "will probably add another six months to the process while the transcript is analyzed to death." Meanwhile, "OSHA is sanctioning the continued exposure to excessive levels of formaldehyde knowing full well its toxic and carcinogenic properties," he said.

OSHA is under court order to review the need for a formaldehyde standard. The UAW sued the agency over its failure to act and the federal district court judge, calling OSHA's explanation for denying an emergency standard "inadequate," gave OSHA until next Apr. 15 to decide whether to proceed with rulemaking efforts.

Paycheck raid opposed

Proposals to tax workers on employer-paid benefits such as health and life insurance jeopardize collective bargaining, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. charged at a news conference. Representatives of consumer, employer and insurance groups joined in opposition to hitting workers with a new tax the Reagan Administration is seeking.

Unions approve Frontier Airlines stock buyout plan

Denver—All five unions representing some 4,100 Frontier Airlines workers overwhelmingly approved a package of $45 million in wage and productivity concessions in exchange for an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP) in an effort to keep the financially troubled carrier alive.

Members of the Air Line Pilots, Flight Attendants, Machinists, Transport Workers and Air Line Employees agreed to wage and benefit reductions ranging from 10.7 to 13 percent, paving the way for the plan to purchase 45 percent of the company.

The five-union coalition presented its preliminary plans for an employee buyout to Frontier's directors Feb. 4. Company officials were "favorably impressed" by the coalition's efforts and agreed to give the unions time to consolidate their plan and gain financial backing. Frontier's president, M. C. Lund, expressed confidence the coalition would be able to buy the stock.

Strong support

More than 98 percent of the Pilots supported the employee stock ownership plan, as did 95 percent of the Flight Attendants and 90 percent of the Machinists. In addition to the wage cuts, union members agreed to reduced pension contributions and work rule changes.

Despite the problems posed by the employee stock ownership plan, workers at the ratification meeting expressed their commitment to make Frontier competitive and profitable again.

The workers' concessions, plus the coalition's offer of $222 million for Frontier stock, averted a potential shutdown. After receiving the unions' offer, Frontier officials said the airline would operate as usual during negotiations with employee representatives, and that the board would meet again when the unions are ready to present their buy-out proposal.

Oscar Mayer workers win wage restoration, back pay

Chicago—The 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals upheld a lower court ruling that restores the wages of some 600 union workers at the Oscar Mayer meatpacking plant here and awards backpay of about $5,000 each.

The three-judge panel backed the lower court finding that Arbitrator Arthur Malinowski had not exceeded his authority in determining that the company could not unilaterally cut its workers wages.

Last Apr. 23, the firm cut the pay of members of Beef Boners & Sausage Makers Local 100 of the Food & Commercial Workers from $10.69 an hour to $8.25. Oscar Mayer cited a clause in the contract permitting management to reduce wages if "as a result of a pattern established through bargaining by the UFCW," wages were cut in other Midwest packinghouses.

Key addition

But in an addendum extending the 1980-83 contract to June 1, 1986, Local 100 members agreed to give up their 1982 cost-of-living pay increases provided that "these rates shall continue for the time of this agreement without changes" unless mutually agreed to by the parties.

In ruling on the impact of the two clauses, the arbitrator upheld the union's position that "any wage changes after the 1982 agreement would be made only through collective bargaining and not through unilateral action by Oscar Mayer."

Both the district and appellate courts rejected the company's contention that Malinowski's decision was "arbitrary and capricious" and beyond his authority.

The appeals court noted that it had previously warned against using the " 'authority' argument as a ruse to induce the reviewing court to 'redetermine the facts—even just a tiny bit—or reach a legal conclusion on them as found or hoped for which differs from that of the arbitrator.' "

Local 100 Sec.-Treas. Walter F. Piotrowski said the back pay will total around $5,000 per person, including interest specified by the district court to be compounded at 10.33 percent a year on the sum.

The local's attorney, Edwin Benn, had presented the court with affidavits showing that members were facing the threat of utility cutoffs and mortgage foreclosures.

The arbitrator's decision locked in the contract extension through June 1, 1986, with the pay reinstated through that time. This will mean an additional $7 million in wages for the workers.

The company said it will not appeal the ruling, and the workers will get checks for back pay by Mar. 1. The old pay scale of $10.67 and hour was reinstated Feb. 11.

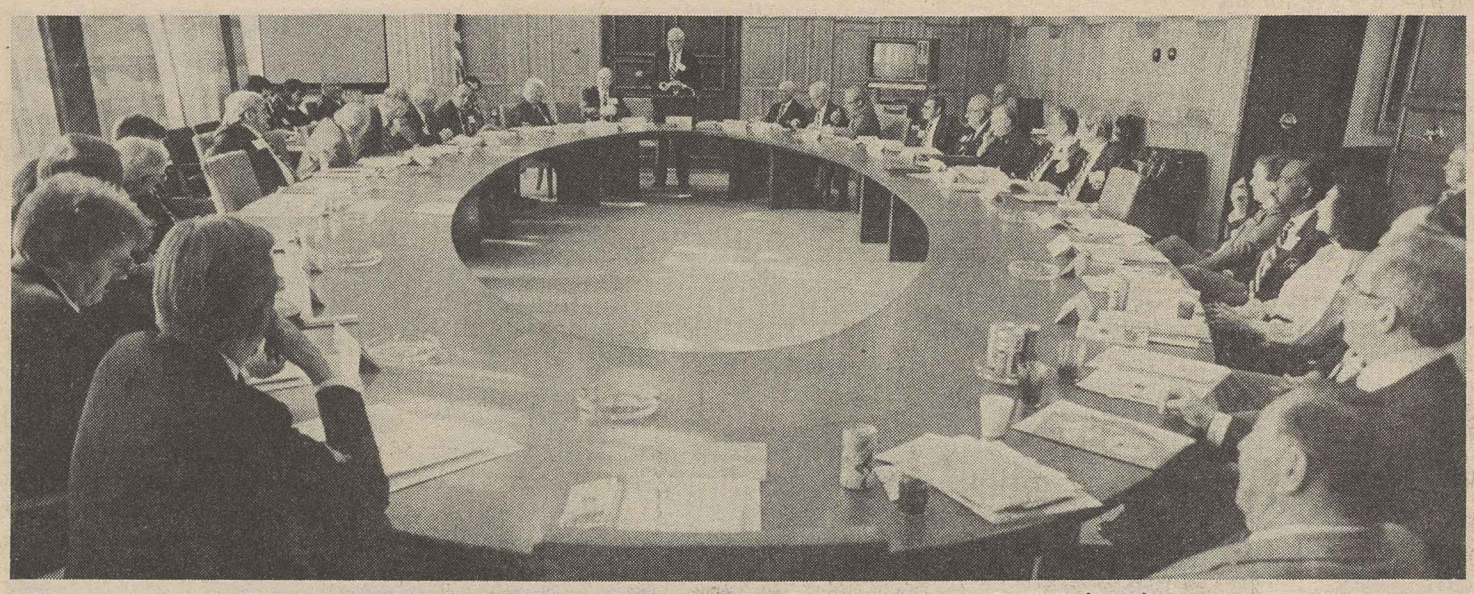
rectly affected by the Supreme Court ruling. But the civil rights coalition sees the Supreme Court decision as seriously weakening enforcement of a range of comparable civil rights laws.

The broader Senate bill, whose principal sponsors are Democrat Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Republican Lowell P. Weicker (Conn.), would amend the Civil Rights Act, the Rehabilitation Act involving rights of handicapped, and the Age Discrimination Act—as well as the education law.



It is identical to a House bill whose key sponsors include Democrat Augustus F. Hawkins and Don Edwards, both from California, and Republican James M. Jeffords (Vt.).

Congress is in recess and will not get back to substantive business until the last week in February. Then budget-related matters will dominate the agenda in both houses. But the Senate will also be taking up the controversial nomination of Reagan intimate Edwin Meese III to be attorney general. His confirmation was recommended by a 12-6 vote of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Three other Reagan Cabinet nominees have already been confirmed—John S. Herrington as Secretary of Energy, Donald P. Hodel as Secretary of the Interior, and William J. Bennett as Secretary of Education. The Senate also confirmed Lee M. Thomas to the non-Cabinet post of administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Graphic union board sets vote on merger with ITU

Annapolis, Md.—The Graphic Communications Union, proceeding toward merger with the Typographical Union, will hold a membership referendum on the merger plan in April, shortly after the ITU membership votes on Mar. 27.

The resolution adopted by the 42-member board reaffirms the GCIU's desire for one union in the graphic communications industry.

The GCIU itself is the product of three previous mergers—the lithographers with the photoengravers, then with the bookbinders and most recently with the pressmen, stereotypers and electrotypers.

At a meeting here, GCIU board members approved the referendum resolution, 24-16. Financial-Recording Sec. James J. Norton stressed that the "mood of the board was in favor of a merger" and the vote reflected the need for clarifying information on the merger proposal.

"The purpose of the action of the general board was to let the referendum go forward and in the interim, get more information which has been difficult to obtain due to the time restrictions placed on the union," Norton said. "The information is continuing to be sought and as received, will be channeled back to the general board members."

Norton explained that the board members "are used to having mergers done with plenty of time for examination of the documents. Under the existing circumstances, we haven't had that luxury. The board wants to be sure of a physical and responsible merger."

Just prior to the meeting, a small pro-Teamster faction within the ITU sent each GCIU board member a copy of a letter written by ITU Sec.-Treas. Thomas Kopeck that was critical of the merger proposal and questioned its viability. Kopeck is a strong proponent of merger with the Teamsters.

The Kopeck letter misled some labor reporters on the status of the merger but Norton said, "the GCIU general board has its own sources of information. I don't know that we treated that packet of information as anything more than a piece of propaganda."

At the board meeting, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue expressed his optimism that the proposed merger would "survive the long haul" and would benefit both unions. ITU President Robert S. McMichen also spoke to the board, expressing his hopes for merger.

Long-sought goal

The ITU has been seeking a merger partner for a number of years under directive of its convention delegates, including extensive talks with the Newspaper Guild. Subsequently, Teamsters President Jackie Presser proposed to 1983 convention delegates that the ITU be absorbed as a division of the truckers' union.

Former ITU officers negotiated a merger document with the IBT. But a federal judge blocked a referendum on that merger proposal until a Dept. of Labor-supervised election of officers was held. McMichen and two other officers who oppose merger with the Teamsters were elected in mid-1984.

At the ITU convention last September, delegates established a mechanism for reaching a suitable merger with an AFL-CIO affiliated union, after which a referendum on the IBT proposal could occur. The new ITU officers reached agreement with the GCIU within the designated period and recommended approval by the ITU members.

11 states report unemployment up over year ago

Eleven states posted increases in their unemployment rates over the year ended last December and five states still had double-digit rates, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The higher rates, which reflected the sluggish pace of economic growth in the fourth quarter of 1984, were registered in Alabama, Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota and West Virginia.

All of the increases were by less than 1 percentage point. In three states—Arkansas, Kentucky, and Oklahoma—jobless rates were unchanged over the year.

West Virginia once again had the highest unemployment rate, 15.6 percent in December, compared with 15.1 percent a year earlier. Other states with double-digit levels were Alabama, 11.7 percent; Louisiana, 10.4 percent; Michigan, 10.6 percent, and Mississippi, 11 percent. Puerto Rico had a rate of 19.4 percent.

Before seasonal adjustment, the national civilian unemployment rate last December was 7 percent, down from 8 percent in December 1983.

BLS said 35 states, plus the District of Columbia, showed some decline in their jobless rates over the year ended last December. Employment grew in all but three states.

Labor-sponsored Scouting projects mark anniversary

February marks the 75th anniversary of the Boys Scouts of America and the labor movement is playing a full part in the celebration.

The National Labor Advisory Committee to the BSA has produced a 10-minute videotape, "Scouting and Labor: Join the Alliance," to promote labor sponsorship of Scout units and activities.

Robert Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. and a member of the BSA national executive board, says he hopes labor's efforts will increase understanding of union involvement in community affairs.

American labor also is the subject of a new Scout merit badge resulting from two years of hard work by committee members. The badge will give scouts the opportunity to study the history of organized labor and how labor functions in a free society.

To earn the new merit badge, scouts will need to demonstrate their understanding of American labor and compare it with labor federations in other countries. Scouts will be encouraged to attend a local union meeting and participate in some labor-sponsored activities such as food banks. The new badge and requirements will be available in 1986.

As an anniversary present, the Labor Advisory Committee also is overseeing the restoration of the Boy Scout National Memorial in Washington. Members of the Plumbers & Pipefitters, Carpenters, Painters and other crafts have volunteered their labor, and apprentice stone masons will repair the stonework. The 15-foot bronze statue was erected in 1960 for the Scouts' golden anniversary, and the clean-up work will be finished by mid-1985.

In another anniversary year project, building trades unions in San Mateo county, Calif., are donating time and skills to the BSA barrier-free program. Union members there are remodeling a Boy Scout camp to make it accessible to handicapped children. The San Mateo site is the pilot for a national camp remodeling program.

3 unions get new contracts at Eastern Air

Miami—Three AFL-CIO unions reached agreements with Eastern Airlines softening earlier concessions to help the carrier avoid bankruptcy.

The tentative contracts with the Machinists, Air Line Pilots and Transport Workers are subject to membership ratification. Complete details are not available pending members' vote. The three unions represent 22,500 Eastern employees.

The Pilots, who were the first to agree with the financially troubled airline, will accept a reduction of 13 percent from 1983 pay levels rather than the 20 percent cut in force last year. Negotiations to extend the cuts into 1986 will take place this spring, when bargaining for a new contract ordinarily would have begun.

The IAM and TWU agreements also call for lowering the reduction in pay to 13 percent in the first year. In addition, they provide a 5-percent pay increase retroactive to Feb. 1, followed by a 6-percent hike in February 1986.

Under the agreement, IAM members in the highest wage bracket, whose full contract rate is $17.40 an hour, would earn about $15.14 an hour this year.

Productivity clauses

All three unions also agreed to certain productivity improvements. The ALPA agreement, for example, would increase pilots' total flying hours from 80 to 84 per month and provide for a "voluntary deferral" of vacation to future years.

The Machinists represents the largest number of Eastern employees, about 12,000 mechanics, flight dispatchers, and other ground crews. TWU represents some 6,500 flight attendants, while ALPA bargains for 4,000 pilots.

Complete details are still being worked out. IAM ratification is expected to be completed within 10 days after final negotiations. TWU will conduct a mail ballot referendum, and ALPA announced its ratification procedure could take up to 45 days.

The agreements, ending weeks of difficult negotiations, are expected to save Eastern about $250 million this year. Eastern has not reported an annual profit since 1979. With the contracts, the airline predicted it would turn a profit in 1985.

Tradeoffs

Last year, in a landmark $380-million cost-cutting and power-sharing arrangement, workers represented by the three unions accepted 18-to-20-percent pay cuts in return for 25 percent of the company's stock, representation on Eastern's board of directors, and other tradeoffs.

After Eastern's management unilaterally extended the 1984 pay cuts beyond Jan. 1, the three unions sued to have the wage cuts rescinded.

In return for the wage cuts, workers will received a profit-sharing plan that will go into effect when profits exceed $90 million a year.

Strong auto import curbs pressed

A panel of union representatives cautioned the Administration that a huge loss of U.S. jobs would result if restraints on Japanese auto imports are removed this spring.

"American jobs are on the line, and the Reagan Administration has the power to help protect or sacrifice the livelihoods of 140,000 workers," unions representing more than a million workers in the auto component industry declared.

The warning came in a meeting between Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige and Steelworkers President Lynn Williams, Electronics Workers President William Bywater, Rubber Workers President Milan Stone and President Howard Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The unions called on Baldrige to recommend retention of the restraints, citing forecasts which show a loss of 140,000 production jobs if Japanese auto imports are permitted to climb to a predicted 2.5-million units.

A four-year Voluntary Restraint Agreement limiting Japanese auto imports into the United States is due to expire on Mar. 31. The labor delegation urged Baldrige to take "prompt and favorable action" to insure continuation of the VRA on a multi-year basis.

Percentage of market

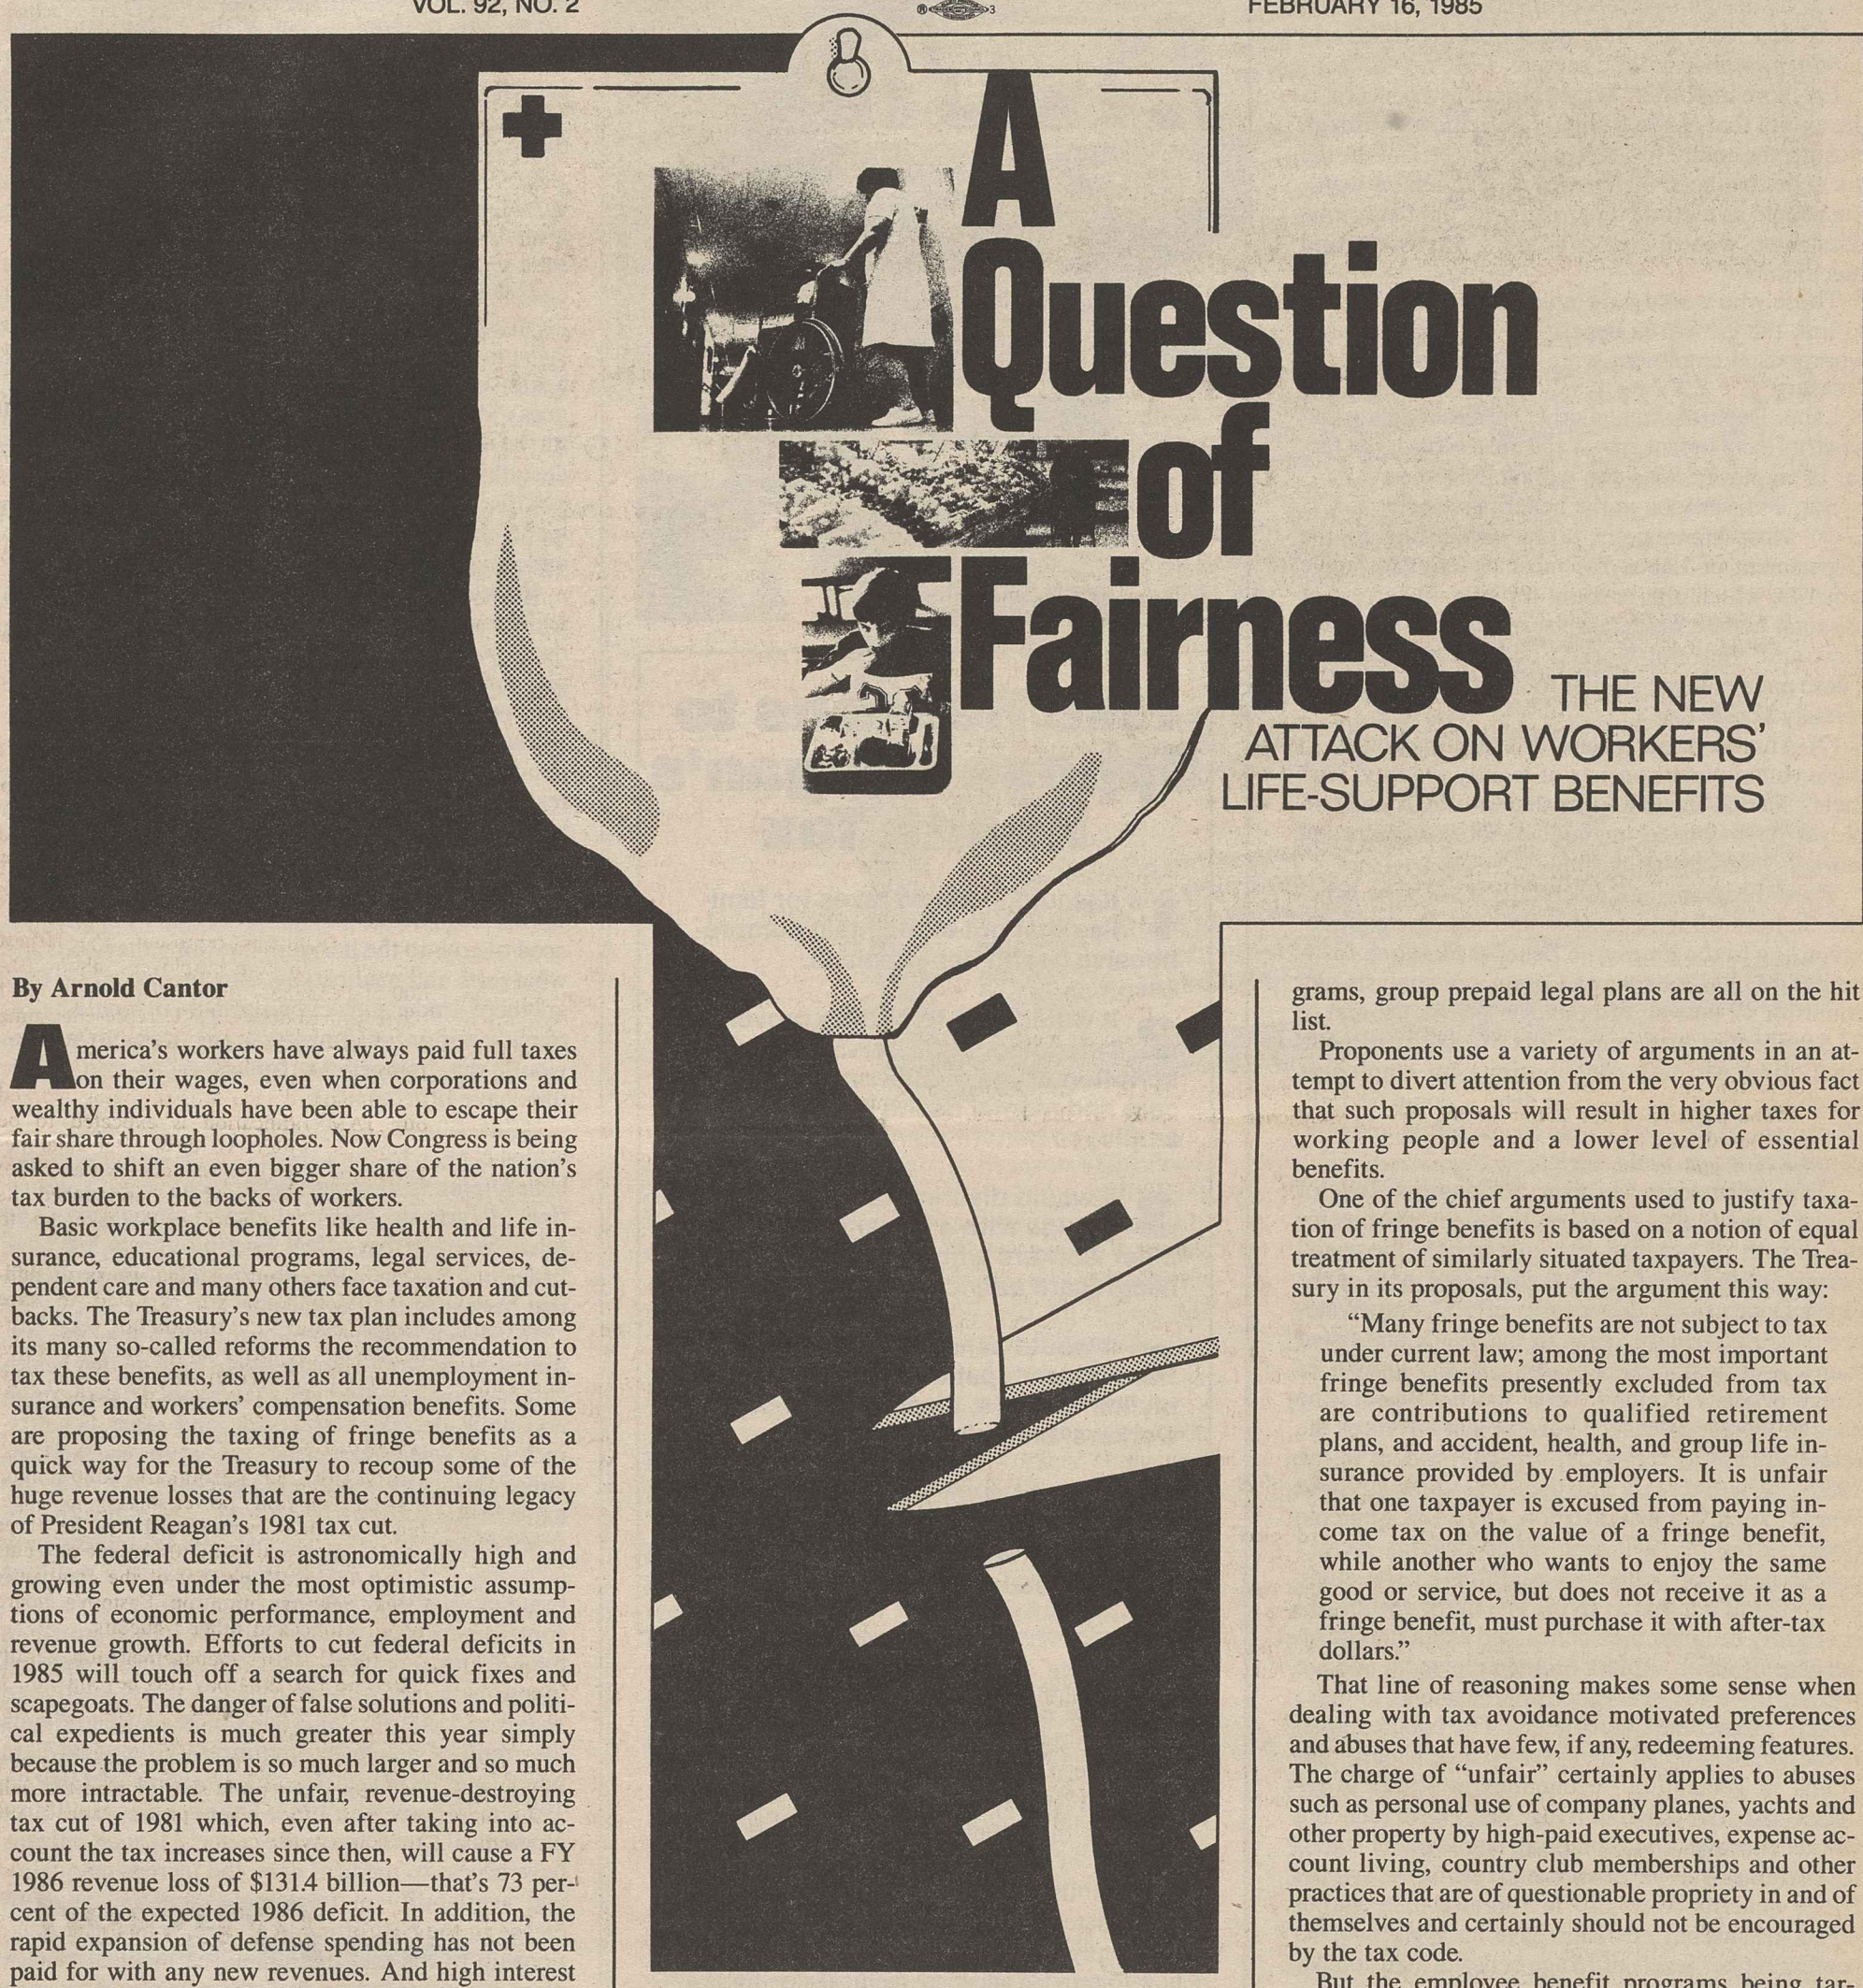
They recommended a switch from absolute numbers to a market share concept, which would hold Japanese auto imports to 17 percent of the U.S. auto market. The Japanese share is now 21 percent; only two years ago, it was as high as 23 percent.

In calling for renewal of restraints, the labor group added their support to similar requests by the Auto Workers and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.



Kirkland made known his views in a personal meeting last month in Tokyo with Japanese Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone and in a letter to Sec. of State George P. Shultz.

Kirkland told Shultz that Japan's market share would soon rise to 40 percent or more with severe repercussions to workers in the U.S. auto and related industries if the curbs were dropped.

"The United States is already the most open market in the world for Japanese cars," the union officials told Baldrige. Meanwhile, they pointed out, Japanese markets are closed to virtually every sort of American-made goods.

Of the 140,000 threatened production jobs, they told Baldrige, about 25,000 would be in the steel industry, already hard hit by international competition, with the rest in electrical equipment, tires and other auto component industries.

A Question of Fairness

THE NEW ATTACK ON WORKERS' LIFE-SUPPORT BENEFITS

By Arnold Cantor

America's workers have always paid full taxes on their wages, even when corporations and wealthy individuals have been able to escape their fair share through loopholes. Now Congress is being asked to shift an even bigger share of the nation's tax burden to the backs of workers.

Basic workplace benefits like health and life insurance, educational programs, legal services, dependent care and many others face taxation and cutbacks. The Treasury's new tax plan includes among its many so-called reforms the recommendation to tax these benefits, as well as all unemployment insurance and workers' compensation benefits. Some are proposing the taxing of fringe benefits as a quick way for the Treasury to recoup some of the huge revenue losses that are the continuing legacy of President Reagan's 1981 tax cut.

The federal deficit is astronomically high and growing even under the most optimistic assumptions of economic performance, employment and revenue growth. Efforts to cut federal deficits in 1985 will touch off a search for quick fixes and scapegoats. The danger of false solutions and political expedients is much greater this year simply because the problem is so much larger and so much more intractable. The unfair, revenue-destroying tax cut of 1981 which, even after taking into account the tax increases since then, will cause a FY 1986 revenue loss of $131.4 billion—that's 73 percent of the expected 1986 deficit. In addition, the rapid expansion of defense spending has not been paid for with any new revenues. And high interest rates have aggravated the debt burden.

Despite widespread and nonpartisan agreement that deficits of this size and duration court disaster, the options are few and far between. Federally financed programs essential to the nation's health, welfare and public sector capital needs have already been savaged. Regardless of where the defense budget debate ultimately winds up, spending still will increase. And neither the Congress nor the Administration seems interested in fair and sensible tax reforms that can enhance equity and at the same time increase federal revenue.

Arnold Cantor is assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research. Karen Ignagni and James Ellenberger, assistant directors of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, also made substantial contributions to this article.

Against this backdrop, attempts to shift more of the nation's tax burden onto workers will continue, and the many proposals to tax employee benefits could prove irresistible in the last-minute scramble to adopt a federal budget.

The threat is very real. Many such trial balloons have been floated. Taxing workers's health benefits has been a part of this Administration's agenda since its earliest days, and many of the popularly talked about rate-flattening, base-broadening reform proposals, including the Treasury's package and the Bradley-Gephardt "fair" tax plan, would tax employee benefits.

In jeopardy are widely used programs that affect the great majority of working Americans and fulfill major, demonstrable needs and social purposes.

Health insurance, accident and life insurance, workers' compensation, day care, education programs, group prepaid legal plans are all on the hit list.

Proponents use a variety of arguments in an attempt to divert attention from the very obvious fact that such proposals will result in higher taxes for working people and a lower level of essential benefits.

One of the chief arguments used to justify taxation of fringe benefits is based on a notion of equal treatment of similarly situated taxpayers. The Treasury in its proposals, put the argument this way:

> "Many fringe benefits are not subject to tax under current law; among the most important fringe benefits presently excluded from tax are contributions to qualified retirement plans, and accident, health, and group life insurance provided by employers. It is unfair that one taxpayer is excused from paying income tax on the value of a fringe benefit, while another who wants to enjoy the same good or service, but does not receive it as a fringe benefit, must purchase it with after-tax dollars."

That line of reasoning makes some sense when dealing with tax avoidance motivated preferences and abuses that have few, if any, redeeming features. The charge of "unfair" certainly applies to abuses such as personal use of company planes, yachts and other property by high-paid executives, expense account living, country club memberships and other practices that are of questionable propriety in and of themselves and certainly should not be encouraged by the tax code.

But the employee benefit programs being targeted are not frivolous "perks" or gimmicks to shelter income, generate phony losses or otherwise reduce the taxes of the already privileged. These measures are for the most part long-standing economic buttresses of the tax code, providing benefits and protections that are widely distributed and clearly in the national interest.

It is unfair that not all workers are accorded the benefits of an adequate medical program, pension protection, life insurance and other benefits. But such inequities should be resolved through public and private policies that encourage a leveling-up of benefits, not by policies that seek to reduce everyone to the lowest common denominator.

Such a narrow view of equity ignores the far greater inequity that would result from a lowering of benefits and fewer participants. That viewpoint also implies that tax justice means merely rearranging the tax burdens of working people.

To qualify for tax exclusion now, the benefit plans must comply with stringent rules that prohibit discrimination in favor of owners, officers, shareholders and highly compensated employees and generally contain limitations and constraints to assure that the intended beneficiaries and purposes are served. That test clearly distinguishes these provisions from so many other so-called tax preferences which by design or effect primarily benefit a privileged few and provide no assurance that any national purpose will be served.

Far more important, if tax fairness is a concern, is the equity that can and should be achieved through closing the many loopholes and distortions in the tax code that heap the burden of taxation on working people as a group and tread only lightly on corporations, wealthy stockholders, investors and speculators.

Those who would tax employee benefits also like to link the growth in benefits to the tax code as if workers and employers were conspiring to raid the Treasury.

Labor Department and other studies indicate that benefits have in fact grown and are a substantial factor in employer costs and workers incomes.

But, a closer look at the benefits reveals:

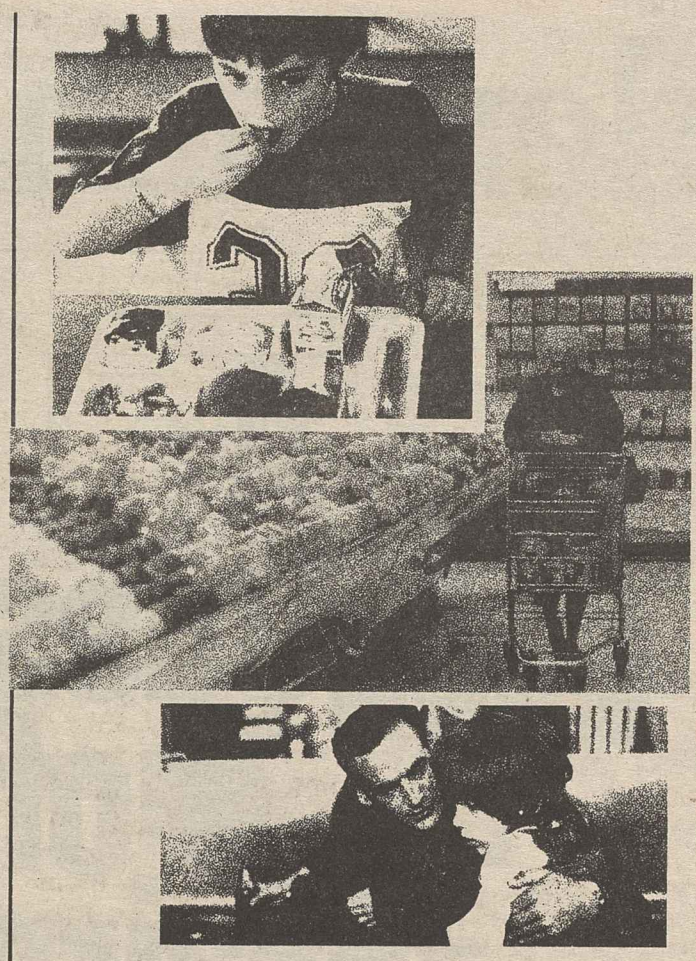
(1) Most are already taxed. According to the Department of Labor, the most widespread fringe benefits, which also account for over 40 percent of the total benefit costs, are vacations with pay, holidays and time not worked because of sickness. These payments are similar to wages and are appropriately taxed.

(2) Another large group of benefits included in these calculations consists of legally required payments such as the employer share of FICA and employer payments to unemployment insurance and workers' compensation funds.

These programs are essentially a tax. The benefits that are already taxable and legally required, according to the Employee Benefits Research Institute and U.S. Chamber of Commerce analysis, account for 72 percent of employer payments, and to 23.5 percent of total wages. Tax "favored" benefits (including pension contributions by employers which are taxed, but at a later date) account for only 28 percent of the total employer payments and nine percent of wages and salaries.

(3) A just-released Library of Congress study of fringe benefits also points up the many reasons for the growth of benefits and underscores the social purpose of the benefits. That study took note of the Great Depression's "disastrous effect" on private-sector fringe benefit plans in the 1930s and listed many historical factors leading to the growth of fringe benefits. Among these, specifically, are the need to complement such government efforts as the establishment of the social security system in the 1930s, War Labor board decisions during World War II to help prevent inflation, and a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 1949 that fringe benefits were a proper issue for collective bargaining. The study also pointed out that as living standards rise, workers rightly become more concerned about the consequences of death, illness or unemployment and are willing to "trade off" other improvements in order to gain protection against them. The congressional research study noted the role of fringe benefit programs in generating "economies in scale" at reduced cost. The effect of fringe benefits in reducing worker turnover and promoting employment stability as well as the role of unions in raising the level of fringe benefits were also highlighted. The author noted that unionized firms have an average of 30 percent higher levels of fringe benefits than comparable nonunion firms.

Interestingly enough, the analysis also pointed out that even with the dramatic increases of U.S. fringe benefits in the post-World War II era ". . . the relative level of U.S. fringe benefits still remains a smaller part of total compensation than it is in most other industrialized nations."



The evolution of fringe benefits as part of employee compensation is tied to the history of the labor movement itself. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers established a life insurance program in 1892. Because of the perceived hazardous nature of their work, life insurance was not otherwise available. The garment industry fought for insurance and pensions at the start of this century.

The 1940s saw the first successes for union-negotiated insurance and pensions. The first industry-wide retirement fund was won by the New York Cloak Makers in 1943. The first negotiated health plan was bargained for in the dress industry in 1944. The motivation and social necessity was summarized by ILGWU Vice President Charles Zimmerman at the union's 25th convention in 1944:

> "Firmly rooted in our tradition as an organization is the belief in the principle that the welfare of the worker is the concern and responsibility of the employer, who profits immediately, and of the society which benefits ultimately from his labor. . . . The problem of how to provide adequate medical care for low-income groups has for decades attracted the serious attention of all responsible citizens. The members of our union should be proud that our International has been among the first organizations to take practical steps toward its solution. The establishment of the principle of employer responsibility for the worker's health . . . will be of inestimable value in promoting . . . a nationwide program of medical security."

At the 11th Constitutional Convention of the CIO (1949) Resolution No. 9 put it this way:

> "Because government social security programs fail to meet standards of adequacy and are now completely lacking in benefits and services for health and disability, it should be a continuing necessity for unions to bargain collectively to supplement these government security programs."

Five Reasons to Oppose Reagan's Health Tax

1 It would increase taxes for families that opt to maintain comprehensive health benefit plans.

2 It would lead to cutting preventive care, diagnostic services, prescription drugs, dental care, vision care and mental health coverage from employee benefit plans.

3 It would discriminate against groups with a larger portion of older workers who may need more health care services.

4 It would penalize workers in high-risk occupations, such as assembly-line workers, steel and foundry workers, and mine workers.

5 It would disproportionately affect certain urban areas and geographic regions where medical care costs are especially high.

Employee Health Tax

The Administration's proposal to place a monthly limit of $175 per family and $70 per individual on the amount of tax-free contributions that employers make to worker health insurance plans would dismantle the safety net of negotiated group health insurance. These policies cover union members and non-union workers without regard to sex, health status or type of employment. If the Administration's proposal passed, millions of families would be forced out of economic necessity to avoid paying higher taxes by giving up their protection against the high cost of getting sick.

In addition to the disastrous effect such a plan would have on negotiated health benefits, the Administration grossly overstates the potential for such proposals to reduce health care inflation. The underlying premise of the Reagan argument is that the passage of an employee health tax would give consumers strong economic incentives to reduce health care coverage. This in turn (so the theory goes) would force patients to reduce their demand for health care services and force providers to reduce the price they charge for those services.

This rationale, based on laws of supply and demand, is the so-called "market solution" to the nation's health care crisis.

Health care is not like other economic sectors, and the principles of supply and demand are not adequate policy determinants in health care. For example, a recent article in the Journal of Human Resources used data from the Dept. of Health & Human Services to conclude that health care expenditures which were initiated by physicians represented 89 percent of total health care expenditures. In other words, unlike other sectors of our economy where consumers make their own decisions, in health care doctors are the purchasing agents for patients. Physicians decide when patients need to go into the hospital, how long they stay, and what tests and medications they receive while they are there. Under such circumstances, it would be extremely unfair for Congress to pass a health tax that would penalize patients for situations over which they have little control.

If tax benefits for health care contributions are scaled back, what's most likely to be dropped from a benefit plan is coverage for preventive care, outpatient diagnostic services, dental, eyeglasses and other benefits that affect premium costs but have little to do with the health cost inflation problems that have plagued the nation.

In advocating the employee health tax, the Administration would have citizens believe that health care is a costless "fringe" to workers. In fact, tough economic decisions are made and other benefits, including wages, are sacrificed to preserve and enhance the health care benefit package. All of us are extremely sensitive to the rising costs of health care services and, in collective bargaining, increasingly have had to make difficult decisions as a result of Congress's inability to pass a comprehensive cost-containment program to reduce the rate of growth in total health care costs. This has obviously resulted in a growth in health insurance benefits relative to wages and salaries. This is an increase that reflects the trend of rising expenditures on medical care which has increased from 3.2 percent of GNP in 1953 to 7.2 percent in 1983. The rise in expenditures on medical care reflects the concern that all citizens have access to medical care, the increasing quality and availability of treatments, and the rapid increase in the cost of medical care. It has little relationship to the fact that employee medical benefit plans are not taxed. In fact, there has been a rise in number of plans that require the employees to pay a portion of the health insurance costs—an occurrence in direct conflict with the notion that the exemption has caused the increased use.

The Administration also has claimed that health insurance benefits are unnecessary subsidies for higher wage workers. The AFL-CIO strongly rejects this position and has attempted to bring to the attention of Congress the effect that the health tax would have on middle- and low-income families, older workers and those with chronic conditions.

Employers contribute the same amount for health coverage per employee, regardless of income. As a result, health benefits as a percent of income are more valuable to families at lower wage levels. Limiting tax free contributions would, therefore, place a disproportionate burden on middle- and lower-income workers who would find it much more difficult to maintain their level of benefits.

Individuals with higher incomes would probably purchase supplemental health insurance policies to assure that their present coverage is not interrupted. In other words, there is persuasive evidence which suggests that the health tax would turn back decades of progress we have made in insuring workers against the high cost of getting sick.

The President of the Health Insurance Association of America summed it up this way: "Consider what this means for health insurance protection. Those left in the plans will be those who can afford the higher costs and those who are older and more in need of frequent health care services. This will in turn cause the premiums of the plan to go up, and more and more people will be forced out. Or, at best, receive less protection as employers cut back coverages."

Other nations have basic coverage as a national right and a public-government cost. In the United States an implied decision was made to extend government into the health care process by declaring that if the program is fair and equitable it is in the national interest to encourge it and not treat it as a tax dodge.

Another erroneous assumption the Administration has made about the employee health tax is that workers in very few industries actually would be affected by the proposed implementation of the Reagan plan. An informal AFL-CIO survey of a number of international unions completely refutes this position. According to the Machinists, a majority of the union's members would be forced to pay taxes on their health benefits. The "vast majority" of Auto Workers, Steelworkers and members of the Electrical Workers as well as the Electronics Workers also would be affected. The Service Employees claims that about half of all SEIU members would be hurt. It is estimated that 60 percent of the membership of the State, County & Municipal Employees would fall above the cap. For the United Food & Commercial Workers, the average contribution to health benefits in the union's largest agreement amounts to $250 per family, $75 per month above the proposed limit. It is clear that a broad range of AFL-CIO members would be penalized by the Reagan plan.

Another issue with respect to the Administration's proposed health tax that cannot be ignored is the wide fluctuation of health care costs among geographic areas. For example, health benefit contributions for members of the Electrical Workers range from an average of $1 per hour in Oklahoma and Texas to as high as $2.40 per hour in California and approximately $1.75 per hour in New Jersey. Obviously, the Reagan proposal would disproportionately penalize workers in the highest cost areas.

In many ways the employee health tax is a straw man for those who have a fundamental aversion to the idea of the federal government regulating what are now staggering rates of payment for hospital and physicians' services. However, these same individuals are willing to impose a limit on employer-funded health insurance benefits because they believe that somehow forcing employees to pay taxes on benefits would dampen health care inflation. Any version of the employee tax proposal would significantly erode the progress workers have made in collective bargaining. The Administration must ask itself whether health care is the right place to look for ways to reduce deficits. It must not confuse cost-containment with revenue-raising.

Unemployment Assistance and Workers' Compensation

Without question, the most mean-spirited aspect of the Administration's proposals to tax life support benefits involves the heaping of further burdens on those suffering the loss of employment and the pain of work-related injury, disease and even death. Taxing the meager benefits provided under unemployment insurance to workers' compensation adds to the injustice for those workers who have experienced the indignity of job loss or the tragedy of injury or disability stemming from the workplace.

Unemployment insurance benefits, which average only $119 per week across the nation, are already subject to taxation if income exceeds $18,000 for married taxpayers and $12,000 for singles. The Treasury proposal would tax all UI benefits. In 1980, the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation, comprising of representatives of employers, workers and the public, recommended the "repeal of current provisions under which a portion of UI income is taxed." In its report to the President and the Congress, the commission said, "UI is the first line of defense against extreme hardship caused by unemployment. When a person is unemployed, the family's income stream is already reduced even if UI is being received. To subject this family's reduced income stream to income taxation adds to the unemployed person's sense of injury already caused by the loss of a job."

As devastating, if not more so, is the suggestion by the Administration to tax all workers' compensation benefits. The 1972 National Commission on Workmen's Compensation Laws concluded that, in general, inadequate benefit levels and inequitable treatment existed in all states. The 1979 report of the Interdepartmental Workers' Compensation Task Force found that by the most conservative standards, workers' compensation cash benefits to impaired workers were seriously inadequate. In the face of these authoritative studies, the Treasury Dept. now wants to make a bad situation immeasurably worse by taxing these benefits and further widening the gap between net income levels and what is necessary to maintain decent living standards.

Pensions

Attempts to tax employees on the deferred income value of employer contributions to qualified pension plans raises a huge array of issues. First, of course, is the fact that pension income is taxed when received by the employees and their beneficiaries. And to qualify, plans must comply with elaborate minimum participation standards and other rules that forbid contributions or benefits discriminating in favor of the employer's officers, shareholders, and other highly compensated employees. Moreover, the entire legislative history in the area of qualified pension plans has been one of concern with the level and security of employee benefits. On this point the Ways & Means House Committee in 1974 stated (H. Rep. #93-779)

> ". . . clearly the greatest single protection for rank and file employees during this time has been the Internal Revenue Service's administration of the provisions denying any special tax treatment in favor of employees who are officers, shareholders, supervisors, or highly compensated employees. The thrust of this provision is to require broader substantial participation in the plans than would be provided but for the Service's administration of the statute."

Other concerns arise from the fact that since workers do not have control over the use of pension contributions, it's hard to envision a fair method of considering the contributions as taxable income. For example:

- Many workers never get vested rights to the money that is placed in the pension fund in their name. Thus, people would be taxed on money they will never see.
- Although about 50 percent of all private-sector pension funds are for union workers, no union fully controls a fund and only 10-15 percent jointly control their funds. Thus, both union and nonunion workers in the public and private sector would be taxed for pension contributions as if they were receiving benefits equivalent to paychecks. They would pay taxes on money over which they have almost no influence
- Many pension funds are not fully funded. Would workers be taxed on the benefits they've accrued or on the amount which the employer has actually contributed?
- Frequently there are larger year-to-year fluctuations in employer contributions based on changing actuarial assumptions. How would this affect the taxes of individual workers?
- Recent hearings before the Labor Subcommittee of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee has shed light on the problem of corporations terminating healthy pensions to "recapture excess assets." Would workers be given tax credits when this happened?

The interest in taxing employer contributions to workers' pension plans is particularly difficult to understand in the light of the many recent attempts and actions to widen the exclusions for Individual Retirement Accounts and to expand plans for the self-employed. These measures contain few of the constraints and assurances against abuse that apply to qualified employee plans and have a proven track record of reducing the tax burdens of wealthier individuals while doing little or nothing to add to the nation's "savings" rate.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland sent the following letter to members of the House and Senate:

Forty years ago, America's workers had no life-support benefit program to protect them and their families. Today more than 90 percent of full-time workers—union and non-union—are covered by an employer health plan. Millions of Americans have life insurance programs, dental, child care and pre-paid legal service plans. This economic and social life-support system has become a fixture in American life with the support of Congress.

This system is now seriously threatened by legislation which would tax employee benefits, thus nullifying a longstanding congressional commitment to encourage these programs. This concept is being forwarded as a separate item as part of the Treasury's tax plan and is also incorporated in various flat or modified flat tax bills.

Under these proposals, almost all major employee benefit programs would be taxed. These include health and life insurance, dental coverage, child care, educational assistance, worker compensation, death benefits, pre-paid legal plans and many more. According to U.S. Treasury estimates, American workers would pay an additional $24 billion in higher yearly taxes by 1990 if this proposal is accepted by Congress. Since 75 percent of workers covered by health and life insurance plans earn less than $25,000, this benefits' tax would hurt those working people who could least afford it.

Finally, this new tax would build pressure on union and non-union employers to freeze or reduce employee benefits because of the tax consequence of this proposal. Young and single workers would be pitted against older workers and those with families.

This issue is of the greatest concern to America's working men and women and their unions. I strongly urge that you oppose any legislative effort to implement this tax scheme which so unfairly penalizes workers and prevents the continued development of privately financed programs of social and economic benefits.

Other Programs of Concern to Workers

The first $50,000 of employer-provided group term life insurance is also excluded from tax under present law and would be taxed by the Treasury and other proposals.

Again, the limitation in current law prevents discrimination and abuse; those who do receive relatively high benefits are already taxed as a result of the $50,000 maximum and to the extent that the legislation has resulted in a cost to the Treasury, the protection afforded those who need it the most is certainly in the national interest.

Group legal services plans would no longer be tax exempt under the Treasury proposals. The current tax treatment of qualified group legal service plans has helped in making such services available at minimal cost to many who would otherwise be denied such protection. There is no evidence that such plans have been abused or exploited as tax shelters or have led to inequities or discriminatory practices.

Stringent limits also preclude abuse in dependent care services, another benefit plan in jeopardy. Any revenue gain would be minimal and it is clearly in the national interest to encourage the growth and development of such programs.

Also, Congress was wrong last year in allowing the expiration of the statutory exclusion from income of benefits provided employees and laid-off workers under an educational assistance program. Fortunately the program was re-enacted for one more year. Again, there is no evidence of abuse and the limitations and conditions needed to qualify assure against unintended benefits or actions contrary to congressional intent. And programs under these plans have helped employees and laid-off workers receive essential training.

The deficit problem is real and Congress can ill afford to overlook any opportunity to make the tax structure fairer and better equipped to meet the nation's needs.

Nevertheless, the fact that the root cause of the problem is the 1981 tax cut cannot be put aside. That act decimated the Treasury and shifted much of the remaining burden onto the backs of working Americans.

The 1982 and 1984 tax measures raised some revenue through curbing abuses and trimming some loopholes. However, substantial reliance was on excise taxes, taxing employee benefits and other measures that hurt working people. At the same time, measures such as the withholding of taxes on interest, dividends, and foreign-portfolio income were defeated, corporations were given a $12 billion windfall by the forgiveness of taxes "deferred" under the Domestic International Sales Corp. program, and the capital gains holding period was cut in half, widening the loopholes responsible for most of the inequities in the individual income tax.

This pattern of heaping more and more of the tax burden on working people must be reversed. And it must be recognized that any revenue to be gained through taxing workers on their fringe benefits—particularly those in the areas of health, education, pensions and similar social needs—would result in more injustice, not less.

Full-time Employees by Participation[1] in Employee Benefit Programs

Medium and Large Firms, 1983

| Employee benefit program | All employees | Professional and administrative | Technical and clerical employees | Production employees |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Sickness and accident insurance | 49% | 29% | 34% | 67% |
| Long-term disability insurance | 45 | 66 | 58 | 28 |
| Health insurance for employee | 96 | 98 | 95 | 96 |
| Health insurance for dependents | 93 | 95 | 91 | 92 |
| Life insurance | 96 | 97 | 95 | 95 |

[1]Participation is defined as coverage by a time off, insurance, or pension plan. Employees subject to a minimum service requirement before they are eligible for a benefit are counted as participants even if they have not met the requirement at the time of survey. If employees are required to pay part of the cost of a benefit, only those who elect the coverage and pay their share are counted as participants. Benefits for which the employee must pay the full premium are outside the scope of the survey. Only current employees are counted as participants; retirees are excluded even if participating in a benefit program.

Note: This survey covers medium and large private-sector nonagricultural establishments in the United States, excluding Alaska and Hawaii. Minimum firm size ranges from 50 to 250 employees depending on the industry covered. The number of employees included in this survey is about 55.6 million which is 54 percent of all employed, 81 percent of full-time employees, and 73 percent of private sector nonagricultural employees.

New Books

Don't Let Your Job Kill You

By Franklin Wallick, Progressive Press, Washington, D.C. 20012. 228 pages, $5.

This new book includes a full reprint of the 1972 edition of Wallick's "The American Worker: An Endangered Species," plus a new section on worker success stories and worker tactics.

The forward by Dr. Eula Bingham, former director of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, notes that although the references in the main text are more than 15 years old, the main thrust of the book remains pertinent today.

Wallick's thesis is that informed and alert workers can transform the workplace into something that is healthful and safe, noted Bingham.

Wallick, editor of the Auto Workers' UAW Washington Report for more than two decades, improved on his original work by adding a 50-page section that provides a number of success stories from the workplace and describes tactics that have proved effective.

Also included are listings of state and local centers for occupational safety and health, the locations of worker health clinics, and a bibliography of books and films dealing with occupational safety and health issues.

Work & Health

By Phillip L. Polakoff, M.D., M.P.H. Press Associates, Inc., 806-15th St., N.W., Suite 632, Washington, D.C. 20005. 231 pages, $7.95.

Work & Health is easy, straightforward reading that provides vital information for workers, shop stewards and union leaders.

Dr. Polakoff's book is divided into seven main sections: occupational stress, workplace chemicals, job safety and health issues, enhancing worker health, controlling job hazards, body systems and physical agents, such as noise, heat, light, radiations, etc.

A special resource section advises where to go for help or additional information. Also included is a list of scientific terms and symbols and a glossary.

The everyday struggle to avoid accidents and diseases in the workplace is being lost by the workers. Occupational diseases kill twice as many people each year as auto accidents, yet most diseases and many accidents are preventable.

Dr. Polakoff details those hazards, citing the scientific data available and explaining in layman's terms what it means and why it's important.

The section on occupational stress is the plus for this book, as it provides excellent information on a subject that is an invisible ingredient for many job descriptions. The everyday results of too much stress on the job are covered here—alcoholism, drug abuse, high blood pressure, mental illness, stroke, heart attack and compulsive gambling.

Workers have a right to know about the hazards of the workplace and reading Work & Health is a large first step workers can take toward gaining that knowledge. The author writes a regular column on health matters for Press Associates, Inc., the labor press news service.

Ethical Guidelines for a Religious Institution Confronted by a Union

By Ed Marciniak. National Center for the Laity, 14 E. Chestnut St., Chicago, Ill. 60611. $1.50 first copy; 50¢ each additional copy.

In a brief paper, Ed Marciniak, president of the Institute of Urban Life, Loyola University, Chicago, gives administrators of Catholic institutions eight simple guides for the process of moving from shock and disbelief when employees of the institution decide they want to engage in collective bargaining to recognition that a union can be a resource.

Marciniak patiently reminds administrators that Catholic social doctrines apply to Catholic institutions as employers as well as to other employers. He draws upon papal documents, bishops' statements, and the published commentaries of many church leaders, both clerical and lay, to suggest that labor-management relations should be characterized by mutual respect rather than paternalism.

Putting to rout the notion that Church teaching regarding the rights of workers to seek collective bargaining gives unfavorable advantage to unions, the author goes on to inform administrators that the desire of employees of religious institutions for collective bargaining will grow, not diminish in the coming years. In closing, he recommends that institutional executives consider labor-management relations without personal agitation.

This seasoned and objective presentation could be recommended for its bibliography alone, even if its message were not so clear and persuasive.

Everybody's Money Consumer Directory

Published by Credit Union National Association, Inc., Madison, Wis. 53701, 96 pp. $2.50, paper.

Credit Union National Association, the trade association serving credit unions, has put together this handy manual on how to get effective action on your consumer complaint.

The 1985 edition gives tips on how to write a complaint letter and suggests procedures to follow to get the action your complaint deserves.

What's really valuable about the manual is its listing by name of top executives of companies that make consumer products or provide consumer services. It also lists state government offices established for consumer protection as well as state and local consumer organizations that may be able to help.

"This directory tells you how, when, and to whom you should complain," says Eleanor Anderson, editor of Everybody's Magazine which put it together. "Most companies would prefer to keep their customers happy by resolving complaints.

"But first you have to tell them something's wrong."

The manual will help you tell 'em.

Teachers warn

Reagan tax scheme perils school funding

A Reagan Administration proposal to eliminate the deductions taxpayers now are allowed to take on their federal income tax returns for state and local property, income and sales taxes could result in drastic cutbacks in non-federal spending levels for education, the American Federation of Teachers warned.

"This proposal would constitute the largest slash in federal aid to education in our history," AFT President Albert Shanker told a Washington news conference.

"The biggest contribution the U.S. government currently makes to education is by allowing taxpayers to make state and local property and income taxes deductible on their federal income tax returns," Shanker said.

New study

According to a new AFT study, the net effect of eliminating the deductions would be to increase federal income tax liability by more than $39 billion.

Shanker, who was joined by Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), noted that the average per pupil loss on a national basis would be $271 if the deductibility option for state and local taxes was approved by Congress.

New York State would be the hardest hit with a $588 per pupil loss, while Wyoming would suffer the least, with a $75 per pupil loss.

In a separate statement, Shanker assailed Education Sec. William Bennett for his attacks on grants in aid and financial loans to college students. The Administration wants to slash the college loan program by 25 percent.

"We need an education secretary who will be a forceful spokesman for quality education," Shanker stressed. "We don't need a secretary who sees his job as being a hatchet man for the President."

The $2-billion cut in college aid the Administration is proposing would cause "a genuine hardship on hundreds of thousands of middle-income students and their families," he warned.

Shanker and Moynihan predicted that if the Administration succeeds in eliminating the tax deductions it will become increasingly difficult to get taxpayers at the state and local levels to pay for public schools. Education spending at those levels could decline by as much as $16 billion.

The deductions provide federal support for state and local services, particularly education, and help reduce the cost of those services in states with high levels of service.

In addition to the potential for sharp declines in state and local government spending, cutting out the deductions likely would result in more regressive tax structures, the AFT study warned.

"Elimination of the deductibility option will result in greater losses for taxpayers in states with higher levels of public services, more progressive tax structures, high income levels and a greater commitment to public schools," Shanker and Moynihan said.

Because education is by far the largest single area of spending of state and local governments, major losses would be incurred by those states with high levels of support for public education, the AFT study noted.

Hardest hit

The study estimated that the hardest hit states, in terms of total dollar loss for education, would be California, $2.9 billion; New York, $2.1 billion; Michigan, $991 million; Illinois, $858 million, and New Jersey, $836 million.

In terms of dollar loss per pupil (elementary and secondary), the states that would be hit the hardest are New York, $588 per pupil; New Jersey, $586; Maryland, $541; Minnesota, $509, and Connecticut, $508.

Shanker said that while simplification of the tax system is needed, there should be no tampering with a popular deduction that is based on the concept that a taxpayer should not have to pay taxes twice.

"At a time when the federal government has acknowledged that our educational shortcomings have made us a 'nation at risk', there's nothing wrong with federal tax policy helping to provide for a vital public function," Shanker said.

AFL-CIO's fund channels drought relief to Africa

The AFL-CIO African Drought Relief Fund donated $34,000 to the Red Cross rescue effort to aid the famine-stricken regions of Africa.

Contributions to the fund, being channeled through the federation's African-American Labor Center, have come from the AFL-CIO and 17 affiliates.

AALC Executive Director Patrick O'Farrell presented the check to American Red Cross President Richard F. Schubert as a "first installment" in providing aid.

In a separate effort, the Letter Carriers and Postal Workers with the cooperation of the U.S. Postal Service raised more than $770,000 from 50,000 individuals.

News coverage of the famine in Africa has presented graphic evidence of the dire need for assistance to the 150 million Africans afflicted in six countries.

The federation's fund, first set up to provide "union-to-union" relief, is operating instead through the international agencies that are providing the needed assistance. Frank Emig, director of the Dept. of Community Services, said the change was made because many of the needy nations do not have free trade unions.

The AFL-CIO fund augments contributions made directly to relief agencies by its affiliated unions and the members.

Among the contributors to the African Drought Relief Fund are the Communications Workers, Letter Carriers, Electronics Workers, Transit Union, the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, Service Employees, Maintenance of Way Employes, Operating Engineers, Furniture Workers, Utility Workers, the Leather, Plastics & Novely Workers, Rubber Workers, Longshoremen, ILA Atlantic Coast District, SEIU District 3 and the Central California Newspaper Guild.

Irish cause tied to labor support for human rights

New York—Concern for human rights and worker rights around the world is a hallmark of the American trade union movement, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a tribute to Carpenters President Patrick Campbell.

Campbell was honored by the American Labor Committee for Human Rights in Northern Ireland for his long "service to the labor movement" and dedication to the "cause of Irish freedom."

Speaking at the presentation ceremony, Donahue noted that when people are getting kicked around, Campbell is "always against the kicker and prepared to defend the people being kicked."

He reminded the gathering that people are being kicked around today "not only in Poland and Chile, in Central America, in South Africa and Northern Ireland, but in our own country as well."

In the battle for human rights, Donahue said, "we acknowledge delays but not defeats. . . This movement of ours was built for the long haul."

Donahue noted that the first statement on international affairs made at the 1881 founding convention of today's labor movement was in support of the struggle for freedom of the Irish people. "I take pride in this movement's unbroken record of unwavering support for that cause," he said.

As in South Africa, the hope for change in Northern Ireland rests in "intensive pressure applied by other nations." Donahue said the outlook in Northern Ireland is brightened since the parties are at least "engaged in a sometime dialogue." But it will take world and government opinion to move beyond "sterile dialogue" toward a peaceful resolution, Donahue observed.

"We need to speed this effort," he urged.

OSHA pressed to end delay on standard for cancer agent

Any further delay by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in proposing a standard on ethylene dibromide would be "an unconscionable act" needlessly jeopardizing the lives of workers exposed to the cancer-causing chemical, the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. said.

It has been over a year since the Environmental Protection Agency issued a ban on most uses of this toxic pesticide. After September 1984, EDB use was permitted only on fruit for export between October and January. On Feb. 4, 1985, the EPA agreed to allow post-harvest fumigation of citrus products exported to Japan through the month of June.

FAST President Robert F. Harbrant, in a letter to OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland, urged immediate implementation of a standard limiting worker exposures to 100 parts EDB per billion parts of air. OSHA's current standard—20,000 ppb—is 200 times higher than that.

Harbrant noted that an EPA letter in March 194 informed OSHA that exposure and risk estimates for workers in Florida warehouse operations "warrant additional protection for these workers." Earlier, EPA had urged the agency to reduce the exposure limit to 100 ppb.

Still waiting

OSHA, on Oct. 7, 1983, proposed lowering the worker exposure level to 100 ppb for EDB, which is a colorless, nonflammable liquid linked to cancer and reproductive damage. Hearings on that proposal were held one year ago, but OSHA doesn't plan to issue a standard before May.

The agency has twice rejected petitions by labor for an emergency standard to lower the exposure limit to 100 ppb. The most recent rejection came last June, several months after the EPA had limited the levels of EDB allowed in food.

Harbrant noted in his letter that dock workers in Japan who are receiving the treated fruit have a worker exposure standard of 130 ppb, while the American workers who load and transport the citrue products can legally be subjected to exposures up to 20,000 ppb.

Congress urged to continue supplemental jobless benefits

The AFL-CIO and a coalition of organizations concerned with the plight of the jobless are pressing Congress to continue the Federal Supplemental Compensation program for the long-term unemployed.

The FSC program, started in 1982, is now providing benefits to some 315,000 persons who were still without jobs when their state unemployment insurance entitlement was used up—usually after 26 weeks of payments.

FSC allows an additional eight weeks of federal payments in most states, with up to 14 weeks in states with the highest insured unemployment rates.

Hearings set

Unless Congress acts, the FSC payments will end on Mar. 31 when the law expires. A House Ways & Means subcommittee has set hearings on an extension bill for later this month, with the AFL-CIO scheduled to testify.

An intermediate program of extended benefits, financed half by the states and half in federal matching funds, remains on the statute books. But eligibility requirements have been made so stringent that the extended benefits program is still in effect only in Alaska, West Virginia and Puerto Rico.

A call for an extension of FSC—as the first step toward permanent strengthening of the unemployment compensation safety net—was made by the Full Employment Action Council, a coalition of some 50 organizations. The council is headed by Coretta Scott King, president of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Center, and Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley.

In their letter to members of Congress, Finley and King pointed to the continued seriousness of the long-term unemployment problem and the large numbers of workers passed by in the nation's recovery from the depths of recession.

The workers drawing FSC, and those who have already used up their eligibilty or weren't eligible to start, "are looking for employment and can find none through no fault of their own," they stressed.

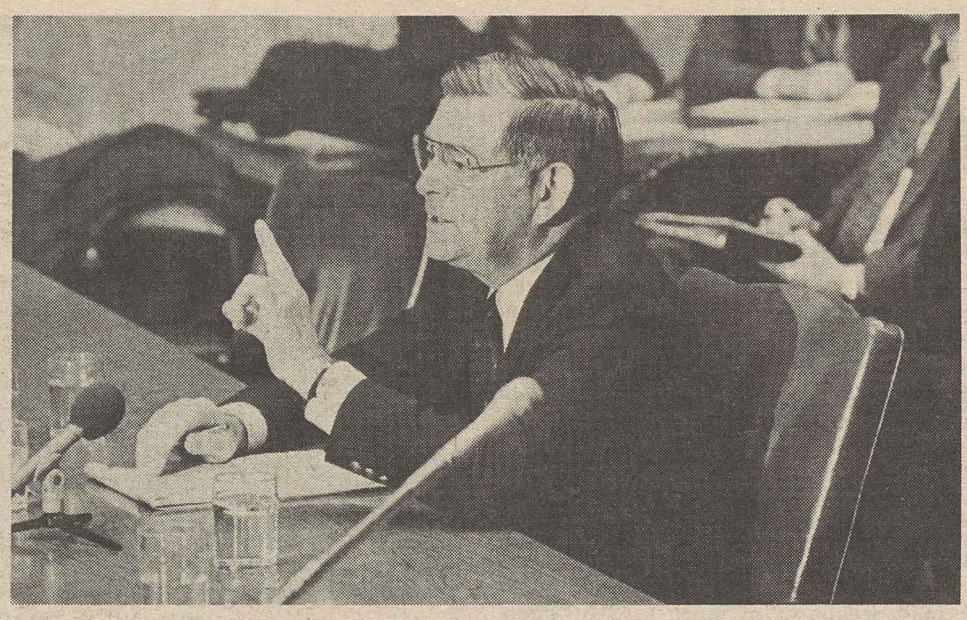
The number of long-term unemployed has grown by 20 prcent over the past four years, the council letter stressed, and the unemployment compensation system "is clearly not meeting its objective" as "partial wage replacement to involuntarily unemployed workers."

Ohio ruling lifts limits on disease claims

Columbus, Ohio—Another in a series of workers' compensation decisions by the Ohio Supreme Court will help employees suffering from occupational diseases qualify for benefits that a statute of limitations law had denied them.

In its latest decision, Ohio's high court threw out a state law that had limited the period during which victims of silicosis could file for workers' compensation. Silicosis is a debilitating and sometimes fatal lung disease.

The state supreme court's decision is expected to open the way for workers' compensation filings by victims of other occupational diseases who had also been shut out by the state's statutes of limitations.



In 1976, the Ohio legislature removed the statute of limitations on filing for compensation for occupational diseases, but the change was not applied to workers affected before its enactment. Consequently, many workers afflicted before 1976 were denied the right to obtain benefits.

Eight-year limit

Previously, victims of silicosis and other occupational diseases had to file for benefits within eight years after the last exposure to the injurious working conditions. In the case the high court reviewed, the claimant's last exposure and eventual death both occurred before the law was changed.

The court ruled that the restrictions on a claimant's right to file for workers' compensation were not "rationally related" to the state's policy of awarding benefits to the victims of occupational disease and so should not be used a a barrier to filings.

In December, the court had ruled that workers who suffer from job-related injuries that develop over a long term may be entitled to compensation. And in a separate decision, the court broadened the definition of "intentional wrongdoing" by employers to permit more workers to apply for benefits if they are injured on jobs where management knew there was "substantial certainty" of harm.

RLEA Chairman Ole Berge at Senate hearings on sale of Conrail.

Battle over Conrail's sale switched to Capitol Hill

vestitures and abandonments of trackage could result in a loss of jobs for up to 2,530 employees, from both Norfolk & Western and Conrail.

Ironically, Norfolk Southern was the one candidate overwhelmingly rejected by the Railway Labor Executives' Association, an umbrella group made up of 19 unions representing members employed by all railroads. Alleghany was the only one of the three bidders that all RLEA affiliates could accept.

As part of Alleghany's offer, Conrail workers would receive more than a 30-percent share in Alleghany. The New York-based firm also offered $1.2 billion for the freight carrier and assurances it would operate and maintain the system for a period of years.

Meanwhile, at its winter meeting in Miami Beach, the RLEA was reviewing its options in the Conrail sale.

RLEA Chairman Ole Berge, who is president of the Maintenance of Way Employees, said the key to labor's position is that Conrail's 35,000 employees must have their wages restored to industry levels, retroactive to July 1, 1984.

The unions and Conrail management signed a 39-month agreement in 1981 calling for deferral of a 12.5-percent wage increase that workers on all other major railroads received. With Conrail now a healthy and profitable property, they rightfully expect to be made whole, Berge stressed.

President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks, voicing concern that Alleghany would be unable to abide by its pledge to restore wage rates, came out in favor of a public sale of Conrail.

When Congress begins to consider legislation needed to consummate the sale, it is expected to focus on the process that led up to the selection of Norfolk Southern as the Administration's choice.

Close scrutiny

Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.), who chairs the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation & Tourism with jurisdiction over the legislation Congress must pass to let the government sell its 85-percent interest in Conrail, promised to hold tough hearings on the proposed sale.

Florio said he has serious questions about the cash offering made for Conrail, indicating that the sum of $1.2 billion does not come near the true worth of the railroad. Conrail recently was estimated to have a net worth of $5.7 billion, including physical plant, rolling stock, and other assets.

Both the House subcommittee and the Senate Commerce Committee will hold hearings in late February on Dole's recommendation of Norfolk Southern.

All indications, however, point toward considerable delay before Congress approves Norfolk Southern, if it approves it at all. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said he will introduce legislation Feb. 19 to halt any such transaction. Congress is now in recess, and that is the earliest Specter can offer any legislation.

Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), who chairs the full House Energy & Commerce Committee, said that he and his House colleagues would not be stampeded into a decision on the Conrail sale without taking a careful look at "all options on the table."

Conrail, which operates in 15 northeast and midwestern states, was created in 1976 out of the bankrupt Penn Central and five other ailing northeastern railroads.

State action slow on update of unemployment insurance

actions affecting benefit levels or eligibility standards:

Alaska—The ceiling on individual benefits rose from $155 to $188. With the maximum dependents' allowance, the rise is from $228 to $260.

Arkansas—Benefits have been frozen at a maximum of 60 percent of last year's state wage average. But the legislature recently approved a two-step thaw. In July, the benefit ceiling will be based on the 1985 wage average. In July 1986, the maximum benefit will be fully restored to two-thirds of the then-current average wage.

California—An employer who is ordered to reinstate a worker who was wrongfully fired no longer will profit from the fact that amounts received in unemployment compensation are deducted from back wages due. As have a number of other states, California now requires the employer to reimburse the unemployment fund for the amount paid out. Another law change specifies that a person will not be disqualified for having voluntarily left a job if the person chose to be laid off rather than exercise a right to bump an employee with less seniority. Similarly, there will be no disqualification of an employee who quits because of sexual harassment.

Kansas—Maximum benefits were frozen at $175 until July 1986 unless employers are assessed a surcharge to replenish the fund.

Iowa—No disqualification for refusal to bump a less senior worker to avoid a layoff.

Maryland — Maximum benefit raised from $165 to $175 but the most interesting development involved a work-sharing arrangement set up to avoid layoffs. Temporary legislation, to expire June 30, 1986, unless renewed, allows partial unemployment benefits to persons whose hours of work have been reduced as an alternative to layoffs. If the workers are represented by a union, the work-sharing plan must be one that has been negotiated or agreed to by the union.

Mississippi—Maximum benefit raised from $105 to $115.

Missouri—Benefit ceiling went up on Jan. 1, 1985, from $105 to $120. It will rise to $125 next year, to $130 in 1987 and $140 in 1988. Thereafter, it will go to $150 if the amount in the unemployment fund is at least $25 million.

New Jersey—The benefit computation formula was changed from two-thirds of the individual's wage up to 50 percent of the statewide average wage. It is now 60 percent of the lost wage, up to a maximum of 56⅔ percent of the state average. Dependency allowances are added to the benefits received but the total may not exceed the maximum benefit amount.

South Dakota — Maximum benefit is frozen at $129.

Virginia—Maximum raised from $138 to $150.

Washington — Benefit ceiling remains frozen at $185 until July 7, 1985. After that, a new law specifies, the maximum will be 60 percent of the average state wage providing the balance in the unemployment trust fund meets specified standards.

Wyoming — Benefits that exceed $90 may be reduced when funds are inadequate.

GOP in Idaho repeals law on prevailing pay

Boise, Idaho—Contractors are looking forward to paying lower wages and providing fewer benefits in the aftermath of the legislature's repeal of the state's prevailing wage law.

The repealer became law without the governor's signature when it became apparent that the Republican-dominated legislature would override a veto just as it did a week earlier on a "right-to-work" bill outlawing union shops.

An official of the state contractors association, Joe Kuebler, said that in developing new and lower wage scales for state-funded construction, "we'll have to find the magic number that the guys will go to work for."

Idaho Public Works Director Brian Chase said he anticipated a 20-percent cut in payrolls on state construction projects, but he expressed concern that quality will suffer if projects go to the low bidder as the law requires.

"I'm concerned about a guy who pays carpenters $4 an hour," Chase said in an interview with the Bureau of National Affairs.

The new legislation repeals the eight-hour-day limitation on straight-time work that had been a part of the prevailing wage law. But it leaves intact a provision in the state constitution that sets an eight-hour work day standard for the private sector. It also retains the provision of the prevailing wage law that limits the employment of out-of-town workers to not more than 10 percent of the workforce on state construction projects employing up to 50 workers and 5 percent on larger projects.

Meanwhile, the dispute over the effective date of the new "right-to-work" law is still in the state courts.

Ralph L. Helstein dies, former head of meat packers

Chicago—Ralph L. Helstein, who headed the former Packinghouse Workers and served two terms as an AFL-CIO vice president, died Feb. 14 at his home here. He was 76.

Helstein was a leading labor lawyer in his home state of Minnesota when he came to the Packinghouse Workers as general counsel in 1942. He was elected president four years later and his tenure was marked by contracts that broke down race, sex and geographical barriers. He was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1965.

With the shrinkage of the meatpacking industry, the Packinghouse Workers merged with the Meat Cutters in 1968. Helstein served as vice president and general counsel of the merged union, retiring in 1972 with the title of president-emeritus. A subsequent merger with the Retail Clerks created the present-day Food & Commercial Workers.

Survivors include his wife Rachel and two daughters. The family has asked that memorial contributions be sent to the Illinois Labor History Society, 28 E. Jackson, Chicago, Ill. 60604, for its Ralph Helstein Fund for education in labor history.

Air Line Pilots press Continental fight

Washington—The Air Line Pilots voted overwhelmingly to continue the union's strike against Continental Airlines and to maintain the special member assessment used to finance strike benefits and the ALPA's continuing court battles with Continental.

The decision to sustain the strike, now in its 16th month, was approved by an 80.2-percent vote. This was up from 74.5 percent in an earlier ballot last October. Members also voted by a 2-to-1 ratio to continue strike benefits for striking Continental pilots at $2,400 a month, about three times the usual benefit.

The ALPA's legal efforts against Continental include a $100 million lawsuit against the firm for unfair labor practices, defense against a similar countersuit by Continental, and a dispute over pension funds owed the striking pilots.

The special assessment will assure a financial base for a long-term effort against the carrier, the ALPA said.

Grieving

UNION MEMBERS don't need any preaching about the importance of an effective grievance procedure. They know it's the heart of contract enforcement.

But how about a grievance procedure without a union? As a recent decision by the 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals made clear, there's no such thing.

The case that reached the court was right out of the company-union era of American history. It involved the tactics used by the Lawson Co., a chain of convenience food stores, to thwart an organizing drive in Ohio by the Food & Commercial Workers.

Management's actions included such mailed-fist tactics as interrogating workers about their support for a union and threatening to close stores whose employees voted for union representation. But the company didn't stop there, as NLRB and federal court proceedings revealed.

If employees had any complaint, why management's door would be wide open. In fact, some long-standing complaints were suddenly quickly resolved through a new "Sales Assistant Committee" that was established.

TO FORM the committee, management brought together groups of hand-picked employees. They in turn would choose representatives to serve on a Sales Assistant Committee which every three months would meet with management to discuss employee complaints.

As the appellate court opinion noted:

"The committee held no meetings apart from its discussions with management, formed no coherent program or plan of action, and discussed only those subjects that Lawson's senior management determined were of greatest interest to the employees. . . . Discussion proceeded according to an agenda prepared by management. The sales assistants did not take minutes, and communications concerning the committee's work were written and circulated by management."

It was clearly obvious, the court held, that the committee was employer-dominated in violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

What is not obvious, however, is why it took nearly four years to enforce the law when the violation is so blatant. That's the time it took, shamefully, to move a simple case through the National Labor Relations Board and through the federal court enforcement process.

And don't bet your last dollar that management lawyers won't find a way to delay still furthering the slap-on-the-wrist "penalty" of promising not to continue violating the law.

Labor law reform, anyone?

Hatch Act Harassment

THE HATCH ACT was passed by Congress in 1939 to protect, not harass, federal employees.

The restrictions on political activity were designed to shield workers from the pressures of politically appointed superiors to contribute to campaigns or to put in after-hours work for the party in power.

Obviously, it is stretching the intent of the law beyond recognition to seek to apply it punitively to leaders of the largest government and postal employee unions who have been on unpaid leave from the jobs they held before being elected to full-time union office.

But it is at least as outrageous to keep on the books sections of the law that discourage several million Americans from full participation in the nation's political life because of their employment.

Congress recognized this in 1976 when it amended the law to remove barriers to employee rights while retaining protections against political pressure. President Ford's veto was clearly misguided.

Hatch Act amendment was needed then. It is needed just as much now.

New Deal era programs under attack by Reagan

By Press Associates, Inc.

This is the anniversary season for the G.I. Bill, Wagner Act and Social Security Act—New Deal era measures that profoundly changed American society and strengthened the fabric of democracy. Even so, they are under attack by the Reagan Administration.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt in June 1944 signed legislation with the innocuous title, "Servicemen's Readjustment Act." Roosevelt acted 16 days after the D-Day invasion of Europe. The tide of victory was under way, and the nation anticipated the return of some 16 million service personnel to civilian life.

The Veterans Administration marked the 40th anniversary of the G.I. Bill recently with justified bragging, saying it transformed adult education and spurred the greatest housing boom in the nation's history.

Since 1944, more than 18 million persons have received education and training with a public investment of $55 billion. Benefiting were 8 million World War II veterans, 2.4 million Korean War veterans, and 8 million post-Korean and Vietnam-era veterans and active-duty personnel.

About 45 percent of the G.I. Bill benefits were used to attend college. The remainder was used for technical, farm and other training.

Education benefits

In 1944, only a quarter of the U.S. population had graduated from high school. Starting with those born since the G.I. Bill, 90 percent of Americans have finished high school, and 25 percent have finished college.

More than $225 billion in VA-guaranteed home loans was provided to 11 million veterans since 1944, with more than half the loans repaid in full. Fewer than four out of 100 veteran home owners have defaulted, the VA reports.

The National Labor Relations Act of 1935 was enacted to bring some order into the industrial chaos of the time. Corporate leaders, including Henry Ford, thought nothing of hiring execons and goons to combat unionism. The Wagner Act protected the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively and created the National Labor Relations Board to administer the law.

The Wagner Act did not magically bring change. It took aggressive organizing to establish bargaining in the mining, steel, auto, rubber, electrical equipment and transportation industries, covering 40 percent of the workforce of the time.

Voice in workplace

The Wagner Act served two basic purposes. By promoting more equal bargaining power, it reduced the need for government regulation to protect workers from socially destructive wages and working conditions, while collective bargaining gave workers a voice in the workplace, thereby strengthening political democracy.

The Social Security Act of 1935 resulted mostly from the work of FDR's Committee on Economic Security. It established a national system of contributory old-age and survivors insurance and a federal-state unemployment insurance, the latter of which lacks national standards to this day. There were those who favored the inclusion of national health insurance, but the American Medical Association snuffed out that idea.

These and other achievements of the New Deal have stood the test of time. Now, social security and labor's rights are under assault by the ideologues of the Reagan Administration, backed by hardline elements of the business community.

The G.I. Bill enabled millions of veterans and their families to become part of the middle class, but this program runs out in 1989.

The so-called Reagan Revolution has brought back high unemployment and mass hunger and homelessness. The "magic of the marketplace" obviously cannot solve these problems.

Democrats in search of a purpose for their party would do well to examine its history, add their own ideas and try to complete the work begun a half-century ago. Full employment, national health insurance and decent housing are still worthy goals to pursue.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congress Begins Work on Several Fronts; Civil Rights, Hobbs Act, Imports Top List

Hearings to Broaden Anti-union Picket Sanctions

Traditionally, the anti-labor forces brandished the Hobbs Act in the Senate Judiciary Committee as a club with which to threaten labor. Now these factions are convening hearings in the Senate Labor committee to examine "union violence." The employer-financed National Right to Work Committee uses the hearings as sounding board to raise funds from employers.

Tentatively scheduled for Feb. 27, the hearings, titled "Union Violence: Is There A Remedy," are being convened by Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), Chairman of the Labor Committee, and represent a thinly disguised attempt to reimpose a strict application of the Hobbs Act.

At the same time, and not coincidently, legislation has been proposed in the Senate Judiciary Committee to amend the Hobbs Act and put the federal government into the business of policing strikes.

Under present law--as the result of a Supreme Court decision--the policing of strikes is a matter for state and local authorities only.

The proposed legislation, if enacted, would bring strikes under federal criminal penalties. Strikers engaged in a legitimate labor dispute could be subjected to federal prosecution with penalties of up to $250,000 in fines and 12 years in prison. No other dispute would be shifted from state and local law to Federal jurisdiction.

As in the past, the AFL-CIO regards the proposal as a union-busting tactic that could block the right of workers to demonstrate in defense of their jobs.

Legislators to Seek Extension of Auto Import Restrictions

Senator John Danforth (R-MO) will introduce a resolution in the Senate and Rep. John Dingell (D-MI) will submit a bill in the House, to extend the voluntary restrictions now imposed on Japanese auto makers for new cars imported to the United States. The restrictions were agreed to by the Japanese four years ago in fear that Congress might pass legislation mandating quotas. They are due to expire on March 31.

Concern over further loss of manufacturing jobs in this country from growing imports, sentiment is growing in Congress to keep the present restrictions intact.

Renewed Fight to Restore Civil Rights Law's Intent

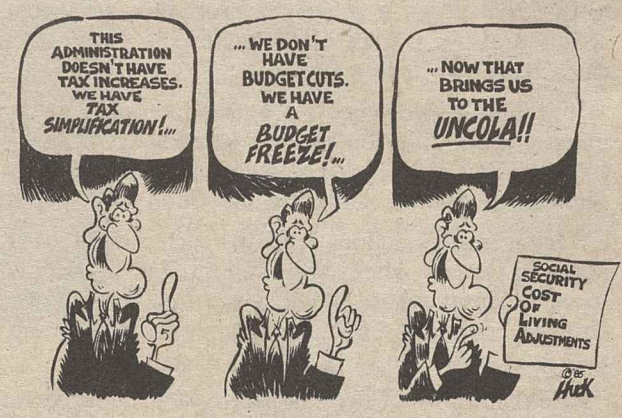
Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA) will carry out a series of regional hearings in behalf of his bill to restore the once-sanctified rule that federally funded organizations shall not discriminate. The hearings begin March 1 in Philadelphia.

Originally a cornerstone of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the standard was severely weakened by a recent narrow Supreme Court interpretation known as the Grove City case. Here the high court ruled that a federal grant recipient, Grove City College, needed to ensure nondiscrim-ination only in the single program which actually received the federal funds. In this case, it involved the college's admissions office because the federal funds were in the form of subsidies for student loans. This ruling threatened to legitimize discrimination that might occur in any other department of the college, and cast a cloud over subsequent civil rights legislation.

Clearly, this was not the intent of Congress when it passed the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964. The new bill, H.R. 700, would reaffirm the broad coverage of civil rights protections and add education, rehabilitation, and age discrimination provisions.

The bill currently has 61 cosponsors in the House and a similar bill is expected to be introduced shortly in the Senate.

Hearings Open on Extended Unemployment Benefits



The Federal Supplemental Compensation program expires on March 31, 1985, and the Democratic-controlled House is moving forward on proposed legislation (H.R. 890) to continue extended benefits for unemployed workers and their families.

The Subcommittee on Unemployment Compensation of the House Ways and Means Committee will begin a series of hearings on Feb. 20, 1985, with representatives of the AFL-CIO testifying on Feb. 26.

Because the Reagan Administration's budget contains no provision to extend supplemental benefits for unemployed workers, passage of H.R. 890 is a must and would extend the present FSC program for 18 months.

Although the AFL-CIO supports even stronger legislative measures to shore up worker compensation benefits, we regard the passage of H.R. 890 to be the most basic safeguard for the protection of workers and their families.

Under the current Federal Supplemental Compensation program, and proposed extension, workers who have exhausted their state benefits are eligible for 14, 12, 10 or 8 weeks of additional benefits depending on the state's insured unemployment rate.

Reagan Backtracking On Soc. Sec. Promise

President Reagan appears ready to break another campaign promise--this time to take away from retirees the modest cost-of-living adjustments promised them as part of the 1983 bipartisan Social Security compromise.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a member of the 1983 National Commission on Social Security, attacked the cruelty of the President's new budget trimming proposal and pointed out that Social Security does not contribute to the nation's deficit problems. "The Social Security cash programs are self-contained, and more than pay their own way," he said.

"Social Security beneficiaries gave up the full COLA in 1983, and that sacrifice continues to cost them some benefits in the current fiscal year, in the next fiscal year, and into the future. Social Security didn't cause the deficit--does not make the deficit worse--and won't."

The real core of the nation's deficit problems, he said lay with "the massive tax cut and the Administration's unwillingness to face the costs of the military budget." These, he said, "should be addressed in seeking to tame the deficit."

Benefits Tax

A Fact Sheet providing information on the taxation of fringe benefits is available from the Dept. of Legislation, AFL-CIO.

Legislative Action Committee Members Played Key Role in Bankruptcy Victory

Members of AFL-CIO Legislative Action Committees, located in strategic regions of the country, played a critical role in winning passage of important bankruptcy legislation in the 98th Congress. A recent post-campaign review reveals that without their endeavors, the full-fleged effort mounted across the country might not have been successful.

While significant numbers of rank and file workers responded to the direct mail appeal sent out by the Federation last year, it was the core group of activists--those who attend Legislative Action Committee meetings and read this newsletter--who responded rapidly and consistently with letters to their congressmen and senators.

The AFL-CIO review showed that LAC activists responded more quickly and in numbers six times the average response. The result was that legislators received a far heavier outpouring of mail supporting legislation to save union contracts.

AFL-CIO lobbyists maintain they never could have had the strong back-home reinforcement within the short time frames required by some of the mailings without the efforts of this core group of dedicated activists.

Policy stands put focus on unemployed

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO issued a comprehensive set of programs to deal with the nation's economic and social needs and called on the federal government to meet its special responsibility to take the leading role.

The federation's Executive Council, at its winter meeting here, issued separate statements detailing proposals for reducing the foreign trade deficit and policies for reducing the federal budget deficit while carrying out the twin responsibilities of "providing for the common defense and promoting the general welfare."

But while the nation focuses on the budget and trade deficits, "the deficit in job opportunities poses an equal threat," the council declared. It pointed out that 8.5 million Americans are officially unemployed and 7 million more "are either too discouraged to seek jobs or can find only part-time jobs."

Unacceptable levels

The council said reduction of these unacceptable levels of joblessness must be the central focus of U.S. fiscal, monetary, trade, employment and training policies.

Most of the opening session of the council meeting was devoted to a reunion with former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, the Democratic candidate whom the AFL-CIO supported in last year's presidential election.

Mondale thanked the federation—and the council members specifically—for supporting him during the primary and general election campaigns and throughout his public life. He discussed the importance of the 1986 congressional elections, and he urged labor to recognize its strength and not retreat from full participation in the presidential nomination process in 1988.

Later, at a news conference, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland recalled that the federation had supported Mondale "because we agreed with what he stood for, and we knew that he was a man who wouldn't run away from those things just because it wasn't politically profitable."

Other visitors during the early sessions of the council meeting included Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and James Shuart, president of Hofstra University and a member of the board of the American Council on Education. Packwood discussed the concern that he and the federation both have at proposals to tax workers' life-support benefits. Shuart described the agenda for a recently formed Labor/Higher Education Council, a coop-

High court repairs gap in wage law

By David L. Perlman

The Supreme Court restored federal wage-hour protections to millions of state and local government employees Congress had sought to bring under the Fair Employment Standards Act.

Its 5-4 decision scrapped—as union attorneys had urged—an earlier Supreme Court ruling in what has become known as the National League of Cities case.

That 1976 decision, also by a 5-4 majority, adopted a states' rights interpretation that Congress lacked authority to set minimum wage and overtime standards for public-sector workers who were employed in "traditional government functions."

An overtime pay claim under the wage-hour law, which the Amalgamated Transit Union pressed on behalf of San Antonio bus drivers, brought the issue back before the Supreme Court. And a switch in position by Justice Harry A. Blackmun led to the reversal.

Blackmun had gone along with the League of Cities verdict, but had expressed some misgivings in a separate opinion. Now, writing for the new majority, he concluded that the distinction the court had sought to make between different categories of public employment had proved "unsound in principle and unworkable in practice."

Constitutional backing

There is no reason for state governments to be immunized from the constitutional authority of Congress to regulate commerce, the court's present majority held. Federalism is built into the constitutional framework of government, the opinion noted, through such provisions as equal representation of states in the Senate and the electoral vote system of choosing the President.

Joining Blackmun to make up the majority were the four dissenters from the League of Cities decision—Justices William J. Brennan, Jr., Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall and John Paul Stevens.

The minority included three members of the 1976 majority—Chief Justice War-

Domestic cuts break consensus on defense

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"If vital domestic programs are to be cut or frozen, defense spending must also be frozen," the Executive Council declared.

Its strongly worded statement on the budget deficit rejected Administration proposals to scuttle domestic programs so as to increase military spending without raising taxes.

The council listed a range of program cutbacks and abandonments sought by the Administration which labor considers "contrary to the national interest." It reiterated the AFL-CIO's continuing commitment to a strong national defense. But it stressed the trade union movement's equal commitment "to a strong economy and social justice at home."

The goals are not contradictory except in the President's approach to the budget and the federal deficit, the council made clear. It noted that the AFL-CIO's response to earlier Reagan proposals for increased defense spending was that needed expansion should be financed through a special surtax on both corporate and individual income.

Instead, the council noted, the Administration has pushed to offset higher defense spending by cutting back social programs. Rather than raise taxes to meet military needs, it has insisted "on cutting taxes, especially for the wealthy, thereby shifting a greater burden for defense on working Americans."

That approach by the Reagan Administration has undermined the national consensus for increased defense spending, the statement noted.

At a news conference, Federation President Lane Kirkland amplified the point in response to questions from reporters.

There is no question, he said, that the nation needs "a level of defense commensurate with the dangers that the country faces." But "a very good test" of the dimensions of the military need "is a willingness to pay for it."

Major trade law revisions sought

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Major revisions of U.S. trade laws and policies to bring them into line with "today's trade realities" were urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

"America's trade problems have reached crisis proportions," the council declared in a statement, citing the nation's 1984 trade deficit of $123 billion overall and $89 billion in manufactured goods alone.

"These mind-numbing dollar losses have already resulted in the loss of over three million jobs, primarily in manufacturing industries, and have caused serious damage to America's industrial base with prospects of more to come unless effective counteraction is taken soon," the council declared.

It noted that the trade crisis is affecting the entire industrial spectrum, "high tech and low tech," and stressed that the "academic abstractions of free trade and natural comparative advantage" have no bearing on the real world of international trade in the 1980s.

Overvaluation factor

The council stressed that complete solutions will require effective national industrial and economic policies, including better fiscal policies and lower interest and dollar exchange rates. The present overvaluation of the dollar contributes significantly to the trade problem by raising the price of exports and lowering the cost of imports.

"U.S. trade law must be modernized to reflect contemporary realities in a world where the United States is the only country which exposes its industrial foundation to unlimited erosion from imports," the statement said.

"We emphasize that conserving American jobs and conserving American industries are political decisions for which members of Congress must be accountable, and the Administration must be held fully responsible."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congress Begins Work on Several Fronts; Civil Rights, Hobbs Act, Imports Top List

Hearings to Broaden Anti-union Picket Sanctions

Traditionally, the anti-labor forces brandished the Hobbs Act in the Senate Judiciary Committee as a club with which to threaten labor. Now these factions are convening hearings in the Senate Labor committee to examine "union violence." The employer-financed National Right to Work Committee uses the hearings as sounding board to raise funds from employers.

Tentatively scheduled for Feb. 27, the hearings, titled "Union Violence: Is There A Remedy," are being convened by Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), Chairman of the Labor Committee, and represent a thinly disguised attempt to reimpose a strict application of the Hobbs Act.

At the same time, and not coincidently, legislation has been proposed in the Senate Judiciary Committee to amend the Hobbs Act and put the federal government into the business of policing strikes.

Under present law--as the result of a Supreme Court decision--the policing of strikes is a matter for state and local authorities only.

The proposed legislation, if enacted, would bring strikes under federal criminal penalties. Strikers engaged in a legitimate labor dispute could be subjected to federal prosecution with penalties of up to $250,000 in fines and 12 years in prison. No other dispute would be shifted from state and local law to Federal jurisdiction.

As in the past, the AFL-CIO regards the proposal as a union-busting tactic that could block the right of workers to demonstrate in defense of their jobs.

Legislators to Seek Extension of Auto Import Restrictions

Senator John Danforth (R-MO) will introduce a resolution in the Senate and Rep. John Dingell (D-MI) will submit a bill in the House, to extend the voluntary restrictions now imposed on Japanese auto makers for new cars imported to the United States. The restrictions were agreed to by the Japanese four years ago in fear that Congress might pass legislation mandating quotas. They are due to expire on March 31.

Concern over further loss of manufacturing jobs in this country from growing imports, sentiment is growing in Congress to keep the present restrictions intact.

Renewed Fight to Restore Civil Rights Law's Intent

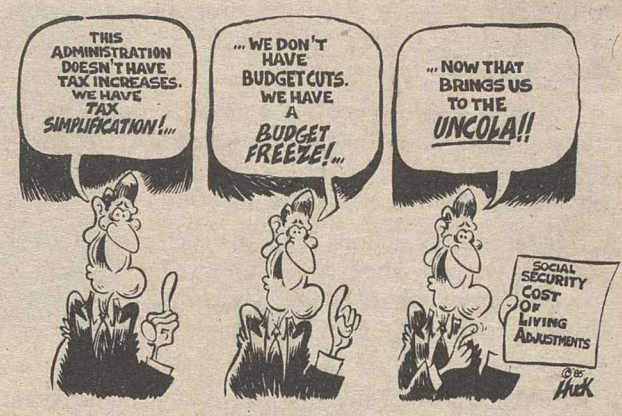
Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA) will carry out a series of regional hearings in behalf of his bill to restore the once-sanctified rule that federally funded organizations shall not discriminate. The hearings begin March 1 in Philadelphia.

Originally a cornerstone of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the standard was severely weakened by a recent narrow Supreme Court interpretation known as the Grove City case. Here the high court ruled that a federal grant recipient, Grove City College, needed to ensure nondiscrim-ination only in the single program which actually received the federal funds. In this case, it involved the college's admissions office because the federal funds were in the form of subsidies for student loans. This ruling threatened to legitimize discrimination that might occur in any other department of the college, and cast a cloud over subsequent civil rights legislation.

Clearly, this was not the intent of Congress when it passed the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964. The new bill, H.R. 700, would reaffirm the broad coverage of civil rights protections and add education, rehabilitation, and age discrimination provisions.

The bill currently has 61 cosponsors in the House and a similar bill is expected to be introduced shortly in the Senate.

Hearings Open on Extended Unemployment Benefits



The Federal Supplemental Compensation program expires on March 31, 1985, and the Democratic-controlled House is moving forward on proposed legislation (H.R. 890) to continue extended benefits for unemployed workers and their families.

The Subcommittee on Unemployment Compensation of the House Ways and Means Committee will begin a series of hearings on Feb. 20, 1985, with representatives of the AFL-CIO testifying on Feb. 26.

Because the Reagan Administration's budget contains no provision to extend supplemental benefits for unemployed workers, passage of H.R. 890 is a must and would extend the present FSC program for 18 months.

Although the AFL-CIO supports even stronger legislative measures to shore up worker compensation benefits, we regard the passage of H.R. 890 to be the most basic safeguard for the protection of workers and their families.

Under the current Federal Supplemental Compensation program, and proposed extension, workers who have exhausted their state benefits are eligible for 14, 12, 10 or 8 weeks of additional benefits depending on the state's insured unemployment rate.

Reagan Backtracking On Soc. Sec. Promise

President Reagan appears ready to break another campaign promise--this time to take away from retirees the modest cost-of-living adjustments promised them as part of the 1983 bipartisan Social Security compromise.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a member of the 1983 National Commission on Social Security, attacked the cruelty of the President's new budget trimming proposal and pointed out that Social Security does not contribute to the nation's deficit problems. "The Social Security cash programs are self-contained, and more than pay their own way," he said.

"Social Security beneficiaries gave up the full COLA in 1983, and that sacrifice continues to cost them some benefits in the current fiscal year, in the next fiscal year, and into the future. Social Security didn't cause the deficit--does not make the deficit worse--and won't."

The real core of the nation's deficit problems, he said lay with "the massive tax cut and the Administration's unwillingness to face the costs of the military budget." These, he said, "should be addressed in seeking to tame the deficit."

Legislative Action Committee Members Played Key Role in Bankruptcy Victory

Members of AFL-CIO Legislative Action Committees, located in strategic regions of the country, played a critical role in winning passage of important bankruptcy legislation in the 98th Congress. A recent post-campaign review reveals that without their endeavors, the full-fleged effort mounted across the country might not have been successful.

While significant numbers of rank and file workers responded to the direct mail appeal sent out by the Federation last year, it was the core group of activists--those who attend Legislative Action Committee meetings and read this newsletter--who responded rapidly and consistently with letters to their congressmen and senators.

The AFL-CIO review showed that LAC activists responded more quickly and in numbers six times the average response. The result was that legislators received a far heavier outpouring of mail supporting legislation to save union contracts.

AFL-CIO lobbyists maintain they never could have had the strong back-home reinforcement within the short time frames required by some of the mailings without the efforts of this core group of dedicated activists.

It noted that the trade crisis is affecting the entire industrial spectrum, "high tech and low tech," and stressed that the "academic abstractions of free trade and natural comparative advantage" have no bearing on the real world of international trade in the 1980s.

Overvaluation factor

The council stressed that complete solutions will require effective national industrial and economic policies, including better fiscal policies and lower interest and dollar exchange rates. The present overvaluation of the dollar contributes significantly to the trade problem by raising the price of exports and lowering the cost of imports.

"U.S. trade law must be modernized to reflect contemporary realities in a world where the United States is the only country which exposes its industrial foundation to unlimited erosion from imports," the statement said.

"We emphasize that conserving American jobs and conserving American industries are political decisions for which members of Congress must be accountable, and the Administration must be held fully responsible."

Executive Council focuses on pressing international issues at its winter session in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Labor outraged at sheltering of Nazi war criminal

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO called on the U.S. government to work relentlessly through national and international channels to bring Nazi war criminal Dr. Josef Mengele to justice.

The Executive Council called it an "unspeakable outrage" that 40 years after the liberation of Auschwitz, Mengele remains free, and reportedly under the protection of Paraguayan dictator Alfredo Stroessner.

Mengele, the notorious "Angel of Death," sent hundreds of thousands of Jews to the gas chambers during the Holocaust.

His continued freedom "brings shame and dishonor" on the free world, an international tribunal convened in Jerusalem declared. The council noted that this conclusion was resolved after hearing testimony of Auschwitz survivors about his grotesque death-camp experiments on Jewish twins in search of a genetic key to building Hitler's "master race."

The council said it welcomed a Justice Dept. announcement that it plans to investigate the report uncovered in recently declassified documents indicating that U.S. occupation troops in Austria may have arrested Mengele and then inexplicably freed him.

Time for peaceful change dwindles in South Africa

Bal Harbour, Fla.—South Africa's policy of apartheid cannot be maintained indefinitely, the Executive Council warned.

"The real issue is whether it will be abolished peacefully or violently. The longer South Africa resists peaceful change, the more it invites the bloody alternative," a council statement declared.

It said the AFL-CIO is committed to cooperate with the movement in South Africa that seeks an end to apartheid through peaceful, democratic means. The federation will look to those inside South Africa, fighting on the front lines, for leadership.

Democracy's cornerstone

"We have been especially encouraged by the emergence in recent years of the black trade union movement in South Africa. Freedom of association is the foundation of democratic institution-building, and offers the most promising hope for peaceful social change," the council observed.

"The AFL-CIO will, therefore, continue to respond to requests for assistance through its Program of Action in Support of Black Trade Unions in South Africa and through the ongoing programs of the African-American Labor Center."

The council said that AFL-CIO assistance will be guided by the same principle that has governed the federation's aid to workers of Poland, El Salvador, and every other country where its help has been sought—"namely, that we will respond to the expressed needs and wishes of our brothers and sisters who are under the gun."

Its pledge of support came on the heels of another police crackdown on black leaders opposing apartheid. They included Samuel Kikine and Isaac Ngcobo of the South African Allied Workers' Union, who were arrested and charged with treason along with four others.

The council called on other free world labor movements, especially those in the industrialized nations that trade with South Africa, to urge their governments to press for an end to "preventive detention" laws that are used to harass, intimidate, and imprison labor leaders and others without trial.

"These laws, in effect, nullify much of whatever benefit accrued from previous legislation recognizing the trade union rights of black workers," the council said.

Inquiry sought

It also asked the International Labor Organization to investigate the appalling conditions of black workers in South Africa, including the forced removal of black workers to "homeland" provinces. Toward this end, the ILO should consider setting up a commission of inquiry similar to the commissions it established in the cases of human rights violations in Chile, Poland and other countries, the council urged.

Meanwhile, the AFL-CIO will continue to cooperate with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in a multilateral assistance program to South African black trade unions, and to participate in union-to-union programs conducted by international trade secretariats.

In criticizing the Reagan Administration's "constructive engagement" policy as ineffective, the council suggested that the ILO monitor the conduct of all corporations operating in South Africa to see how they observe universal labor standards and whether they respect black trade union rights.

Companies that fail in their social responsibilities should be targeted for disinvestment, boycotts, adverse publicity campaigns, and other appropriate measures, the council said.

"In considering whether and when to apply such measures, the AFL-CIO will be guided by the wishes of the black trade union movement of South Africa," the council added.

Job equality test supported for Northern Ireland firms

Bal Harbour, Fla.—U.S. corporations operating in Northern Ireland should adopt and adhere to a set of guidelines that promote equal opportunity in the workplace, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It further urged that major institutional investors, and pension and welfare fund trustees make sure that the companies in which they invest adhere to the "MacBride Principles."

The guidelines were devised by international human rights advocate Sean MacBride of Dublin to address the serious problems of employment discrimination in Northern Ireland. He is the founder and first chairman of Amnesty International and a 1974 recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize.

The principles call on employers in Northern Ireland to:

- Hire more individuals from under-represented religious groups in all areas of the workforce.
- Insure adequate security for minority workers both at work and while traveling to and from work.
- Ban provocative religious or political emblems from the workplace.
- Publicly announce job openings and encourage recruitment of applicants from under-represented religious groups.
- Abolish job reservations, apprenticeship restrictions and differential job criteria that discriminate on the basis of religion or ethnic origin.
- Develop training to prepare substantial numbers of current minority employees for skilled jobs.

An AFL-CIO delegation that visited Northern Ireland reported to the executive council, that until the problems of employment discrimination and all other forms of discrimination currently practiced in the territory "are forcefully and forthrightly addressed, there can be little hope for a reduction in the level of violence or for the development of attitudes which will bring about a more stable society."

The council statement noted that the MacBride Principles are consistent with the positions taken by the AFL-CIO to promote equal opportunity in the workplace, and are similar in aim to the Sullivan Principles which American corporations have been asked to accept in South Africa.

Edward J. Leonard dies, past Plasterers leader

Bethesda, Md. — Edward J. Leonard, president emeritus of the Plasterers & Cement Masons, died after a heart attack Feb. 15. He was 80.

Leonard joined the Plasterers & Cement Masons in 1923, and in 1932 became business agent for Local 31 in Pittsburgh, where he served for six years. He was appointed to the union's executive board in 1951 and was elected first vice president three years later. Leonard was elected president in 1958 and headed the union until retiring in 1970 as president emeritus.

He also was a member of the Pittsburgh city council from 1938 to 1951.

Trade crisis brings call to update laws

The council said the overhaul of U.S. trade law must include:

- Stronger measures to counter and remedy the effects of unfair trade practices by other countries, such as dumping, subsidies and disruptive imports.
- Effective relief from the export-oriented industrial targeting practiced by foreign governments to the detriment of basic American industries.
- Easing of standards for import relief of American industries and workers damaged by imports, specifically recognizing plant closings and layoffs as signs of serious injury qualifying for relief.

The council's statement also called for specific legislative and policy actions to deal with the trade-related problems of individual industries, such as autos, steel, copper, maritime, textiles, shoes, telecommunications, electronics and printing.

Prodding needed

On the auto industry, for example, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed labor's support for extension on a multi-year basis of the voluntary restraint agreement (VRA) on Japanese auto imports. Kirkland told reporters at a news conference during his recent trip to Japan where he talked to a wide range of officials, including the Prime Minister, he developed "a strong feeling that the problem is not on the Japanese side. I do believe they would be more than willing to do that if we pressed for it. I think the problem is on the side of our own negotiators."

Later that day, President Reagan's Cabinet Council on Commerce & Trade recommended that he not press for extension of the VRA with Japan.

On the other trade issues, the council urged policies to assure the processing in this country of a significant portion of raw materials destined for export.

It called also for renewal and restoration of funds for the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act, which will expire next September, in order to assure help for workers displaced from their jobs by imports.

Promotion of American exports should be continued as an important function of trade policy, the statement stressed, but Export-Import Bank funds should not be used to finance projects in other countries in industries where excess capacity already exists. Also, controls on the transfer of American technology must be maintained to assure continued technological progress, national security and competitive advantage for American industry.

Fighting apartheid

The council called on Congress to enact restrictions on U.S. trade and investment with South Africa as an effective way to pressure that country to end its policy of apartheid.

It urged policies to regulate the immense flows of international investment, including better enforcement of codes of conduct for multinational enterprises to protect the rights of their workers. It also called on the Administration to abandon its emphasis on overseas investment by American business. Emphasis should be on the interests of the American economy and American workers, the council said.

"The United States must not negotiate away domestic employment for business access to foreign markets," the council declared.

ILA restructures funds for fringe benefit plans

New York—The Longshoremen, the New York Shipping Association, and the Port Authority of New York & New Jersey reached agreement on a plan to restructure the funding of fringe benefits.

The agreement does not change the amount or coverage of benefits longshoremen receive. It simply distributes the $214 million levy for the benefits among a wider variety of shipping firms.

The agreement, which will go to the Federal Maritime Commission for approval on Feb. 27, essentially transfers about one-third of the costs of providing the benefits from vessels carrying long-distance freight into and out of the New York harbor to vessels carrying empty containers.

Formerly, no assessment was made for empty containers while loaded ships operating out of New York paid a fee that was approximately five times the national average. The new fee will be about $160 per container, down from $250.

Council tackles nagging jobs deficit

Federal government's role termed essential to success

erative effort between the ACE and the AFL-CIO in which Federation Vice President Sol C. Chaikin has played a leading role.

Council members also conferred with Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole (R-Kan.) prior to the opening of the week-long meeting.

The council issued a strong condemnation of the Reagan Administration's misuse of the Hatch Act to attempt to silence leaders of federal employee unions. Other statements included memorial tributes to former AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Al F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Ralph Helstein of the Food & Commercial Workers who died recently.

On international affairs, the council adopted statements outlining labor's role in fighting South Africa's apartheid policy, condemning the Polish government for continuing repression of workers and the Solidarity union movement, supporting renewed efforts to bring the Nazi war criminal Joseph Mengele to justice, and endorsing the "MacBride principles" for combating employment discrimination in Northern Ireland.

Staff reports

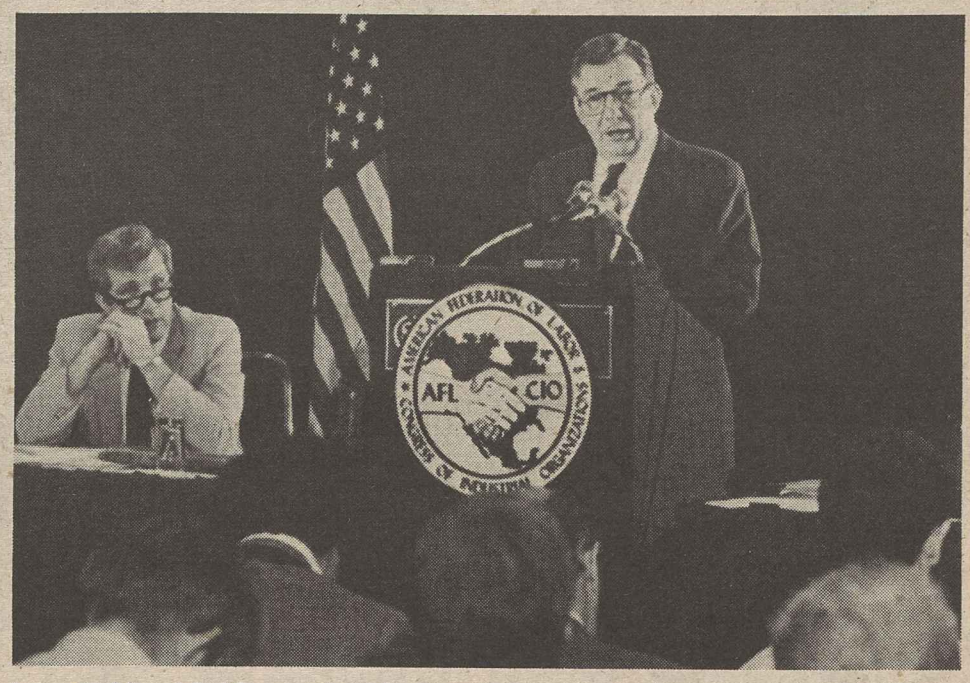
The council also received reports from Legislative Director Ray Denison, Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald and International Affairs Director Irving Brown.

The council's statement on the "jobs deficit" was accompanied by a background paper detailing the pattern of unemployment in the post-World War II years and its increasingly harsh impact on jobless workers. The specific recommendations set forth in the statement include:

- A permanent program of supplemental unemployment benefits providing up to 65 weeks of aid to the long-term jobless, with interim extension of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program due to expire in March.
- A special program to provide jobless workers with health care protection, and mortgage and rent relief.
- Legislation to deal with the impact of plant closings on workers and communities.
- More and better education, training, retraining and upward-mobility programs for all workers, employed and unemployed.
- Improved job opportunities for all workers through enforcement of anti-discrimination laws, child care programs, sanctions against the hiring of undocumented workers, and strengthening of wage-hour laws.
- Shared efforts by federal, state and local governments to rebuild crumbling roads and highways, bridges, water and sewerage systems and other public facilities.
- Adoption of an effective industrial policy with labor and industry participation.
- Effective measures to contain and control health care costs.
- Congressional action to block the Reagan Administration's continuing efforts on behalf of big business to dismantle or weaken federal laws, agencies and regulations designed to benefit consumers, workers, the general public and the environment.
- Special farm credits to help farmers in their current crisis and longer-term programs to prevent the destruction of the family farm.
- Steps by the Federal Reserve Board to lower interest rates so as to encourage economic growth.

Calling for action on this wide range of concerns, the council pledged the AFL-CIO's "continuing support for policies and programs that will improve the health and diversity of the American economy and assure job opportunities and a rising standard of living for all Americans."



Labor's early participation in the 1984 election process drew a number of questions at Kirkland's opening-day news conference. Asked if the federation would take the same approach in the 1988 campaign, Kirkland pointed out that "the timing is dictated by the deadlines for the filing of delegate slates," which in the last election were as early as December 1983 for such key states as Illinois. If labor had allowed that deadline to pass and waited until, say, March 1984, it would have "missed the opportunity to participate in a very large number of states."

Critical factor

Kirkland reported that in meeting with the council, Mondale reiterated his belief that a presidential candidate to succeed must gain some mastery over television and "acknowledged his own failings in grappling with the television medium."

But while labor likes winning, it would not have considered endorsing a more engaging TV personality, because "winning isn't really everything," Kirkland observed.

"It's more important to stand for something. If you don't stand for something, what do you win? I'm not interested in a candidate who's charming and appealing but is empty of principles or of positions that, in our view, reflect the hopes and aspirations of working people for a decent opportunity and for justice in this country."

Lane Kirkland fields questions from reporters.

Asked to evaluate Reagan's second term so far, Kirkland said the Administration has renewed the challenge of the first term on the central issue of the times—the appropriate role of the federal government in a modern society.

"It is quite clear," Kirkland said, "that this Administration believes that role should be confined pretty much to the raising of armies and to the coddling of commercial enterprise.

"Beyond that, it wants to dismantle the role of the federal government in our life. And it has created a remarkably efficient mechanism for doing that, through a combination of the deficit, their hard line against tax increases, and their insistence that one sector of public spending remain inviolate, and that's the defense budget. . . .

"Unless the debate is joined as to what are the important, beneficent functions of the federal government in a modern society, it will be allowed to continue unchecked."

As for the state of the labor movement today, Kirkland described it as "vigorous, in a fighting frame of mind, strongly committed to its principles, and to the objectives and goals that we've fought for, determined to carry on and to do our level best to advance those goals and objectives."

Domestic cutbacks shatter support for rise in defense

Traditionally, Kirkland said, the AFL-CIO has felt obligated to take serious account of the judgment of responsible government officials on defense needs. But this Administration has "flunked the test" of demonstrating a need for the higher military spending it seeks by its approach to paying for the cost. It would put the burden "on the backs of future generations" or "onto the backs of the least privileged in our society."

And in response to a question about jobs that might be provided through a bigger military budget, Kirkland termed it "insulting to suggest that we make a judgment on defense spending as though it were a public works project. . . . The only excuse for spending money on weapons and tanks and planes is the security of the country."

Burden to all

The council's budget statement noted that the revenue lost comes close to matching the projected federal deficit and that continued high unemployment "is a burden to the budget, as well as to the victims."

Its statement noted the AFL-CIO's strong opposition to Administration budget proposals for:

- Cutbacks in federal employment and training programs.
- Elimination of unemployment insurance for the long-term jobless.
- Deep cuts in federal aid to education, "especially the college tuition loans on which so many families rely."
- Elimination of revenue sharing, the Economic Development Administration and Amtrak, along with cutbacks in community, housing and mass transit programs.
- Cuts in Medicare, Medicaid and child nutrition programs.
- Pension and pay cuts for federal workers.
- Cuts in veterans programs and farm programs needed for the survival of family farms.

The council reiterated its opposition to many of the features of the Treasury's tax simplification package but endorsed the need for tax reforms.

It expressed a belief that to achieve its target of a $50-billion reduction in the budget deficit, "Congress will sooner or later be forced to face the necessity of recapturing lost federal revenues."

That should be done, the council urged, through an "equitable tax code in which all elements of society, especially corporations and the wealthy, bear an appropriate share of the cost of government."

Unions swap pay for stock at Phillips

Some 3,000 union members employed by Phillips Petroleum Co. agreed to trade off wage hikes due them this month for company stock as part of a recapitalization plan the company is undergoing.

Under the plan, Phillips would distribute about 32 million shares to both union and non-union workers, who would own about 30 percent of the firm.

Of the company's 22,000 domestic employees, about 3,400 are represented by unions. Some 3,000 of these were scheduled for a wage increase of 35 cents an hour under an oil pattern agreement negotiated last year.

Several unions represent the Phillips employees. The largest units are the Operating Engineers, representing 1,100 workers at Borger, Tex., and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers representing 500 in Pasadena, Tex. Smaller units are in Texas, Oklahoma, Utah, Arkansas and Kansas.

Non-union employees already have been subjected to a pay freeze.

Public Employee Dept. expands to bring in state-local membership

Bal Harbour, Fla. — A special constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. took steps to strengthen the department by restructuring it to embrace two equal and autonomous divisions.

The Feb. 16 convention also saw the official return of the State, County & Municipal Employees as a department affiliate, bringing the PED's combined membership to some three million federal, postal, state and local workers.

Under the constitutional changes adopted unanimously by the 120 delegates, one of the new divisions represents state and local government employees and the other federal and postal employees.

John Leyden, former overall PED director, was named executive director of the new Federal/Postal Division, and Al Bilik, formerly deputy executive director of AFSCME District 37 in New York, was chosen executive director of the State/Local Division.

Leyden has been with the department since 1981 and before that was president of the Air Traffic Controllers, an office he held for some 10 years. Bilik was organizing director of the Electronics Workers before taking the AFSCME District 37 post. He had previously spent 25 years in a variety of AFSCME staff positions. Earlier, he served as president of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO for six years.

Delegates also elected two additional PED officers: AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee and Laborers President Angelo Fosco. They will serve as executive vice presidents, an office also held by Service Employees President John Sweeney and Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto. President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees continues to serve as department president and President Albert Shanker of the Teachers as secretary-treasurer.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who was the keynote speaker for the convention, congratulated delegates on the successful completion of the reorganization. He stressed that a strengthened PED will be better able to fight four more years of attempts by the Reagan Administration to weaken government programs and services, as well as government employee unions at all levels.

Will stand fast

Kirkland pledged that labor "will not abandon its principles, policies and programs" in the face of Reagan's attacks.

At a pre-convention meeting, the PED executive board denounced the Administration's attempt to use the Hatch Act to harass federal and postal union presidents, terming the move an assault on free speech. It called on all of organized labor to resist such intimidation tactics.

Among speakers at the board meeting were Rep. William H. Gray (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Budget Committee, and Rep. William Ford (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

Seafarers gain towboat pact ending bitter 2-year dispute

New Orleans—A two-year strike that reached from the Louisiana docks to Wall Street's monied chambers has ended in victory for the Seafarers with the signing of a three-year agreement with Dixie Carriers.

The settlement provides for improvements in wages and working conditions for the 400 employees of the Houston-based towboat company. More important, it turned back what SIU President Frank Drozak called a deliberate attempt to split the membership and break the union.

Among several issues still to be resolved is the status of 80 captains, mates and pilots—licensed boatmen that the company contends are not protected by the National Labor Relations Act.

The company had recognized the right of the SIU to represent these workers for more than 40 years. But that position changed after the firm was taken over by Kirby Exploration, a conglomerate with few ties to the maritime industry.

The issue of the licensed boatmen is being pursued in the courts, and Drozak said the union "will show the same perseverance in protecting the rights of these workers as it did in protecting the rights of our unlicensed boatmen."

The strike was called two years ago when the new management maintained its hardline stance despite SIU's offer of a number of concessions that would have helped the firm achieve cost reductions.

In the course of the strike, the SIU brought picket lines to the American Stock Exchange in New York to publicize the company's cavalier treatment of its workers and to alert potential investors that profits were down during the dispute. This evoked memories of the SIU's early years when crowds of white-capped Seafarers supported their fellow workers during the Wall Street strike of the 1940s.

"I'm proud of the job that our guys in the Gulf did in getting this thing resolved," Drozak said.

"Our members supported the strike in every way they could," SIU Vice President Joe Sacco observed. "They did this by walking the picket lines and by getting support from other union members up and down the rivers and harbors."

The contract, which is retroactive to last Dec. 10, was negotiated by Sacco, New Orleans Port Agent Pat Pillsworth and SIU Gen. Counsel Louis Robein.

AP Parts accord terminates strike by Auto Workers

Toledo, Ohio—The Auto Workers ratified a new three-year contract covering some 350 members employed by AP Parts here, ending a nine-month strike that had solid support from the American labor movement.

The company, which manufactures automobile tail pipes and mufflers, had sought deep wage reductions and other takeaways, most of which were resisted by union negotiators.

The pact, approved by a vote of 254 to 71, provides for an average hourly pay of $10.25. Workers had been earning an average of about $12. The contract will restore $1.70 in base rates and cost-of-living adjustments over the life of the agreement.

Holds the line

The union also kept the firm from reducing pension benefits, maintained most of its insurance benefits, and kept virtually intact the vacation and holiday schedules while making minor concessions in work rules.

Members of UAW Local 14 struck the firm on May 4, 1984, after four months of fruitless negotiations during which AP Parts unilaterally imposed a cut in wages and benefits of about $6 an hour.

The new pact includes an amnesty provision calling for reinstatement of 21 workers who had been discharged during the strike.

Approval of the new agreement removes the company from the AFL-CIO's "Don't Buy" list.

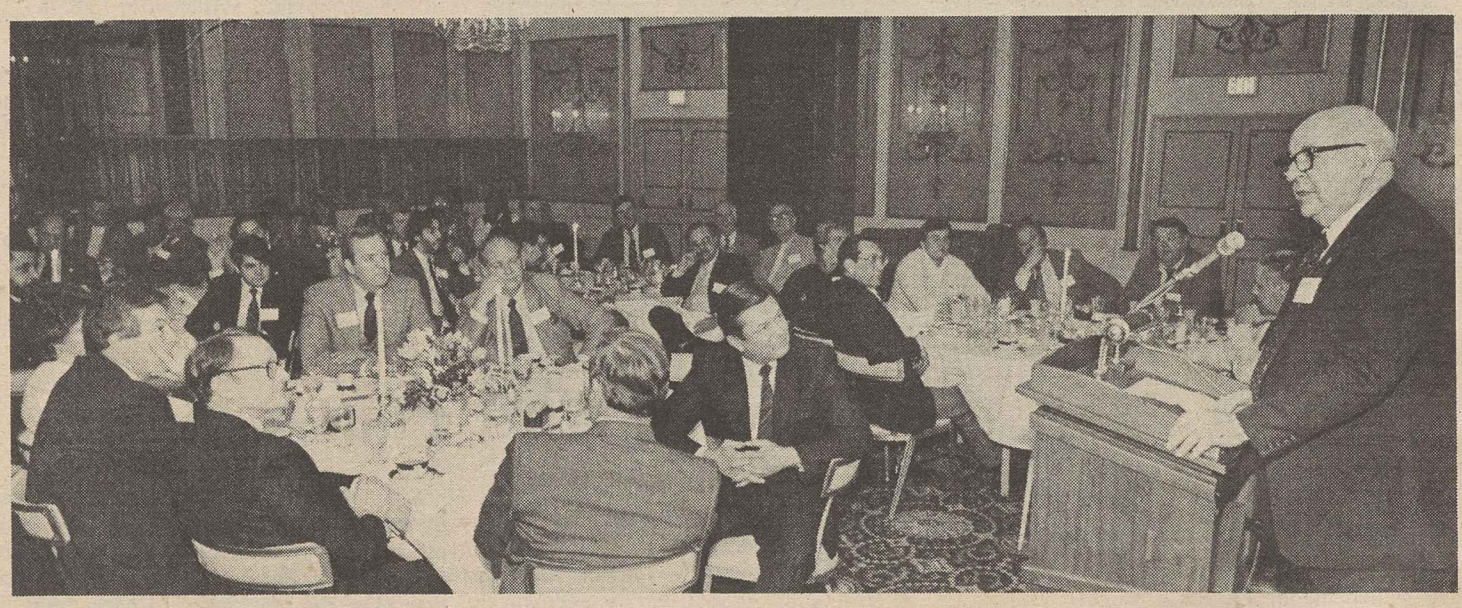
The Union Label & Service Trades Dept. also announced that Liberty Glass Co. of Sapulpa, Okla., was taken off the federation's Unfair List after two locals of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers were decertified, ending a bitter two-year strike.

Meanwhile, the Chemical Workers called off a boycott of the poultry products of Sandreson Farms of Laurel, Miss., after resolving its legal problems with the company.

Sanderson Farms had been on the AFL-CIO's Unfair List since 1982.

Pressure on Poland urged in support of Solidarnosc

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO condemned the Polish communist government's latest campaign of harassment of Solidarnosc leaders and activists, and called on free unions everywhere to urge their governments to apply pressure on Poland to engage in constructive talks with Solidarnosc.



Seven Solidarnosc leaders were detained Feb. 13 after a police raid on a Gdansk apartment where they were meeting with Lech Walesa, former chairman of the outlawed union federation. Another Solidarnosc leader, Andrzej Gwiazda, has just been given an additional two-month prison sentence after already serving two months.

The federation's Executive Council noted that the arrests and continued detention of more than 70 Polish trade unionists follow in the wake of the brutal murder of Rev. Jerzy Popieluszko by Polish security forces because of his outspoken support of Solidarnosc.

"This campaign . . . belies the illusion that the Polish government has begun a policy of moderation which merits the lifting of the sanctions imposed by the United States," the council statement said.

Walesa has accused the Polish government, which withdrew from the International Labor Organization several months ago, of "hatred, repression and violation of human rights."

The council noted that the easing of U.S. economic sanctions by the Reagan Administration last year, including its decision not to block Poland's admission to the International Monetary Fund, has brought no amelioration of the Jaruzelski regime's repression of human rights, especially that of freedom of association.

Tobacco conference

President John DeConcini of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers addresses the 100 participants at a two-day legislative conference for unions in the tobacco industry. The conference was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. Participating unions included the Machinists, Carpenters, Sheet Metal Workers, Electrical Workers, Paperworkers, Firemen & Oilers, and Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, as well as representatives of the Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia state labor federations.

Conrail pacts restore parity for 15 unions

Fifteen of 17 railway unions representing Conrail employees signed new agreements restoring wage parity with the rest of the railroad industry.

The 12-percent increase in pay—about $1.50 an hour—is retroactive to last July 1 and covers more than 30,000 union members of Conrail in the Northeast and Midwest.

The unions agreed to the wage deferrals in May 1981. That agreement expired last June, but Conrail continued to pay its unionized workers 12 percent less than the rest of the industry.

Ten of the 15 separate but identical new contracts restoring the 12-percent cut were signed Feb. 14 in Miami Beach following the conclusion of the winter meeting of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, which represents the unions. Five others subsequently agreed to the pact at Conrail headquarters in Philadelphia.

"It's something we felt we should have had eight months earlier, but we're pleased to have it now," RLEA Chairman Ole M. Berge said. Berge is president of the Maintenance of Way Employes, one of the signatories to the agreement.

Also signing

Other unions that have signed are the Railway & Airline Clerks, Electrical Workers, Railroad Signalmen, Transport Workers, Carmen, Firemen & Oilers, Train Dispatchers, Boilermakers, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Longshoremen, Railway & Airways Supervisors, and the unaffiliated Teamsters and Locomotive Engineers.

Yet to sign are the United Transportation Union and the Yardmasters. They were expected to agree to the same terms.

First to sign was BRAC, representing the largest number of Conrail employees, about 8,800. BRAC President Richard Kilroy said the union's members should receive a lump-sum payment of about $2,300 under the agreement.

The agreement stipulates that the 12 percent in deferred wages will be added to base pay. Kilroy, who is RLEA secretary-treasurer, said that would amount to an increase of $1.54 an hour.

Conrail Chairman L. Stanley Crane said that management had wanted to restore the wage cuts earlier, and added:

"The financial condition is such that it can afford to take this important step in recognition of the sacrifices employees have made in the past."

"Now that Sec. of Transportation Elizabeth Dole has made a recommendation of a purchaser for Conrail," he said, "we believe it is time to recognize the employee sacrifices in a tangible fashion."

Dole recently announced her selection of the Norfolk Southern Corp., as preferred buyer of the 15,000-mile freight line. RLEA's choice was Alleghany Corp.

Maritime Trades Dept. convention calls for revitalization of the nation's merchant marine.

Maritime Trades warn deep crisis facing U.S.-flag merchant marine

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. renewed its call for a federal program to revitalize the American merchant marine which the department said is facing "its worst crisis ever."

The MTD executive board charged that over the past four years the Reagan Administration has either wiped out or severely crippled programs that have sustained the U.S.-flag merchant fleet for the past half-century.

"America's commercial fleet continues to shrink at an alarming pace," the MTD board said in a statement adopted at its winter meeting here. The board pointed out that only about 395 privately owned commercial vessels out of a world fleet of more than 35,000 fly the American flag—only about one out of every 100. The board called on the Administration and Congress to:

- Assure the availability of cargo for American merchant ships by negotiating bilateral shipping agreements, enforcing existing cargo laws, and adopting the Code of Conduct for Liner Conferences drawn up by the United Nations Conference on Trade & Development (UNCTAD).
- Extend the Jones Act's protections for American coastal shipping to all maritime operations within 200 miles off the coast.
- Continue transfer of Navy supply and support ships to private sector operation.
- Strengthen U.S.-flag shipping on the Great Lakes and inland waterways.
- Transfer certain Coast Guard duties to the private sector.
- Expand American fishing and canning industries and implement programs to protect them from unfair competition.
- Use surplus funds from the maritime operating differential subsidy to finance merchant seamen's health care and support the shipment of American grain to the Soviet Union aboard U.S.-flag vessels.
- Develop a forward-looking oceans policy based on future marine technological innovations.

In an address to the MTD board, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland noted that the Reagan Administration, as part of its budget proposals, would further weaken the nation's shipping and shipbuilding capacity through subsidy cuts and "user fees" for channel markers and Coast Guard services.

Some of Reagan's other "high-priority" proposals, Kirkland noted, include:

- Higher military spending offset by more and deeper cuts in social programs.
- Cuts in all the programs designed to meet the problems of working people, the health needs of the elderly, the housing and health needs of the poor, the education and training hopes of the young, and to keep the health and housing guarantees made to veterans.
- Cuts in federal wage and pension programs "that will surely drive the ablest workers out of government service."

These are some of the issues now confronting Congress, Kirkland noted, "and our friends on the Hill will need all the support and ammunition we can provide to resist the temptation to let pressure, instead of justice, guide their votes."

Kirkland stressed that the labor movement would take its case not only to Congress, "but to the American people by whatever means are effective and available to us. And we will make sure that our members understand the issues and that we are clearly addressing their most vital concerns as working people."

The statement on maritime policy was one of more than two dozen adopted by the MTD board on issues of particular concern to the department and its affiliates.

In other action, the board received a report from MTD President Frank Drozak on the operations of the grassroots educational program established a year ago. Drozak noted that the program had succeeded in making the public and the press aware of the maritime industry's problems and had helped elect candidates who will work to solve those problems.

Speakers addressing the board, besides Kirkland, included House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill; Rep. Mario Biaggi, chairman of the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries subcommittee; Rep. Joseph P. Addabbo, chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee; AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald; Legislative Director Ray Denison; COPE Director John Perkins and Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler.

Hatch Act charges called attempt to curb free speech

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Reagan Administration has stretched Hatch Act restrictions on political action by federal workers "far beyond all rational limits" in its threatened prosecution of the presidents of three AFL-CIO unions, the Executive Council charged.

The Hatch Act targets are Presidents Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees, Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers and Moe Biller of the Postal Workers. All are on long-term unpaid leave from the jobs they held before being elected to union office.

They are being prosecuted "for exercising their right of free speech on behalf of Walter F. Mondale rather than Ronald Reagan," the council charged.

Bad policy

It noted the labor movement's longstanding opposition to the Hatch Act as "bad public policy" because citizens should be encouraged to participate in public affairs. But "the obvious intent of these prosecutions is not to protect the integrity of the public service, but to limit the right of the leaders of the largest unions in the federal sector to serve their members."

The council resolution pledged "total support" to the rights of federal and postal service unions to represent their members without being subjected to government reprisals.

"The Reagan Administration's misuse of the Hatch Act is merely the most recent example of its anti-union biases and its implacable hostility to the rights of unions and their members," the Executive Council asserted.

Union, city ease pain of plant closing

Chicago—A toy factory is shutting down here and leaving its 450 workers in the lurch. But intervention by the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Mayor Harold Washington and city lawyers is helping soften the blow.

Last September, workers at Playskool, Inc., were told their factory would be closed by year's end and production operations shifted to plants in Massachusetts or New Jersey.

The decision by Playskool's parent corporation, Hasbro, came as a complete surprise to the union and city. Earlier in the year, Hasbro took over Playskool, which made G.I. Joe dolls, Lincoln Logs, Big Foot trucks, alphabet blocks and puzzles at the Chicago factory.

Nick Jones, president of the RWDSU Chicago Joint Board, said the union asked for help from the city and he lauded Mayor Washington's efforts.

In December, the city filed suit against Hasbro charging that the shutdown violated an agreement the firm made with the city in 1980 in which it received a $1 million industrial revenue bond to expand operations.

The city contended Hasbro and Playskool reneged on its promise to expand, and instead reduced production and then decided to cease operations entirely.

Reach settlement

The city, in conjunction with the union, reached an out-of-court settlement that provides for the company to pay a bounty of $500 for each former Playskool employee who is hired by another company. Additionally, it is offering current employees $100 for each successful job they provide to the laid-off workers.

Under the agreement, Playskool will close down in November 1985. Until that time, it will continue to employ about 100 of the RWDSU members in its puzzle department. For laid-off workers experiencing financial difficulties, Hasbro has set up a $50,000 emergency fund to help pay utility, medical and other bills.

The union succeeded in negotiating severance benefits equal to 20 hours' pay for each year of service. Health insurance coverage was extended for three months past the date of layoff and vesting in the company pension plan was reduced from 10 years to just one year. For the workers over age 55, the union won fully paid life insurance policies and the option of getting health insurance at regular group rates, Jones said.

The 100 workers remaining on the job were brought under a recently negotiated union contract at a Playskool warehouse in Des Plaines, Ill. The result was a 5-percent pay increase.

Jones said the joint board will now press for plant closing legislation at the local, state or federal levels. "If we'd had two or three months more to work with the company, it would have made quite a difference," Jones said.

Union Label's newest

Reagan budget ax cocked to annihilate Job Corps

"The Job Corps is a success story" that has provided hope and training for some 2 million disadvantaged youths and it should not be killed by President Reagan's budget ax, the AFL-CIO said.

The need for the Job Corps is as critical now as it has ever been, and perhaps more so, Federation Economist Markley Roberts stressed, noting that one out of every five teenagers is unemployed and among black teens, two of every five are jobless. "Without a high school diploma and without a job, it's easy to fall in poverty or crime," he added.

Most Job Corps centers are operated by private business under competitive bids. But there are numerous other union-sponsored Job Corps programs run by the Auto Workers, Carpenters, Bricklayers, Painters, Plasterers & Cement Masons, Operating Engineers, Railway & Airline Clerks, the National Maritime Union and the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council.

The unions operating programs ran an ad in the Feb. 20 Wall Street Journal pointing out that the Job Corps "is a 20-year success story, is not a 'give away,' is not a make-work scam." The ad stressed that for every $1 invested in Job Corps, the national economy receives $1.45 the following year.

Blind destruction

Roberts denounced the shortsightedness of the Administration's destructive attitude, noting that Job Corps programs quickly pay for themselves.

He cited a study by Mathematica, an independent research firm, showing that Job Corps graduates actually "make money for the government because the average repayment in taxes each year is at least 45 percent more than the investment in the Job Corps," with a total paycheck of the training costs within three years.

The Administration's reason for targeting the Job Corps for elimination is based primarily on cost. It contends that the cost runs $15,000 a year for each of the 80,000 trainees in more than 100 Job Corps programs around the country.

Roberts, however, charged that the Administration has grossly overstated the per pupil cost. According to Job Corps estimates, it is only about $8,000.

In its zeal to kill the program, the Administration is overlooking the alternative costs. The Job Corps trains the neediest of hard-core disadvantaged youth. The $8,000 training cost pales when compared to the $21,000 to $30,000 cost of keeping a criminal in jail, Roberts said.

The disadvantaged youth trained by the Job Corps are the hard-core unemployed young men and women between the ages 16 and 21, who are primarily high school dropouts with an average fifth-grade reading level. Many come from broken homes, Roberts noted.

At the Job Corps centers, where the trainees live for eight months while learning a useful trade, they get counseling and remedial education, learn good work habits and attitudes so they can make it in the real job market, Roberts said.

Many of the participants are refugees from Vietnam, Cuba and other nations, and like many other trainees, earn a high school equivalency diploma in addition to a marketable skill.

Labor's participation in the training of disadvantaged youth proves the value of cooperative efforts between labor, business and government to fight unemployment, Roberts said.

Proof of this program's success is that those coming out of the Job Corps will earn more and work more than similar young people who don't go into the program, Roberts noted, and they are less likely to commit a crime, be in jail or be drug users, and more likely to be taxpayers.

James F. Kiley elected to Rhode Island fed post

Providence, R.I.—James F. Kiley was elected secretary-treasurer of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO by its executive board. He fills the vacancy created by the retirement of Edwin C. Brown last August.

Kiley, business manager of the Electrical Workers Local 2323 since 1971, has been a member of the state federation's executive council since 1973. His term of office runs until next Oct. 4, when the state AFL-CIO convenes.

Commission on trade

Rewards called spur to productivity gains

By James M. Shevis

An 18-month study by a presidential commission on ways to improve America's competitiveness in international trade calls on employers to strengthen worker incentives as a means of increasing productivity and improving quality.

"American management is urged to make use of the broad array of incentive mechanisms available to it to reward the effort of individual employees and to strengthen the linkage between pay and performance," the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness said in a recommendation.

The 30-member panel also called for legislative changes to make incentive stock options more useful.

President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., one of three panel members representing labor, said the commission's report contains more pluses than minuses in labor's view.

One of the big pluses was the panel's call for a revision of U.S. trade laws, which labor has recommended for years.

"Our domestic trade laws have not been responsive to the new realities of global competition," the study said.

Fragmented policy

The nation's fragmented trade policy seriously limits its ability to respond to the growing volume and complexity of international trade, the panel observed.

"For those industries threatened by severe import penetration, U.S. trade law has often granted relief only after their injuries have become irreparable. . . . At the same time, U.S. trade remedies for 'unfair foreign government practices' have been unable to respond to our competitors' new national strategies," the study said.

A key recommendation calls for aid to displaced workers. Such assistance would include early notification of plant closings and incentives for employers to hire and retain workers.

Among the major problems facing the United States in its effort to remain competitive, the panel cited increasing trade deficits, a declining share of the high-technology market, and a declining rate of return on assets in manufacturing.

House hearing

Rep. John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Banking Subcommittee on Economic Stability, welcomed the commission's report and said he will study how the recommendations can be implemented legislatively. The subcommittee will review the report's findings at a Mar. 5 hearing.

IUD's Samuel, who co-chaired the panel's committee on human resources, said "the basic thrust" of the report is acceptable to labor but he had some concerns about recommendations to loosen various federal regulations.

Despite the heavy employer representation, no one on the panel "even suggested" holding down pay in order to improve competitiveness, Samuel noted at a news conference when the report was made public.

The commission concluded that maintaining a high standard of living is an essential element of national competitiveness, he said.

"The goal of improved competitiveness is to allow Americans to earn a better standard of living in a world economy that is increasingly interdependent and increasingly competitive," said John A. Young, president and chief executive officer of Hewlett-Packard Co., and chairman of the commission.

Wage standstill

Young said it is "cause for concern" that real hourly wages in the business sector "have been virtually stagnant for the past 10 years."

The commission also called on employers and unions to foster mutual trust by sharing more information, and refusing to take advantage of the other party by exploiting weaknesses. It urged more tripartite dialogue among government, business and labor at every level of U.S. industry.

"Government should take the lead in highlighting the importance of competitiveness and should nurture an effective consensus-building dialogue among leaders in industry, labor, government and academia," the panel recommended.

Besides Samuel, labor members of the panel were Auto Workers Vice President Donald F. Ephlin and attorney Stephen Schlossberg.

Samuel said that while he would prefer to see adoption of a national industrial policy on trade none seems likely now.

Other key recommendations of the panel include:

- Creation of Cabinet-level departments of trade and of science and technology.
- Increased tax incentives for research and development.
- Re-examination of regulations that may hinder competitiveness.
- Modification of antitrust policy to allow more mergers and business combinations.

The commission expressed concern that U.S. productivity growth hasn't kept pace with that of the nation's major trading partners in the last 20 years. Japan's growth rate, for example, has been five times that of America's and its productivity now exceeds that of the United States in autos, steel and precision machinery.

The panel attributed the slowdown in productivity growth basically "to incentive systems that fail to reinforce the work ethic."

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer eight labor institutes and workshops during March and April. The schedule:

Negotiating Techniques: Private Sector, Mar. 3-8—A skills-sharpening session for experienced negotiators in simulated bargaining exercises before a video camera and federal mediators.

Advanced Arbitration Techniques, Mar. 17-22—For union representatives who present grievance arbitration cases, focusing on examination and cross-examination of witnesses, preparation of briefs and researching issues.

TV: The Cool Medium, Apr. 8-11—A three-day workshop to coach union leaders on working with TV reporters and video cameras.

Negotiating for Pensions, Apr. 8-12—A training session for union staff members on preparing for and bargaining for pension programs.

Bargaining Issues for Union Women, Apr. 14-19—A program open to men and women on vital women's issues in bargaining and on solutions and contract language.

Advanced Organizing, Apr. 15-25—A workshop co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing & Field Services. Enrollees must be approved by that department.

Computers for Local Unions, Apr. 21-25—A briefing on the use of computers for local union officers who need some knowledge before buying equipment.

Effective Union Action for Civil Rights, Apr. 21-25—Annual conference of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights for union civil rights and women's rights designees.

The Changing Workplace, Apr. 28-May 1—A focus on workplace changes including physical aspects, workers themselves and management strategies.

Five AFL-CIO affiliates will use the center during March for staff training sessions: State, County & Municipal Employees, Mar. 3-8; Communications Workers, Mar. 3-8; Railway & Airline Clerks, Mar. 10-15; Graphic Communications Union, Mar. 24-29; and Operating Engineers, Mar. 31-Apr. 4.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development has invited 40 union leaders from Latin America for classes on collective bargaining and trade unionism, Mar. 10-Apr. 12.

Information about these or other labor studies is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

No Double Standard

THE AFL-CIO's longstanding support for a strong national defense has been too often reiterated, and is too well known, to require further affirmation. Indeed, when the Reagan Administration took office, with a call for substantial increases in defense spending, the AFL-CIO urged that, if such increases were deemed necessary by Congress, they should be financed by a surtax on corporate and individual income.

Moreover, the federation has steadfastly opposed so-called "transfer amendments" proposed by those who sought to increase spending on domestic social programs by cutting the defense budget. Social spending and defense spending, we have always contended, are driven by different considerations.

But the Administration has turned a deaf ear on our proposals. It has pushed for its own version of the "transfer amendment"—boosting defense spending at the expense of social programs. And it has insisted not on raising taxes to meet the military needs, but on cutting taxes, especially for the wealthy, thereby shifting a greater burden for defense on working Americans.

WE REPEATEDLY warned the Administration that such policies would undermine the consensus for substantial increases in defense spending.

The AFL-CIO remains committed to a strong defense. But we are equally committed to a strong economy and social justice at home. We will therefore not support increased defense spending at the expense of programs that are vital to our domestic welfare.

The Constitution mandates the federal government to "promote the general welfare" and "to provide for the common defense." In seeking to freeze or cut domestic programs while increasing defense spending, the President would pursue one fundamental responsibility of government by abandoning the other. He has foreclosed all options that would lead to a fair and equitable financing of our military needs.

Under the circumstances, the AFL-CIO is left with no choice but to insist that if vital domestic programs are to be cut or frozen, defense spending must also be frozen. We refuse to make a choice between the "general welfare" and "the common defense."

Opening the Gates

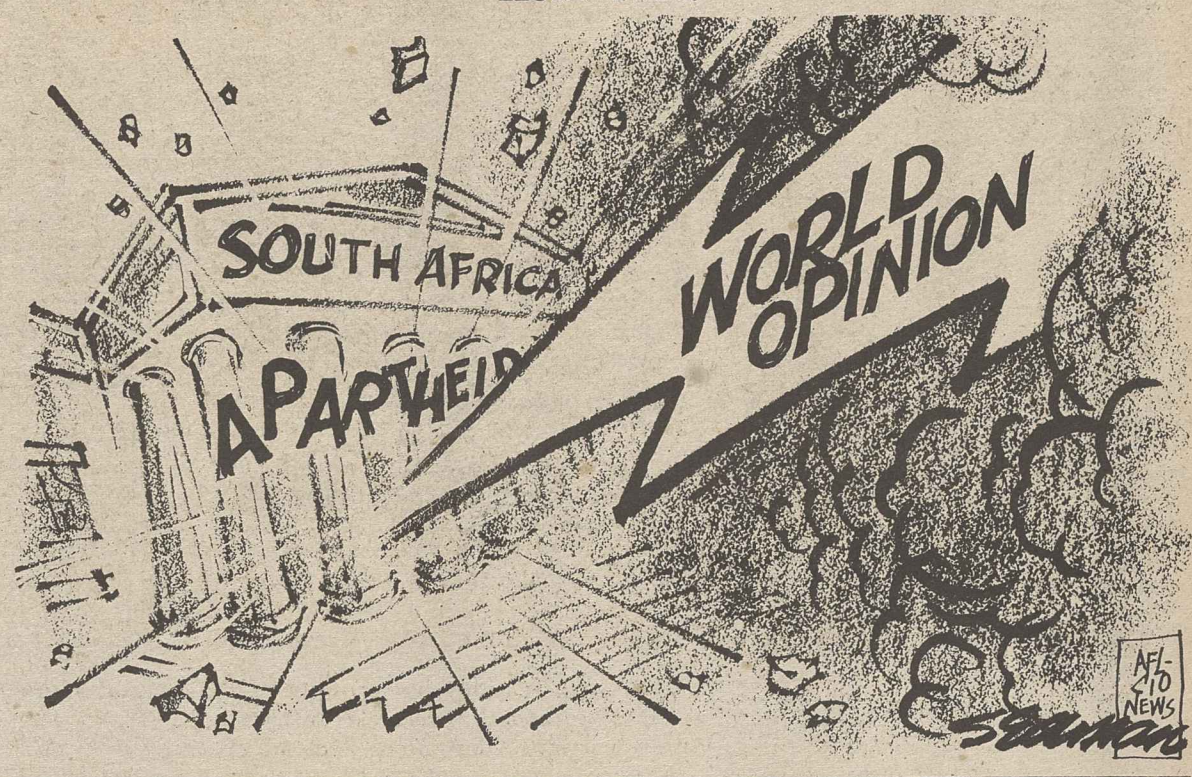
EVEN AS America's trade deficit increases a staggering $10 billion a month, the Administration signals an abandonment of the job-saving policy of negotiating limits on Japan's export of automobiles to the United States.

The damage to the economy would be immense, even if the Japanese choose not to risk a political backlash by immediately flooding a near-saturated American market. General Motors is just waiting for the gates to be lifted to put into effect its plan to import 300,000 cars to sell through its dealerships. Other major auto companies have said bluntly that they would have no choice but to follow suit.



Ironically, the purpose of the import restraint agreements have been largely achieved in that U.S. carmakers have become more efficient, more productive. But competitive equality remains an elusive goal because of the overvaluation of the U.S. dollar.

To put it simply, the relationship between the dollar and the yen has changed over the past four years to the trade advantage of Japan and the disadvantage of the United States. U.S. goods sold in Japan cost 25 percent more as a result of the exchange rate. Japanese goods sold in the United States cost 25 percent less.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council was not exaggerating when it warned that "America's trade problems have reached crisis proportions."

Nor was it making polite small talk when it emphasized that "conserving American jobs and conserving American industries are political decisions for which members of Congress must be fully accountable, and the Administration must be held fully responsible."

Corporate spending drops under Reagan tax breaks

By Press Associates, Inc.

With the start of the congressional debate over taxes and spending, it's a good time to examine those big "supply-side" corporate tax breaks that were supposed to unshackle private enterprise and spur an investment boom, with jobs for all.

Most of the Reagan "investment tax incentives" enacted in 1981 are still in place. These business tax breaks indeed have had their effects, one of them being to increase the federal budget deficit by tens of billions of dollars.

Unfortunately, they haven't achieved their advertised purpose for which they were sold to the public and Congress. In fact, a recent study actually shows a reverse relationship between the amount of tax breaks and how much companies invest in new plant and equipment. The 38-page study was done by the Citizens for Tax Justice, a coalition of citizens and labor groups.

Study findings

The study, titled "The Failure of Corporate Tax Incentives: Three Years of Growing Loopholes and Lagging Investment," examines a sample of 238 major U.S. corporations and their annual reports to shareholders for 1981-1983. It found the following:

● The 238 companies surveyed paid an average 14.3 percent of their earnings in federal income taxes, far below the 46-percent statutory corporate tax rate. Yet, despite their nearly $90 billion in "tax incentives" in the 1981-83 period, these profitable firms reduced new investment by 15.5 percent.

● The corporations enjoying the largest tax advantages slashed their investment the most. The 58 firms that paid no taxes or received net tax rebates over the three-year period as a whole reduced capital investment by 19.3 percent. The 15 companies that paid zero taxes or less in any of the three years cut their investment most of all, by 29.6 percent.

● General Electric, which received more net tax rebates than any other U.S. corporation and got a $283-million refund from the Treasury, despite $6.5 billion in domestic profits over three years, reduced investment by 15 percent.

In sharp contrast, the 50 companies in the survey with the highest tax rates over the three years—those with the least incentive to invest according to supply-side theory—increased their capital investment by 4.3 percent. These firms paid over 33 percent of their profits in federal income taxes.

Higher dividends

So what did the companies do with all those tax breaks? The same 238 firms which cut their investment by 15.5 percent increased their dividends to stockholders by 17 percent over the three years, the study found. It said they also used their tax bonanza to buy up other companies, partly explaining the record-breaking $209 billion in corporate acquisitions in the 1981-83 period. In addition, they raised executive salaries and bonuses and expanded cash reserves.

The study's authors said, "It's time to stop the waste. If the President and the Congress held our largest corporations to the same standard of accountability they apply to the poorest welfare recipient, no amount of corporate lobbying could prevent the repeal of the host of 'incentive' loopholes, which, based on the overwhelming evidence, don't work."

Restoring the corporate share of the tax burden, which over the past three decades has fallen from 25 percent to 8.5 percent of total revenues, would help reduce the deficit and blunt the Administration-led drive for more deep cuts in vital domestic programs.

In addition, as the study's authors put it, it would "help strengthen our economy by forcing our corporations to stop relying on lobbyists and loopholes to bolster profits and, instead, go back to making money the old fashioned way—by earning it."

Court restores wage-hour rule in public sector

ren E. Burger and Justices Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and William H. Rehnquist—along with Sandra Day O'Connor, who was appointed to the court by President Reagan.

Rehnquist, who had written the National League of Cities opinion, bristled confidence that its states' rights doctrine will "in time again command the support of a majority of this court." The obvious reference was to the probability of further Reagan appointments in his second term. And Powell, writing the principal dissent, expressed concern at the overturning of what he termed "settled constitutional doctrine."

In fact, as union attorneys stressed, it was the 1976 court that had veered sharply from a long line of precedents.

As recently as 1968, after Congress first brought a group of public workers under the wage-hour law, states challenged the extension of coverage in a case known as Maryland vs. Wirtz. The Supreme Court, then headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren, ruled in a 6-2 opinion that the coverage was constitutional. The 1976 National League of Cities case, while based on later amendments by Congress which added 3.4 million public workers to the law's coverage, specifically overturned the Maryland vs. Wirtz precedent.

Initially, the San Antonio transit system case moved through the courts on the issue of interpretation of the National League of Cities doctrine.

Was a public transit system, which had once been privately owned, a "traditional" government function and thus exempt from compliance with the federal wage-hour law? Since transit workers are often required to work split shifts and variable hours, overtime pay requirements are of more than academic interest.

Challenges rule

After the 1976 decision, the San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority had stopped complying with the federal wage-hour law and challenged a ruling by the Labor Dept. that it was still covered because operating a bus system is not a traditional function of government.

The case reached the Supreme Court, with union attorneys participating on behalf of workers directly affected. Since ATU member Joe G. Garcia's name was the first listed, the historic decision will go down in the law books as Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority.

AFL-CIO General Counsel Laurence Gold participated with ATU attorneys in the case and argued labor's position before the Supreme Court.

The first hearing by the Supreme Court in March 1984 focused on whether the Supreme Court's National League of Cities decision barred the Labor Dept. from enforcing federal overtime pay provisions for public transit employees.

But instead of deciding the case on that basis, the court asked the parties in the case to submit arguments on whether the 10th Amendment's state sovereignty doctrine as applied in the National League of Cities case should be reconsidered.

Labor's answer was a resounding "yes." The Transit Union brief responding to the inquiry cited precedents ranging from the earliest years of the nation. It found no basis for concluding that the authority the Constitution delegated to Congress to regulate commerce "is diminished because a state, rather than a private party, is engaged in the activity which constitutes commerce."

An oral argument before the Supreme Court on Oct. 1, 1984, produced a three-way division among the parties to the case.

The San Antonio transit system, represented by former Sec. of Transportation William T. Coleman, Jr., argued that public transit qualifies as a traditional government function and the power of Congress to regulate commerce is limited by the principle of "constitutional federalism."

U.S. Solicitor Gen. Rex Lee, arguing for the Labor Dept. position, found no fault with the National League of Cities decision. But he contended that public transit is a recent phenomenon, not a traditional government function.

Gold, presenting the union case, said transit employees are clearly subject to federal wage-hour standards under the National League of Cities decision. But he went on to urge strongly that the decision be overturned because the 1976 case was wrongly decided.

The framers of the Constitution "put their faith in the political system" to safeguard state sovereignty, Gold contended, and specifically rejected an amendment which would have prohibited federal interference in state matters.

Labor's reaction

Officers of the Transit Union and other public-sector unions whose members are affected by the Supreme Court action voiced elation at the decision.

The Supreme Court turnabout bore out predictions made at the time of the 1976 decision that its reasoning would not stand the test of time.

One such comment, from the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., was that a future Supreme Court, "comprised of far wiser justices, will overturn this decision."

The provisions of the wage-hour law that the Supreme Court had previously invalidated were never repealed by Congress and presumably will now go back into effect.

New board members

FTC pressed to retain ban on deceptive food store ads

The temptation for retail food stores to "pull a fast one" on their competitors may be irrestible if the Federal Trade Commission rescinds its rule forbidding stores from advertising items they do not have in stock, the Food & Commercial Workers warned the FTC.

The FTC is contemplating a move to eliminate or soften its advertising rules for retail food stores, leaving it up to "market forces" to prevent unfair and deceptive practices.

In a letter to the commission, UFCW President William H. Wynn said the union firmly believes "that the rule provides basic and needed consumer protection."

Wynn stressed that the retail food industry is highly competitive and said there would be a real temptation for food stores to look for short-run gains. "The view that such tactics may hurt the food store in the long run, as suggested by the FTC study, is true." But store owners "sometimes choose short-run gains at the expense of long-term losses. Such calculations, or miscalculations would certainly harm consumers," he stressed.

Wynn said the FTC study does not prove that the cost of the advertising rules exceeds the benefits to consumers, nor that consumers believe the rules are worthless.

"We find some arguments of the FTC study to be less than convincing. We have no way of knowing whether the calculations on costs and benefits to consumers are appropriate or valid. No one except retail executives can have such data."

Wynn noted that if a few stores did engage in false advertising, the rest of the industry might follow suit to remain competitive and "the logical result would be far, far greater costs to consumers."

He acknowledged some problems with the current advertising rules, especially for stores required to overstock advertised items. He outlined what the UFCW sees as a more effective approach: allow stores to stock advertised items at the volume normally sold during a sale period, and to offer consumers a rain check or similar product when the stock of the advertised item runs out.

Wynn urged the FTC not to rescind the advertising rule, but to extend coverage to non-food retail stores, giving "an important protection to the consumer public."

Lifting curb on Japan's cars seen threat to 200,000 jobs

Ending restraints on Japanese auto exports to the United States would throw 200,000 workers out of jobs and cause "irreparable damage" to the American economy, the UAW told Congress.

The union's testimony, before a House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, came as the White House was sending a strong signal that Japan will soon be free to ship an unlimited number of vehicles to the U.S. market.

In recent years, Japan has accepted what is termed a "voluntary restraint agreement" limiting its auto exports. In practice, however, this is a quota reached through government-to-government negotiation between the United States and Japan.

The current agreement expires Mar. 31, and a top-level Cabinet committee has recommended that President Reagan not ask Japan for any further limitation on auto exports.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber termed the Cabinet proposal "an outrage" and called on Reagan to reject it.

Some $20 billion of the nation's $37 billion trade deficit with Japan comes from the auto sector, Bieber stressed at a news conference during the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Florida.

Ripple effect

He warned that if the restraint agreement isn't extended, the deficit will grow further and still more jobs will be sacrificed. "The job loss will ripple through the entire economy," Bieber said, "in steel, rubber, glass, textiles, electronics, robotics and all the other industries that supply auto production."

At the Capitol Hill hearings, UAW Governmental Affairs Director Don Stillman said abandonment of the Japanese export agreement would result in a million fewer small cars being manufactured in the United States.

General Motors has already announced plans to bring in some 300,000 small cars from Japan and Korea if export restraints are lifted, Stillman noted. Other U.S. car manufacturers will also turn to imports and abandon small car production in the United States, he warned.

Chrysler officials confirmed this, testifying that if auto imports are not restricted and the exchange rate of the dollar stays high, "we would have to follow General Motors and go to Asia."

Ford witnesses said restraints saved 100,000 auto industry jobs.

News accounts indicated that the Administration wanted to abandon quotas in a "non-election" year to minimize the political fallout. Larry Speakes, the White House press official, told reporters that there may not be any need for Reagan to make a formal decision on whether to accept the Cabinet recommendation to end restraints.

Keeping to the myth that the quotas are strictly voluntary, he suggested that it would be entirely up to Japan whether it wished to continue to restrain its auto exports to the United States.

More competitive

At the House hearings, Stillman noted that the U.S. auto industry has become more competitive and more efficient—and that both the union and its members "have done their part" to achieve this.

But the progress has been rolled back by the "increasingly unfair" exchange rate between the dollar and the yen which makes Japanese goods cheaper in the United States and U.S. goods more costly in Japan.

"The yen has recently slipped to more than 250 to the dollar," Stillman noted. "That compares to roughly 200 yen per dollar in early 1981. Japanese cars reap a huge cost advantage from that 25 percent slippage," he stressed.

Both the restraint agreements and the possibility that Congress would enact the domestic content legislation sought by the U.S. labor movement have encouraged Japanese auto firms to set up production facilities in the United States. Without such pressure, the UAW warned, production will stay overseas.

CWA supports low fees for basic phone service

No American should be denied telephone service because of low income or place of residence, Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts stressed.

Watts expressed concern over studies showing that one in five older Americans have had to curtail phone usage because of higher costs resulting from the AT&T divestiture and price increases for local telephone service.

"For senior citizens, the unemployed and the handicapped, telephone service is a life-and-death matter," Watts said. CWA operators who handle emergency calls each day can testify to that, he noted.

While divestiture can't be undone, the concept of universal service should be reaffirmed and brought to reality, Watts said.

Council study seeks new paths for growth of labor movement

Cites continuing role as force for progress

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A searching self-examination by the AFL-CIO has pinpointed problems created by a period of rapid change, outlined a program to overcome them, and found "the seeds for a resurgence of the labor movement."

A report by the Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work said that although organized labor "has demonstrated a notable resiliency" and remains "a vital force for progress" in America, unions find themselves "behind the pace of change."

The committee report, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," was issued during the council's winter meeting here. It sets forth a series of specific recommendations for renewed growth through innovative organizing strategies and techniques, new categories of membership, effective use of the media, stronger union structures, expanded services and other steps to improve traditional union programs.

But in the light of the situation confronting labor, the committee stressed that "it is not enough merely to search for more effective ways of doing what we have always done; we must expand our notion of what it is workers can do through their unions."

Confident of resurgence

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, describing the report at a news conference, said it "gives us confidence that our unions have the capacity to continue the never-ending process of renewal and regeneration. . . . All the data we have studied, as well as our own common sense, provide grounds for hope that a period of resurgence—of sustained growth—is within our grasp."

The report is the culmination of two and a half years of work by the committee, which is chaired by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. The panel includes 18 federation vice presidents and the operating heads of the eight constitutional departments. In the course of its meetings since 1982 it received reports from a number of experts. It also reviewed surveys taken over the last 25 years on the public attitude toward unions and supplemented this material with additional surveys.

Kirkland stressed that the committee will remain in being to study points raised in its discussions but not incorporated in its report. He said it will conduct a continuing review of responses to the report from Executive Council members and other trade unionists.

The committee found no cause for "doom and despair" regarding the future of the labor movement. It cited earlier predictions of the demise of unions when labor suffered setbacks in the 1920s and '30s, which were followed by periods of remarkable growth for the trade union movement.

The data the committee studied, it said, provide grounds for hope as well as con-

Federal service unions battle pay, pension cuts

Federal and postal union leaders accused the Reagan Administration of launching a vendetta against the career civil service and called on Congress to reject proposals for slashing pay, pensions and health insurance coverage.

The union testimony drew a strong assent from Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) and other members of her Post Office & Civil Service subcommittee on employee compensation.

She assailed the Administration proposals as "neither necessary, fair, nor in the public interest."

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock urged Congress either to reject the Administration's takeaway proposals or give federal workers "full trade union rights" so they can protect themselves. Only postal workers can bargain over wages and both federal and postal employees are covered by the same congressionally enacted civil service retirement system.

The Administration case was argued before the House panel by Office of Personnel Management Director Donald J. Devine, the leadoff witness. Devine described the proposal to reduce benefits for both present and future retirees as a "reform" in an "entitlement program."

Federal workers must be overpaid because their quit rate is less than most private-sector jobs, he claimed. And the answer to rising health insurance costs, Devine contended, is to substitute a voucher system that would induce workers to shop around for the cheapest program they can find.

This is what some of the union witnesses had to say in rebuttal:

- Postal Workers President Moe Biller said the Administration proposals would sabotage the collective bargaining and arbitration system Congress set up for the postal service.

Even if postal pay were not immediately affected, Biller said, unilateral reductions of retirement and health benefits would "undermine" a contract signed just six weeks ago after "months of negotiations, fact-finding and arbitration." Retirees have already given up some $5,000 in pension cost-of-living adjustments since 1977 and have done "their fair share and more" to reduce the federal deficit.

'Satellites' added to schedules for regional meetings

The AFL-CIO's officers will be covering more ground and meeting more trade unionists during this year's regional conferences.

President Lane Kirkland, in a letter announcing the schedule of seven 1985 conferences, said each will be supplemented by six "satellite" meetings. On the second day of the two-day regional conferences, he and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue each will separately participate in three meetings at central bodies in other cities ranging across several states while the main conference continues.

For example, during the first conference, set for Mar. 22-23 at Portland, Ore.,

Commitment to elderly

Social security compact defended

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO asked Congress to keep faith with elderly and disabled Americans by rejecting proposals to freeze social security payments in order to make the federal deficit appear smaller.

"In no way" does social security add to the budget deficit, the Executive Council stressed. It brings in more revenue from the payroll tax on workers and employers than it pays out in benefits.

The council noted that 1985 marks the 50th anniversary year of the Social Security Act and the 20th anniversary of enactment of Medicare—which is now the chief source of health care protection for some 30 million persons.

These programs represent commitments dating back to Franklin D. Roosevelt's presidency, the council noted.

The statement on social security was one of a series adopted in the final sessions of the council's winter meeting here on domestic and international affairs and trade union issues. Stories on these actions appear elsewhere in this issue.

Retaining dignity

The council pointed out that social security's first goal was to enable workers to retain "dignity and self-reliance" after they reach retirement age. With later changes in the law, that commitment now includes income protection for widows and surviving children and for disabled workers of all ages and their dependents.

To keep the social security system solvent, Congress in 1983 adopted the recommendations of a bipartisan commission. Beneficiaries, who took some sacrifices to keep the program solvent, including a six-month postponement of their cost-of-living adjustments, were assured at the time that the system was now sound and no further cuts would be required of them.

"It would be a breach of faith to force the elderly to make new sacrifices" for reasons that have nothing to do with the needs of the social security system, the AFL-CIO insisted.

The council statement also attacked Administration proposals to force the elderly to pay a larger share of their health care costs and to freeze payments to hospitals and physicians treating Medicare patients.

Working Americans as well as those eligible for Medicare would be hurt by some of the Administration's proposals,

Study explores new course for labor

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue presents the report of the Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work, which he chaired.

cern "and, indeed, suggest the seeds for a resurgence of the labor movement."

It pointed to such survey findings as:

- Union enrollment in growing numbers of "the types of workers who are forming an increasingly larger share of the workforce."
- Workers who choose to form a union continue to be well-served by and are generally satisfied with their union.
- Non-union workers recognize the effectiveness of concerted action in securing workplace democracy and gaining redress for grievances.
- Experience both in Canada and in the public sector in the United States demonstrates that "the current generation of workers, when given a fair chance to form a union at their workplace, elect to do so in large numbers."

The committee's report details the problems posed by the enormously rapid growth of the labor force in recent years, particularly in economic sectors and areas of the country which in the past have not been highly organized. It points out that this rapid growth is creating new patterns of part-time and temporary employment that make it more difficult for workers to form unions without fear of employer reprisal.

The failure of federal labor laws to protect workers who exercise their right to organize is also noted.

"The norm is that unions now face employers who are bent on avoiding unionization at all costs and who are left largely free to do so by a law that has proven to be impotent and a Labor Board that is inert," the report observes.

Workplace revolution

It also points out that the United States and other nations are undergoing a scientific, technological and economic revolution "every bit as significant as the industrial revolution" of the 19th Century. Jobs are being eliminated, changed and created by technological advances, the statement notes, and workers paid subsistence wages in underdeveloped countries are producing "the most sophisticated goods, and even services" for the more developed nations.

Recommendations for dealing with these trends, the committee said, are based on the fundamental premises "that the labor movement exists to advance the interests of workers as workers see their interests, and that to continue to perform their role, unions must come to grips with the current and changed realities workers face."

The report stresses that labor's aims—decent wages and conditions, workplace democracy, a full voice for workers in the society, and the more equitable sharing of the nation's wealth—remain unchanged. It added:

"The means of securing those aims, while grounded in experience, must meet today's needs and anticipate tomorrow's aspirations."

The committee offered these recommendations, among others, that it believes "worthy of examination":

- Unions should experiment with new approaches to representing workers, tailored to the needs and concerns of different groups and providing "far greater flexibility in the workplace and greater reliance on mediation and arbitration."
- Unions should address new issues of concern to workers, such as pay equity and greater participation by all workers in decisions on the "how, why and wherefore" of their work.
- Consideration of new categories of membership for such groups as union supporters in non-union shops and workers who gave up their union membership when they changed jobs.
- A study by the AFL-CIO of proposals to provide direct services and benefits to workers outside of a collective bargaining structure.
- Expanded use of the electronic media to overcome misconceptions about unions and make the public aware of their contributions in the workplace and in society at large.
- The use of "corporate" campaigns to neutralize employer interference in the efforts of workers to form unions, such as the tactics that proved effective against the J.P. Stevens textile chain.
- A pilot project by the AFL-CIO using experimental organizing committees along the lines of those that proved effective in earlier periods of union growth.
- Steps to heighten and expand the participation of members in the affairs of their unions as well as more opportunities for members and national union leaders to interact with each other.
- Expanded programs of leadership training for union officers, stewards and rank-and-file members and orientation programs for new members.
- Improved labor communications efforts, including training of spokespersons in media techniques and a pilot project to test the usefulness of advertising to improve the public's understanding of labor.
- A renewed emphasis on organizing and an increase in resources devoted to organizing; careful selection and training of organizers; greater use of modern communications technology in organizing; careful selection of organizing targets; experimentation with new organizing techniques, and greater involvement of union leaders and rank-and-file members in organizing.
- Encouragement of mergers among smaller unions to better serve their members and the development by the AFL-CIO of guidelines to facilitate mergers.

Restoration of enforcement tops safety, health agenda

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its commitment to secure health and safety protections in all American workplaces and repair the damage resulting from the Reagan Administration's repudiation of federal responsibility to workers.

The Executive Council outlined a "progressive national safety and health agenda for the 1980s," including action to:

- Restore the integrity and secure full enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the Mine Safety & Health Act.
- Secure state and federal laws guaranteeing strong, comprehensive right-to-know protections for workers and the public.
- Seek laws and regulations necessary to protect workers and communities from chemical spills and emissions to ensure that tragedies such as Bhopal never occur in the United States.
- Press for federal legislation to compensate victims of occupational disease and to provide for notification and treatment of workers who risk incurring such diseases.
- Encourage negotiation of contract language to improve safety and health standards, establish research and training programs, and expand union participation in safety projects.
- Persuade Congress to strengthen environmental programs scheduled for reauthorization. Such actions should include improvements in chemical testing, in access to information under the Toxic Substances Control Act, in requirements under the Superfund law to protect the public and workers involved in hazardous waste cleanup, and in provisions under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide & Rodenticide Act.

The council's statement noted the "slow but steady progress" made in the first decade after passage of the 1970 job safety law, but charged that "OSHA's life-saving efforts were halted by the Reagan Administration."

Hazards in the workplace are "widespread and growing," the council warned, but for four years the Reagan Administration "has done virtually nothing to alleviate them." As a result of this inaction, some 10,000 workers die each year of asbestos-related cancers, and hundreds of thousands more continue to be exposed to asbestos.

A rising threat

The Administration's claims that it is protecting workers and that its programs are working "are demolished by recent government reports that injuries are increasing in agriculture, construction, communications, retail trade and many manufacturing industries."

The council cited OSHA's failures to act effectively on toxic solvents and gases to which millions of workers are routinely exposed on the job, resulting in brain damage, nervous system disorders and certain forms of cancer.

To overcome the Administration's inaction, the labor movement is doing more at the bargaining table and in legislatures, the council stressed. It noted that many unions now have contract language on health and safety standards, training programs, and wide participation of union representation in jobsite activities.

But workers not protected by a union contract are often left defenseless, the council observed. Thus, to aid all workers, labor has formed coalitions with organizations that share its health and safety goals. The results of this effort include the passage in 19 states and numerous communities of right-to-know laws covering chemical hazards.

Council scores Soviets on Sakharov detention

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO pledged to keep world attention riveted on the Soviet Union's reprisals against human rights advocate Andrei Sakharov and his wife Yelena Bonner.

The Sakharovs have been exiled to the remote village of Gorky in an attempt to silence them for the past five years. Sakharov is not allowed to see western journalists to ascertain the state of his health, and rumors persist that he may have been subjected to mind-altering drugs.

"That the Soviet government should treat in this manner a world-renowned scientist and humanitarian erases any doubt as to how it would treat an ordinary citizen who sought to exercise the rights which the Soviet Union has pledged to guarantee in the Helsinki Accords," the Executive Council said.

Cutback seen signal to private sector

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Reagan Administration's assault on federal employees sends a signal to private-sector employers "that the pay and benefits of all working people are open to attack," the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

The council protested the pay, pension and benefit reductions proposed by the White House and called for "full collective bargaining rights" to divorce the setting of federal wages and working conditions from partisan politics. The federal government should be a model employer, the council statement urged.

Instead, it noted, when inflation was high, federal workers were told they must set an example and take a smaller pay raise. At the start of the Reagan recession, the message was that the money wasn't available for the raise they deserved, the council said.

In the midst of a supposed recovery, the council said, the Administration's message is "we must cut your pay."

Evolution of Work Committee listed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work, which prepared the report titled "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," are:

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, chairman.

Kenneth T. Blaylock, president, Government Employees.

Legislative action needed

Cost rise, benefit cuts threat to health care

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO called for voluntary efforts and cost-containment legislation at the state and federal levels to keep down the rising cost of health care.

It stressed that the only way to assure all Americans access to affordable quality health care is through enactment of a comprehensive, universal national health care program.

"Until that goal is won, we will do everything in our power to resist erosion of benefits, control costs, and improve health services for all Americans," the Executive Council said in a statement.

Health coverage built up over the last three decades has been badly eroded, the council observed, noting that 35-million Americans today have no health insurance whatever.

And since 1982, the percentage of private health insurance plans with deductibles of $150 or more has risen from 9 to 38 percent, the council said.

Attempts to place cost controls on public programs such as Medicare have been ineffective and unfair, it pointed out. Congressional action two years ago requiring hospitals participating in Medicare to accept payment on a prospective basis failed to stop health cost inflation.

"Hospitals increased billing to private benefit plans to make up the lost revenue, and used the new law to eliminate jobs and hold down wages of hospital workers," the council said.

For these reasons, the AFL-CIO is urging Congress to enact a comprehensive national health care cost-containment program patterned after a proposal formulated by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.).

The Kennedy-Gephardt bill would provide incentives to states to develop their own cost-containment programs within federal guidelines. It also would remove incentives in the current reimbursement system to reduce costs through layoffs or reduction to part-time status of hospital workers.

The council urged state legislatures to follow the lead of New York, Florida and Massachusetts by including in cost-containment laws provisions to help finance health care for persons not protected by insurance.

It also called for state legislation to reduce the rate of increase in hospital capital expenditures, and to require health care providers to transmit information on costs and use of services to state agencies.

"Mandatory disclosure of such information is required to permit consumers to compare relative costs and quality of care and to identify efficient and cost-effective health care providers," the council said.

Need to know

"The growing trend toward profit-making health care chains makes it all the more essential that consumers have the information they need to monitor and evaluate the effects of this trend on access to services and quality of care."

The council urged affiliates and central bodies to take part in national, state and local health care coalitions.

In the face of employer pressures to cut out health care benefits and coverage, the union contract is proving an indispensable defense, the council noted.

"Benefit cuts successfully resisted in organized bargaining units are being imposed on workers who lack the protection of union contracts," the council said.

Unions are working to develop programs to improve the administration of health care plans to encourage cost-effective utilization of services, and reduce overall costs without reducing benefits, it observed. Some are working through joint labor-management committees, others are advancing their own initiatives at the bargaining table.

For the past three years, the AFL-CIO has participated in a national coalition on health care, composed of labor, business, insurers, and providers under the coordination of former Labor Sec. John Dunlop. One of the coalition's highest priorities has been to relieve the plight of jobless workers whose health care protection has been taken away.

South Korea warned on harassment of Kim

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on the South Korean government to end its harassment of Kim Dae Jung, the democratic opposition leader who recently returned to South Korea following two years' exile in the United States.

In last month's elections, South Korean opposition parties scored significant and surprising gains, the Executive Council noted in a statement.

"If the South Korean government responds by further curtailing the political activities of its critics, and particularly of Kim, it will exacerbate domestic conflict and suffer a loss of prestige in world opinion," the council observed.

It urged the U.S. government to make clear to Gen. Chun Doo Hwan's regime that the American people attach great importance to Kim's fate and to democratic politics in South Korea.

Foreign diplomats

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland confers with labor officials of foreign embassies during the Executive Council's winter meeting. He briefed the visitors on the federation's policy positions on international matters.

Kirkland, Donahue to expand regional meeting schedules

while participants are engaged in workshops led by federation staff members, Kirkland and Donahue will travel to other cities in the region on Saturday, March 23, for meetings and discussions with union members.

In his letter inviting participation in the conference, Kirkland noted that they will provide "another opportunity for a free and open exchange of ideas" among the officers of the federation, its state and local central bodies, representatives of affiliated unions and other trade unionists.

The purpose of the satellite meetings, he said, is to give local union members who do not have the opportunity to attend the regional conference a chance to express their views.

Kirkland said conferences in previous years had proved invaluable, and the ideas they produced had stimulated the development of new and productive programs for the labor movement.

The general format will be the same for all of the conferences. Each will open with a plenary session at 5 p.m., with Kirkland and Donahue taking part. This will be followed by a reception and at 9 p.m. by a program of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs. The second day will be devoted to five workshops on major issues confronting workers and their unions. The conference will conclude with a plenary session at 4 p.m.

The schedule is:

Mar. 22-23, Portland, Ore., to include Alaska, California, Hawaii, Nevada, Oregon and Washington.

Apr. 28-29, Providence, R.I,. to include Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont and Pennsylvania.

May 3-4, Salt Lake City, Utah, to include Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah and Wyoming.

May 17-18, Cherry Hill, N.J., to include Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia, New Jersey, New York and Virginia.

May 31-June 1, Indianapolis, to include Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin.

June 7-8, Nashville, Tenn., to include Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee and West Virginia.

July 13-14, Tulsa, Okla., to include Arkansas, Kansas, Louisiana, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Texas.

Social workers cited for dedicated service

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Executive Council urged AFL-CIO affiliates to join in recognizing the contributions of professional social workers during March in observing National Social Workers Month.

The federation expressed its support for "the work of professional social workers in helping Americans achieve lives of dignity and purpose."

The council cited the "vital service" provided to millions of workers and their families in helping them to confront problems that cause illness, family strife and marital discord.

Council attacks call for social security freeze

the Executive Council noted. One such example is a proposed one-year freeze on payments to participating physicians and hospitals.

Such a freeze threatens to jeopardize the entire Medicare program, the council warned.

It would disrupt the prospective payment system introduced just two years ago to control Medicare expenditures. Further, the council maintained, "middle-class Americans would also be hurt as providers try to shift costs to private insurance plans."

Still another byproduct might be refusal of doctors to accept Medicare patients.

Instead of this "arbitrary and capricious approach to Medicare cost containment," the AFL-CIO urged, Congress should pass the legislation introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) to encourage states to enact across-the-board health care cost-containment legislation applying to both public and private sectors.

Such legislation is "a necessary first step" toward the goal of comprehensive, universal national health care for all Americans, the AFL-CIO said.

The council promised the federation's continued cooperation with allies such as the National Council of Senior Citizens, the Committee on National Health Insurance and the Save Our Security coalition.

The job ahead

Labor's efforts will be to build continued support for social security and Medicare and to "resist every proposal" to weaken the programs or diminish their protection.

Other council actions were highlighted by the report of the Committee on the Evolution of Work, presented by its chairman, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. (Story, Page 1.)

Donahue also gave reports on the operations of the Internal Disputes Plan and on the federation's finances.

The council approved the designation of the late Rep. Carl Perkins (D-Ky.) to receive this year's Murray-Green-Meany Award. The recommendation was part of the report of the Community Services Committee presented by Vice President Alvin Heaps.

Other committee reports were given by Vice Presidents Charles H. Pillard on housing, Sol C. Chaikin on social security, J. C. Turner on occupational safety and health, Wayne E. Glenn on state and local central bodies, William H. Wynn on restrictive legislation, William W. Winpisinger on retirees, and Frederick O'Neal on civil rights.

Reports also were given by Vice President Murray H. Finley on the plans of the Martin Luther King Holiday Commission on which he serves, and by Vice President Patrick J. Campbell in support of efforts to establish a major diabetes research center at the University of Miami.

A new ad hoc committee on health care was appointed by Kirkland, with Vice President John J. Sweeney as chairman.

The council approved grants covering the budgets of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, the African-American Labor Center, and the following support groups: A. Philip Randolph Institute, Coalition of Labor Union Women, Concerned Seniors for Better Government, Frontlash, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, and the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Support given

Contributions were voted to No Greater Love, National Council of Negro Women, National Urban League, Consumer Federation of America, Coalition to Protect Social Security, The New Leader, Council on Economic Education, Southern Regional Conference, Conference on Economic Progress, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, National Urban Coalition, Fund for an Open Society, Consumer Energy Council of America, Full Employment Action Council, Center for National Policy, Workers Defense League, National Academy of Sciences, National Parks Foundation, National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, Religion & Labor Conference, Samuel Gompers Papers, National Low-Income Housing Coalition, National Housing Conference.

The next meeting of the council will be held May 7-9 in Washington.

Council asks continuation of Job Corps

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress should reject the Reagan Administration's "ill-conceived proposal" to eliminate the Job Corps, the Executive Council said.

Expressing its support for the Job Corps "because it works—and so do its graduates," the council called the Reagan proposed shutdown of the program "bad economics as well as bad social policy."

The statement pointed out that Job Corps programs operated by AFL-CIO affiliates "have proven to be well worth the effort. Today, thousands of union members are Job Corps graduates employed as painters, plasterers, cement masons, carpenters, bricklayers, operating engineers, clerks, cooks and auto mechanics."

For each dollar that was invested in these young Job Corps members, the U.S. Treasury receives back $1.45 the following year. "The Job Corps earns money for the federal government. Eliminating it will increase the federal deficit, not produce a savings," the statement said.

Youth joblessness

To contemplate destroying "one of the most successful youth programs" when unemployment for those ages 16 to 21 is 18.9 percent and for black youth is 42.1 percent is "disgraceful."

Today's youth represent the nation's future and ignoring the plight of the millions of youngsters who are "undereducated, unskilled and disadvantaged" will hurt the country, the council warned. "Unless we help them, many of these young men and women will haunt future generations as welfare burdens, criminals and members of a separate underground society."

It was recognition of this problem that prompted the federation affiliates to "join" the Job Corps at its inception more than two decades ago, the council stressed.

Latin Council president elected to full-time post

Henry L. Lacayo, director of the Auto Workers National Community Action Program, will assume the full-time presidency of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement on Apr. 1.

Lacayo, who is currently the LCLAA president, has been granted a leave of absence by the UAW to devote more time to LCLAA, the national Hispanic organization engaged in non-partisan political education and voter registration.

Prior to serving as the UAW national CAP director, Lacayo was administrative assistant to then-UAW President Leonard Woodcock, and assistant regional organizing director. He joined the UAW staff in 1972 after serving nine years as president of UAW Local 887 in Los Angeles.

Honoring Perkins

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Carl D. Perkins, the congressional champion of America's "have-nots" until his death last August, will be remembered by the AFL-CIO with this year's Murray-Green-Meany Award for humanitarian service.

The selection of Perkins was recommended by the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee and approved by the federation's Executive Council.

The Kentucky Democrat headed the House Education & Labor Committee for 17 of the 35 years he served in Congress, representing a rural and coal mining district. Community Services Committee Chairman Alvin E. Heaps noted his championship of such causes as child nutrition and school lunches, housing developments for older Americans and quality education for all children.

The award, which includes a medallion and a $5,000 grant, will be presented to the Perkins family at a dinner during the 1985 Community Services Conference to be held in Boston in June. The annual award memorializes William Green, Philip Murray and George Meany, who headed the AFL, the CIO and the merged federation.

Monetary Fund's conditions termed burden on workers

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The International Monetary Fund drew sharp criticism from the Executive Council for the hardships imposed on workers in countries that borrow from it, and are required to adhere to "economic conditionality" terms as a condition of the loan.

"Workers in debtor countries have borne the brunt of the hardship engendered by the IMF economic conditionality programs," the council charged.

"In many cases, they have been required to take direct wage cuts, in other cases, cost-of-living adjustments have been restricted or even prohibited."

The IMF was formed toward the end of World War II at a conference of the Allied Powers at Bretton Woods, N.H., that sought to restore global financial stability. Its primary goals are to promote monetary cooperation, currency stabilization, and expansion of international trade among the 148 countries that compromise its current membership.

To boost exports and reduce imports, the IMF often requires debtor countries to devalue their currency, resulting in increased domestic inflation and a reduction in real wages, the council observed.

Program adjustments

The IMF should encourage governments that it assists to make their adjustment programs more politically tolerable and effective in combating inflation and providing more revenue for repayment of public debt by a variety of means, the council urged.

To encourage economic growth, it said, wage cuts and excessive devaluation of the currency should be avoided.

"It is not possible to achieve such a balance and such growth as long as workers' wages are held to a small fraction of the selling price of goods and services. Nor can equity be achieved in the absence of a democracy in which free unions can bargain for the workers," it stressed.

Among its recommendations, the council urged the IMF to encourage debtor countries to improve their tax structures to make them more equitable. "Equally or more important, tax enforcement and tax collections should be improved," it said.

Trade balance

To promote a better balance of international trade and sustained growth, the IMF should explore methods of correcting trade imbalances with nations that have trade surpluses, the council urged.

It said the IMF should encourage major trading nations to get together and align currency values so as to guard against huge trade imbalances and worldwide recession.

Political strategies

Administrative committee of COPE, including AFL-CIO Executive Council members and political action officials of affiliated unions, takes an early look at the 1986 congressional elections when control of the Senate will be at stake. Of the 34 seats to be filled then, 22 are held by Republicans and 12 by Democrats.

Future needs emphasized in energy policy

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO renewed its call for a national energy policy to protect national security, improve productivity, enhance the quality of life and assure an adequate long-range energy supply in the future.

The Executive Council stressed in a statement that such a policy must recognize the importance of conservation, research and development of alternatives to oil and natural gas, and the environmentally safe use of coal, nuclear and other energy supplies.

Specific recommendations called for:

- Maintenance of a strong research, development and demonstration program for energy sources, including renewable sources such as solar energy as alternatives to oil and natural gas.
- Support for conservation programs, including the weatherization of low-income homes, schools, hospitals, and other state and local government buildings.
- Filling the nation's strategic petroleum reserve to meet the goal of one billion barrels in a reasonable time frame.
- Rejection by Congress of proposals to export Alaskan oil.
- Streamlining of the licensing procedure for nuclear power plants to end unnecessary delays in the siting and construction of nuclear plants while maintaining safety and environmental standards.
- Extension of the Price-Anderson Act insurance program for nuclear power plants beyond its current expiration date of August 1987. The program provides compensation to the public in the event of a nuclear power plant accident.
- The removal of unnecessary obstacles to the export of nuclear power plant components and fuel in conformance with the national non-proliferation policy.

Montana legislature rejects constitution convention call

A labor-opposed campaign to force the convening of a national constitutional convention to draw up a balanced budget amendment stalled in Montana but remains a threat in other states.

Montana's politically split House of Representatives rejected a "con-con" resolution, 55-45. All 50 Democrats and five Republicans voted against it.

An AFL-CIO Executive Council statement reiterated the labor movement's strong opposition to both the concept of a constitutional convention and the attempt to inject a dubious economic doctrine into the framework of American government.

Constitutional amendments are normally adopted by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate, followed by ratification by three-fourths of the states. But the Constitution also allows an alternative method, which has never been used, of bypassing Congress and initiating a constitutional amendment at a convention convened at the request of two-thirds of the states.

Thirty-two of the required 34 states have called for such a convention, mostly in resolutions passed in the 1970s when the drive launched by a conservative "taxpayers" group wasn't taken very seriously.

Drive blunted

Since concerned groups, including the AFL-CIO, turned a spotlight on the amendment drive, only a few states have been added to the convention call list. No new con-con resolutions were adopted last year. But neither did any state rescind a previously adopted resolution, as the AFL-CIO has urged.

In Montana, State AFL-CIO Executive Sec. James W. Murry said the vote in the legislature reflected the reciprocal benefits that labor's coalition-building emphasis has brought.

The statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned that a balanced budget constitutional amendment would force the nation "into an economic straitjacket."

The council warned that a rigid constitutional requirement would make it likely that recessions would worsen into depressions and subordinate the role of Congress to the monetary policy of the Federal Reserve or the interpretations of the courts.

Further, the Executive Council warned, the procedure proposed by the state resolutions raise the threat of "a runaway convention opening up the entire U.S. Constitution to any issue, no matter how extreme."

Bypassed in recovery

Labor asks safety net for long-term jobless

Unions looked to Congress to preserve a safety net for long-unemployed workers who have been bypassed in the nation's spotty economic recovery.

A House Ways & Means subcommittee is considering labor-backed legislation to extend the federal supplemental compensation (FSC) program beyond Mar. 31, its scheduled expiration date. FSC, launched in 1982, provides from eight to 14 weeks of federal benefits for persons still jobless after their state-provided payments have run out.

The Reagan Administration is adamantly opposed to extending FSC, and it will be an uphill fight to keep the federal program alive. If Congress doesn't act, more than 300,000 workers will have their benefit payments cut off at the end of this month.

AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten reminded the panel that economic recovery is still "invisible" in many parts of the country. FSC is for practical purposes the only compensation program left for tne long-term unemployed, since the state-federal program of 13 weeks of extended benefits now functions only in the most severe recessions.

Changes needed

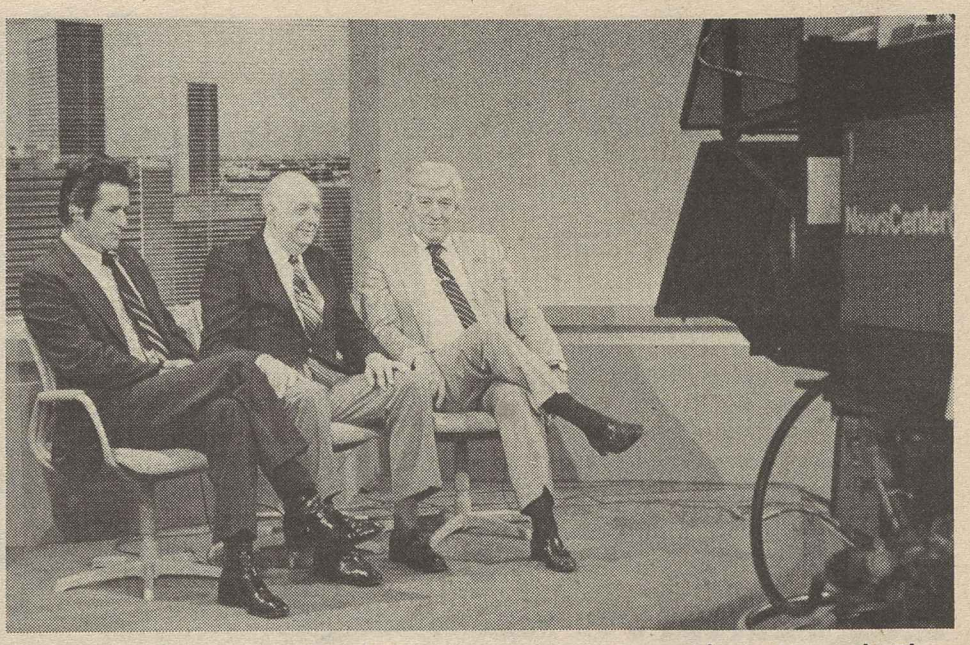
McGlotten outlined the AFL-CIO's proposals for permanent improvement in the unemployment compensation system and urged that any "trigger" mechanisms to kick in a program be based on a state's actual unemployment rate, not the limited insured rate.

"The time to act is now," McGlotten urged, "and not when we are in the midst of another recession."

In other testimony at the House hearings:

● Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch sharply challenged Administration claims that extending the duration of benefits merely prolongs the length of unemployment.

With many steel mills closed, recovery in other segments of the economy isn't strong enough to provide the needed jobs, he said. He cited an average of 171 unemployed workers competing for each new job opening in Youngstown, Ohio, and 96 in Gary, Ind.



From his office in Pittsburgh, Lynch can see an idled steel mill that once employed 6,000 workers. And in nearby Duquesne, site of another closed mill, "one can see people picking through garbage for scraps."

● Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden told the panel that two-thirds of UAW members who were victims of plant closings in the independent auto parts supplier industry are still out of work, with the average length of joblessness more than 18 months. Many had used up all their savings and were without health insurance.

Warden noted that last year only 34 percent of unemployed Americans received any jobless benefits.

● The Rev. Charles V. Bergstrom, a Lutheran church official testifying for the Full Employment Action Council, noted that the current unemployment rate of over 7 percent would have been considered "intolerable" not many years ago. "The nation's threshold of economic pain seems to have crept tragically upward," he said.

A new study by the council put "real unemployment" during 1984 at 13.6 percent, counting discouraged workers and persons who could only find part-time work. It termed the recovery claim "an illusion."

TV camera focuses on Hatch Act targets, union presidents Kenneth Blaylock, Moe Biller and Vincent Sombrotto on NBC network's Today Show.

Kirkland denounces misuse of Hatch Act against unions

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed labor's outrage at the Administration's prosecution of leaders of three federal-sector unions on Hatch Act charges and pledged the federation's support in challenging "misuse" of the law.

Charges of the violations—based largely on election endorsements of Walter Mondale's presidential candidacy—were brought against Presidents Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees, Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers and Moe Biller of the Postal Workers. The charges were filed by the special counsel of the government's Merit Systems Protection Board after the three union presidents had rejected his ultimatum to resign their government employment status in order to avoid prosecution.

All three are on unpaid leave of absence from federal or postal jobs while serving in union office, retaining retirement rights and the right to reclaim their former jobs. The government contends they continue to be subject to the Hatch Act ban on political activity by government workers despite their leave-without-pay status.

The Hatch Act was intended to protect federal and postal workers from political pressure from their supervisors, Kirkland noted. The prosecution of the union leaders turns the intent of the law "upside down," he said and stretches it "beyond all rational limits."

Kirkland charged that the "obvious intent" of the prosecutions is to limit the right of union leaders in the federal sector to serve their members.

Will contest

The three union leaders, interviewed on the NBC network's Today Show, made clear that they will resist the charges in any administrative or court proceedings, and will continue to exercise their responsibilities to speak out on issues affecting their members.

"I don't think any of the three of us look at this as a personal attack on us," Biller said. "It's an attack on the men and women we're privileged to represent."

Sombrotto termed the prosecutions an attempt "to muzzle free speech."

Blaylock said the "kangaroo court process" appeared designed "to protect the policymakers from the workers" rather than protect workers from political pressures.

OSHA rebuffed on illegal firing

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration illegally fired its Denver regional admistrator in September 1982, an administrative law judge for the Merit Systems Protection Board ruled.

ALJ Edward J. Reidy ordered OSHA to reinstate Curtis A. Foster and awarded him "back pay and other benefits" that could total more than $150,000.

Foster was dismissed after declining a forced transfer to a lower paying job in Washington. OSHA claimed its action centered on Foster's improper hiring of four construction inspectors in 1979 and misuse of travel funds.

In a sworn deposition filed as part of his appeal, Foster said his troubles began after two porcelain plants owned by the Adolph Coors Co. were removed by his superiors from a priority health inspection list in November 1981.

The Coors family has contributed heavily to conservative causes and has close links with Reagan Administration officials.

After one of the Coors plants was inadvertently visited by an OSHA inspector without a court warrant in early 1982, Foster testified, then-OSHA Director Thorne G. Auchter reprimanded him and stressed that the Coors family was "influential." OSHA later dismissed citations for 10 serious and two willful violations of safety rules found in the inspection and cancelled $12,600 in fines.

Testimony at the hearings indicated that Auchter and an aide had met with Coors executives before acting against Foster.

The administrative law judge, however, said there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of partisan political consideration or political pressure was the cause of Foster's demotion.

As for the stated reason for demoting Foster, Judge Reidy found that OSHA had no valid grounds for disciplinary action.

Foster violated no law or regulation, acted with good intent and in the agency's best interests in arranging for the hiring and training of qualified construction safety specialists and probably saved the government money through some red-tape cutting procedures that were the grounds for this demotion.

In a telephone interview, Foster said the decision vindicated his actions as regional OSHA administrator. He acknowledged that the Coors link was difficult to prove, but there certainly were "an awful lot of coincidences" involving Coors and his dismissal.

Focus on Congress

Machinists President William Winpisinger opens the IAM's annual legislative conference in the nation's capital. The two-day meeting included mock congressional hearings conducted by delegates on pressing issues affecting IAM members, including foreign trade, tax justice and the economy.

Machinists re-elect Winpisinger, Glover

President William W. Winpisinger and Sec.-Treas. Eugene Glover of the Machinists have been re-elected without opposition to new four-year terms in a union-wide referendum. Also elected were eight incumbent vice presidents and one new vice president.

The incoming vice president is James Malott of IAM Local 990 in Kansas City. Malott, an international representative for the past four years, will succeed Stanley Jensen, who is retiring. The new terms of office begin July 1.

Union role urged in alcohol education

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Union and community programs to deal with alcohol abuse were urged by the AFL-CIO, rather than advertising restrictions "that fail to address fundamental problems."

An Executive Council statement reiterated labor's concern with the devastation caused by alcoholism in family life, in the workplace and on the highways.

It directed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services to continue to work with affiliates and other concerned organizations to:

● Encourage on-the-job programs for treatment and prevention of alcohol abuse.

● Promote development of community treatment and rehabilitation facilities.

● Educate union members and their families about alcohol abuse.

● Train union counselors to offer guidance and referral to persons with alcohol-related problems.

● Join with communities in sponsoring institutes on alcoholism.

Studies have shown that advertising "has little or no impact" on alcohol abuse, the statement noted. It called for rejection of proposals to abolish radio and television advertising of alcoholic beverages or require "counter-advertising."

Legislative message

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber keynotes the UAW's Community Action Program (CAP) conference in Washington with a call for a labor-Democratic Party program keyed to jobs, prosperity, growth, opportunity and fairness. The union's annual legislative conference in Washington included workshops for the 1,000 delegates addressed by members of Congress. Bieber renewed the call for quotas on Japanese imports to save U.S. jobs.

Buyers urged to demand grapes with UFW's label

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Executive Council endorsed a national campaign urging consumers to look for the Farm Workers label before buying table grapes.

The campaign, coordinated by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., would be carried out through state and local central labor bodies, the labor press, and other means.

The campaign is in support of UFW efforts to underscore appalling work conditions in non-union California vineyards and fields and to generate support for decent collectively bargained wages and conditions. The UFW recently launched a boycott of non-union grapes.

In a statement, the council also condemned the union-busting and illegal activities of those California growers who refuse to recognize the legal rights of their employees to vote for a union and bargain collectively for fair wages and decent working conditions.

The council deplored the failure of Gov. George Deukmejian to enforce the state's 1975 Agricultural Labor Relations Act, charging that the increase in employer disregard of the law is directly traceable to this lack of enforcement.

Under his administration, the council said, newly appointed members of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board have reversed longstanding policy decisions handed down by previous boards.

Enforcement has been curtailed, the ALRB's budget has been gutted and staff levels sharply cut, and many services that helped farm workers to exercise their rights under the law have been discontinued, the council observed.

In addition, organizing among farm workers and attempts to hold fair and proper representation elections have been hampered by threats, intimidation, and in some cases violence against union supporters.

Thousands of UFW members still are owed back pay from judgments against employers in cases decided by the ALRB. Meanwhile, employers are refusing to recognize the UFW as the legally certified bargaining agent for thousands of union members in the vineyards and fields, and they are refusing to negotiate contracts.

Some 36,000 UFW members who have voted for representation by the union have been unable to negotiate contracts with California vineyards and farms, the council said.

Frontlash role stressed in Youth Year activities

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Executive Council called on affiliates to cooperate with the federation's Frontlash organization in International Youth Year (IYY) activities.

The United Nations and the U.S. government designated 1985 as IYY to stimulate public discussion of the right of young people to participate in the decision-making processes of society.

The council statement underscored the sharp contrast between the Reagan Administration's actions and its words. While declaring its support for the IYY's special focus on youth, the Administration has proposed a subminimum wage for younger workers, the elimination of the Job Corps training programs for disadvantaged youth and ending financial aid for hundreds of thousands of middle-class college students.

The council urged cooperation with Frontlash in nominating young trade unionists to represent them in the IYY conferences and forums, plus development of educational programs focusing on the problems of young workers.

Paperworkers, OCAW draft proposal for merger action

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The executive boards of the Paperworkers and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have approved a merger document, and conventions of the two unions will vote on its acceptance later this year.

The announcement, made during the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting here, came after the OCAW board voted to approve the agreement. The Paperworkers board had approved it earlier last month.

It will take a two-thirds vote of approval by the OCAW convention delegates to pass a merger resolution at the union's convention in Denver in August.

If the OCAW delegates adopt the document, the Paperworkers will vote at a special convention in St. Louis in December. The effective date of the proposed merger would be next Jan. 1.

The merged union would be called the United Paper, Energy & Chemical Workers International Union and be headquartered in the Paperworkers building in Nashville, Tenn.

The new union would have a membership of 285,000 and would be headed by Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn. UPIU Sec.-Treas., John Defee would remain in the same post in the new union. OCAW President Joseph M. Misbrener would become the senior executive vice president and OCAW Sec.-Treas. Michael Ricigliano the executive vice president, according to Gordon Brehm, executive assistant to Glenn.

Merger talks between the two unions were stepped up last July, but much of the preliminary work had already been covered in earlier discussions in 1981.

Real wages drop as consumer costs continue to rise

Workers' "real" earnings declined eight-tenths of 1 percent in January, after climbing six-tenths of 1 percent a month earlier.

It was the largest over-the-month slide since last October, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, and resulted from a four-tenths of 1 percent decrease in average hourly earnings and a three-tenths of 1 percent drop in average weekly hours.

Earnings were dampened further by a two-tenths of 1 percent rise in consumer prices as measured by the government's two consumer price indexes—CPI-U and CPI-W.

Over the year, real average weekly earnings were down a full percentage point. BLS reported production and nonsupervisory workers in January averaged weekly earnings of $171.57 in 1977 dollars, down $1.75 from the January 1984 level.

With its release of January data on consumer prices, BLS introduced a revised CPI-W using a "rental equivalence" housing component like the one in CPI-U. The old series of CPI-W, which calculates homeownership on an asset basis, will be discontinued in July.

In the January CPI-W, as revised, food prices rose two-tenths of 1 percent.

Shelter costs, consisting almost entirely of rents and rental equivalence, were up three-tenths of 1 percent in January and 1 percent over the year. Utilities and public services rose six-tenths of 1 percent, and new car prices and public transportation costs were up four-tenths of 1 percent.

Unions battle assaults on civil service

George Gould reminded the panel that "real people" would be the victims of the Administration budget proposals:

"It is a retired letter carrier with 34 years of service, like Joe Bucciero of St. Petersburg, Fla., whose COLA would be cut.

"It is the future of active carrier Chris Slocum, a mother of three small children, of Yakima, Wash., who is endangered if the retirement contract is broken.

"And it is the health care benefits of active letter carrier and father of five, Dan Rupp of Cleveland, whose benefits would be drastically reduced."

● Legislative Counsel Ed Murphy, testifying for a Service Employees affiliate, the National Association of Government Employees, said the Administration has "thrown down the gauntlet to federal workers" by demanding that they shoulder a big share of the deficit reduction burden on top of past rounds of sacrifices.

He charged that "political expediency" was the motivation for the budget's "unprecedented and destructive cuts in federal pay and benefits."

Earned benefits

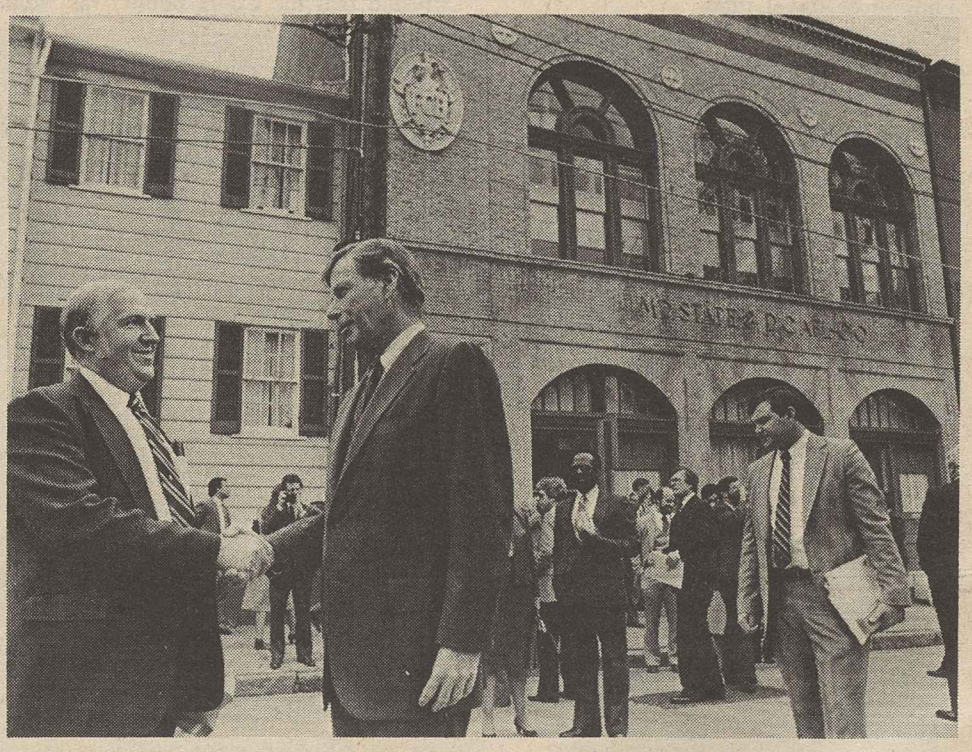
Blaylock, who is president of the Public Employee Dept. and an AFL-CIO vice president as well as president of the AFGE, stressed that the benefits the Administration wants to cut back were "earned" by federal workers.



As for salary levels, he noted, the Pay Comparability Act passed in 1970 was supposed to have adjusted federal salaries each year to maintain parity with the private sector.

But with comparability studies regularly disregarded, federal pay levels have trailed significantly behind every major indicator. The percentage rise since 1970 was substantially less than the increase in average wage, inflation, military pay and social security, Blaylock noted.

The Reagan-appointed chairman of the Advisory Committee on Federal Pay, Martin L. Duggan, agreed that "federal pay increases, measured by either private wage or price gains, have not kept pace."

Duggan also noted that increased employee contributions to health plans and Medicare have further reduced paychecks.

Departing from the Administration policy, Duggan said cutting federal pay is the equivalent of imposing a tax on government workers but on no one else.

Historic headquarters

At dedication of the new Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO headquarters, President Edward R. Lamon welcomes Maryland Gov. Harry Hughes, who cut the ceremonial ribbon. The refurbished 1890 building, which has been designated a historical structure, is across the street from the governor's mansion in Annapolis. Some 100 state legislators and elected officials were at the ceremony.

Facing Up to Change

THE NATURE of work, the organization of the workplace, and the size, location, composition and background of the workforce have been changing at an especially rapid rate in recent years and that process of change is continuing unabated.

Given the magnitude and velocity of these destabilizing changes, the labor movement has demonstrated a notable resiliency. Unions represent over 20 million working men and women in the United States. Organized labor remains a vital force for progress in this nation; no serious observer denies that unions have played and continue to play a civilizing, humanizing and democratizing role in American life.

But despite their accomplishments, unions find themselves behind the pace of change. During the 1960s and 1970s, the American workforce grew in an unprecedented way, whereas the labor movement's membership remained static as gains made in organizing were offset due to job losses in basic industries. In the 1980s, union membership has shown a decline in absolute numbers as well as in percentage terms.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council created the Committee on the Evolution of Work as part of its efforts to assess the significance of the changes in the work environment for the federation and its affiliates. To do so, it is first necessary to review the labor movement's premises.

UNIONS ARE, first and foremost, organizations seeking to improve the lives of those they represent by improving their conditions of work and by insuring respect for their dignity as workers.

Organized labor believes that each worker is entitled to a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. That pay should include a share in the profits a worker helps to create and, thus, unions seek a larger share of those profits than "market forces" might dictate. And we recognize that those profits can only be created in a well-managed enterprise.

The labor movement also has sought to improve the conditions of life of its members by improving the conditions of life for all through political action and legislative efforts.

It is against this background of these basic and unchanging principles that we review the numerous and complex factors which have created the current situation confronting workers.

The United States—indeed every industrialized nation—is undergoing a scientific, technological, economic revolution every bit as significant as the industrial revolution of the nineteenth century. There is now a world economy in which workers in underdeveloped nations, working at subsistence wages, are producing the most sophisticated goods, and even services, for more developed nations.

Technological advances have eliminated scores of jobs, altered the requirements of an equal number, and created entirely new jobs. The success of the labor movement in improving wages and working conditions has had its effect on what workers see as their right, on what workers seek in further improvement, and on what employers recognize as the minimum conditions they must offer.

ALL OF THOSE developments are affecting labor unions throughout the industrialized world; none warrants prophecies of doom and despair regarding the future of labor.

Such prophecies were ventured 50 years ago, after American unions in the 1920s and 1930s had suffered serious setbacks and the number of unionized workers had declined dramatically; some predicted the demise of the labor movement at that time. In fact the reverse occurred: trade unionists of that era developed approaches attuned to their situation which caught the allegiance of a generation of workers and organized labor experienced a period of remarkable growth.

We are confident that the labor movement has the capacity to continue the never-ending process of renewal and regeneration that has enabled and will enable unions to remain the authentic voice of workers and their chosen vehicle for expressing their will.

Domestic spending cuts no quick cure for deficits

By Press Associates, Inc.

Much has been spoken and written about the nation's massive federal deficit—its threat to the economy and its causes and proposed cures.

As President Reagan tells it, his record deficits —now approaching $200 billion a year—are the result of too much spending on government programs. He often accuses Congress of failing to give him all the domestic spending cuts he wanted. He portrays social program spending as spiraling out of control even after the drastic cutbacks since 1981.

Reagan also blames his Democratic predecessors and a "spendthrift" Congress for his deficit dilemma even though the deficits accumulated during his Administration nearly equal the total of deficit spending by every administration beginning with George Washington.

The cure for the deficits, Reagan said in presenting his fiscal 1986 budget plan to Congress, is even more drastic cuts in domestic spending on student loans, housing, Medicare, Medicaid, school lunches, Amtrak, farm support programs, the Job Corps, and other vital programs.

Realistic remedies

However, the real causes and the proper cures for the nation's red ink hemorrhage lie far afield from those cultivated by the White House. Organized labor and other groups have been honest about the deficit's causes and, for the past five years, have proposed remedies which are both fair and realistic.

The Service Employees recently examined the deficit and the Administration's fiscal year 1986 budget plan. Its report included these findings:

- Federal spending on domestic programs is not "out of control" as Reagan claims. The year before he took office, spending on these programs was 15.7 percent of the nation's gross national product (GNP), about the same level as in 1976. Domestic spending since has dropped to 14.3 percent of GNP.
- Since 1981, spending on domestic programs, other than self-financed social security and Medicare, has plummeted from 55.6 percent of the federal budget to 40.8 percent while military spending rocketed from 31 percent of the budget to 39.4 percent. Also, interest on the deficit-driven national debt has risen from 13.4 percent to 19.7 percent of all federal spending, or to $198 billion.
- The current $222 billion deficit is a direct result of Reagan's policies: cuts in corporate taxes and taxes paid by wealthy families combined with massive increases in defense spending. Since Reagan took office, the deficit has ballooned from 2.7 percent of the nation's GNP to 5.7 percent, more than doubling the drain on national resources.
- Reagan's budget plan for fiscal 1986, often publicized as a spending "freeze," would cut $38.7 billion from domestic programs while boosting military spending by $32.4 billion, continuing the Reagan pattern of massive spending shifts.
- Repeal of the 1981 corporate Accelerated Cost Recovery System and investment tax credits would raise $22.4 billion in revenue, about two-thirds of Reagan's proposed cuts in domestic spending. Because of these and other corporate tax giveaways, seven major corporations paid zero or less in taxes during 1981-1983 despite healthy profits.
- A freeze on defense spending would save $32.4 billion. Holding Pentagon spending to a 3 percent real growth rate would save $14 billion.

The SEIU's analysis noted that despite campaign promises to the contrary, "President Reagan has handed Congress budget proposals that would tackle the deficit by cutting programs that benefit workers, support a middle class, stabilize state and local governments, and provide at least assistance to impoverished and disabled families."

Congress, the report noted, can trim the deficit without cutting domestic programs by plugging corporate tax loopholes and reducing the growth of the gold-plated Pentagon budget.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Reagan Budget Cuts Aimed at Working America

Congress Waiting to Hear From Voters, Those Who Hesitate May be the Losers

Canvassing of Capital Hill by the lobbyists of AFL-CIO unions has revealed that most lawmakers are waiting to see which way the wind is blowing at home, before they make up their minds about the massive budget cuts being proposed by the Reagan Administration. This means the next few weeks could be critical for most American families.

The Reagan cuts tear at the very fabric of working America, slashing deeply into training and employment programs, aid to education, college tuition, unemployment protections, economic development programs for cities and towns, federal pay, veterans programs, farm programs, medicare and medicaid -- programs that help middle-class Americans.

At its February Executive Council meeting, the AFL-CIO struck out at this cruely unfair scheme, and offered instead a more realistic and humane way of trimming the federal deficit. Its proposal: Limit defense spending, enact new employment programs to increase the tax base, and plug the huge loopholes for the rich and wealthy included in the 1981 Reagan tax act. This would come very close to generating the $50 billion in savings that Congress will be shooting for.

You can help your senator or representative make up his or her mind on this vital matter, with a letter outlining cuts you oppose. It's much easier to influence Congress now than after they are committed. A breakdown of major proposed Reagan cuts for fiscal 1986 and how they can affect you are listed below:

Medical Care and Nutrition -- These programs, like Medicare, Medicaid and child nutrition were designed to aleviate suffering among the elderly and poor. Now the President wants to cut back Medicare, Medicaid and AFDC a total of $5.33 billion.

Federal Employees -- Our federal workers have already been called upon to bear more than their fair share of sacrifice. Now they are asked once again to make up for government fiscal ineptitude. The proposed 5% pay cut for 1987 alone will cost them $1.8 billion.

Education -- Here Reagan would cut deeply into federal aid to education, especially the college tuition loans on which so many families rely to give their children a better start. Total cuts to college student aid, elementary and secondary school programs and impact aid, $962 million.

Jobs and Training -- Cutbacks are planned in the federal training and employment effort, including total elimination of the Jobs Corps and national training programs. This would raise new barriers against young people, displaced workers and others seeking to fulfill their potential and achieve rewarding careers. Total cuts $118 million in fiscal 1986.

Veterans -- Here the President wants to repudiate the promises we made to those citizens who answered the call to bear arms in defense of their country. The President now wants to institute a "means" test for some veterans and cut VA health care by $414 million.

Unemployment Protections -- Here Reagan wants to eliminate outright any unemployment insurance protection for long-term unemployed who continue to suffer high levels of joblessness.

Transportation and Economic Development -- The President wants to cut out entirely revenue sharing for local governments, Amtrak, the Economic Development Administration, and make severe cutbacks in Export-Import Bank loans, community development, housing and mass transit programs, all of which are designed to foster economic growth. Total cuts from revenue sharing, CDBG, UDAG, urban mass transit, highway construction, water projects, Amtrak and Export-Import Bank are $6.05 billion.

Farm Families -- While America's farming families are enduring some of the roughest economic times in recent memory, the Reagan Adminstration would cut vital farm programs and threaten the very survival of our family farms. Cuts in rural electrification, rural housing, rural water and sewer, farm credit, crop insurance and price subsidies would total $7.6 billion.

These programs have been developed over the years to help middle-class America provide for its own needs, to safeguard the health and dignity of the old, to promote the educational and occupational aspirations of the young, and to protect the poor.

Use the letter provided below or write your own and send one to your two senators and to your representative in Washington telling them how important these programs are to you. Address them to the U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515 and the United States Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.

Dear _____:

I'm against the Reagan Administration's budget cuts because they would balance the budget on the backs of the elderly, poor, veterans, and other working Americans.

I urge instead that you consider raising the taxes of corporations and the wealthy. They benefited from the 1981 tax cut.

Sincerely,

AFL-CIO Launches Fight Against 'Unfair New Tax' on Benefits

The AFL-CIO unequivocally reasserted its opposition to any plan to tax the hard-earned benefits of Americans and their families and heap new burdens on the already besieged middle class.

In a resolution adopted at its February Executive Council meeting that took direct aim at the issue of life-support benefits taxation, the Council declared: "We firmly oppose proposals to pile unfair new taxes on middle-class Americans who are already bearing the major share of the tax burden.

"Some particularly pernicious schemes, already being advanced, would tax such employer-paid benefits as group life and health insurance, pension programs, education assistance, prepaid legal assistance and child care, as well as unemployment compensation and worker compensation.

"Health insurance plans now protect more than 90 percent of all full-time workers, both union and non-union. These benefits meet specific national economic and social goals. They are not frivolous 'perks'. The imposition of such taxes might well en-courage employers to seek to freeze or revoke these and other benefits, undermining life-support systems."

The Council also noted that "to the extent that the Bradley-Gephardt 'Fair Tax' and Treasury proposals move toward getting the poor off the tax rolls, putting corporations and the wealthy back on, and reducing the form-filling and record-keeping chores of most people, those proposals recognize the need for tax justice. As these proposals are re-drafted, we shall carefully study their various provisions to determine whether the final product is truly fair to middle-class Americans."

Safety, trade head legislative agenda of IUD conference

By Candice Johnson

Delegates to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s annual legislative conference sent a message to Congress that now is "a time for action" on trade, the federal budget and workplace safety and health.

More than 1,200 trade unionists representing the 17 IUD affiliates assembled in Washington for the two-day conference to discuss critical concerns of workers and take their case to Capitol Hill.

IUD President Howard Samuel said the central issues before the conference are "vital to all of us—trade, plant closings and workplace safety." Samuel outlined a legislative program that includes a ban on the import of the cancer-causing chemical benzidine, legislation to "set up more effective defenses" against unfair trade practices, protection for workers and their communities in the case of plant closings, and a program to protect workers against toxic chemicals in the workplace.

On workplace safety, Samuel noted that while the Occupational Safety & Health Act had brought about some improvements over its 15 years, millions of workers are still suffering injury and illness.

"The tragedy is that our government knows and industry knows — only the worker doesn't know" about the risks and hazards posed by substances used on the job, Samuel declared. He urged delegates to continue their lobbying efforts as labor's program moves through Congress.

House hearings

Samuel and leaders of several IUD affiliates presented the case for trade law modernization and enforcement at hearings of a House Energy & Commerce subcommittee headed by Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) and scheduled to coincide with the legislative conference. (Story, Page 2)

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, addressing conference participants at an opening day luncheon, urged them to "make it clear to every legislator in Washington and your home state capitals that we're watching, monitoring, measuring and taking stock—and that we'll make our judgments at the next election time based on that analysis—not on the basis of how much stroking we get."

He added, "We don't let our employers get away with that; we can't let legislators get away with it either."

Donahue observed that labor has spent "a lot of years and a lot of effort in trying to elect representatives and senators whose philosophy seems to match ours. It's time we spent as much time and effort being sure that they live up to that philosophy in their voting, in their committee work, in speeches, in the work of their offices and staff, in their support for workers' issues."

Commenting on the recent report by the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work, which he chaired, Donahue said it isn't a "blueprint for the future" in the traditional sense. "Rather, it's intended to provoke thought and discussion on all issues confronting our unions and to stimulate the boundless energies and ideas of the hundreds of thousands of trade union leaders and activists across the country."

"In my view, most importantly," Donahue said, "it speaks to our need to increase members' participation in their unions and to ensure that they are educated, not just in its history and past but in its future, and to ensure that they play

Reagan halts auto curb, import tide keeps rising

Trade deficit up 28 percent

By James M. Shevis

America's $10.3-billion foreign trade deficit in January—up 28 percent from the previous month—"is a reminder that the trade problem is worsening instead of improving," the AFL-CIO warned.

The continuing flow of job-gutting imports swamped the country's best monthly export performance in more than three years. The Commerce Dept. attributed the deterioration to the overvalued U.S. dollar and further growth in domestic demand.

Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald noted that the value of the dollar surged nearly 10 percent between the beginning of the year and the end of February.

"This will lead to even further worsen-

Unions warn of job losses

President Reagan's retreat on voluntary quotas for Japanese auto imports will cause further job losses, unions in the industry charged.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber and Electronic Workers President William Bywater warned that American workers and their communities will pay the price for the Administration's decision to let the Voluntary Restraint Agreement with Japan expire on Mar. 31.

"While the decision will have very slight impact on car prices paid by consumers," Bieber said, "the entire nation will pay a steep price in terms of the likely loss of 200,000 jobs in auto and supplier industries, in terms of damage to the tax base and service employment in auto-producing communities, and in terms

Reagan veto kills debt relief plan for family farmers

Congress voted emergency assistance to financially strapped family farmers but lacked the two-thirds majority needed to override President Reagan's veto.

The effort to prevent foreclosures and advance farmers credit to plant a spring crop was spurred by the depression-like calamity that has afflicted the grain-growing and corn-raising states—and the angry response of the victims.

Some 14,000 farmers gathered in Ames, Iowa, for a protest meeting called by a coalition of rural organizations, including groups that have been allied with the labor movement. Other farm delegations travelled to Washington to lobby for emergency aid, including the entire South Dakota legislature.

Against this grass-roots outpouring, Senate Republican leaders were unable to keep their majority intact. Significantly, four of the eight Republicans who broke ranks to vote with the Democrats for the credit assistance measure were farm state sen-

Copper strikers: 'We're not leaving'

By David L. Perlman

The labor movement's solidarity with striking Phelps Dodge Corp. copper workers and their families spanned the continent, stretching from an overflow fundraiser at AFL-CIO headquarters to the picket lines maintained in Arizona by members of 13 unions.

It was a two-way message.

"The AFL-CIO will stand shoulder-to-shoulder with these brothers and sisters as long as it takes to win," Federation President Lane Kirkland told union supporters gathered to see the premiere of a film on their 20-month strike.

"This is a fight against corporate greed," Kirkland said, "a fight against union busting" and "every trade unionist is a part of it."

The response came from Primo Martinez, a Phelps Dodge striker and an officer of Steelworkers Local 616 in Morenci, Ariz.

Determined

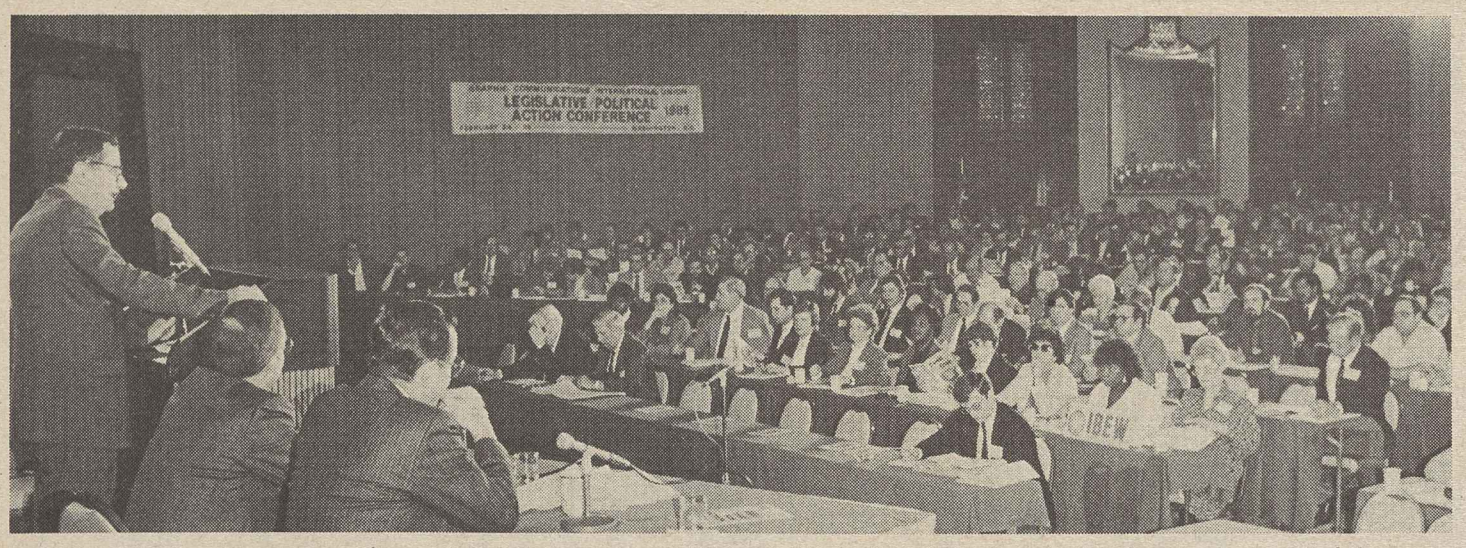
The union members, who have been on strike since July 1983, will stay out "as long as we have the support of the labor movement," Martinez said.

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams, whose union represents the largest group of strikers at the four Phelps Dodge properties in Arizona and one in Texas, said the unions involved "are not leaving" until an honorable settlement is reached. The struggle will continue, Williams pledged, in every arena available—from the picket lines to corporate boardrooms.



The Steelworkers have taken the strike to Wall Street, with the cooperation of unions and pension funds that have made clear that they don't want their assets propping up a union-busting corporation.

Every trade unionist has a stake in the struggle to assure that "America's workers will not be starved out," Kirkland said. The solidarity demonstrated every day on the Phelps Dodge picket lines is what the Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel spells out IUD's legislative agenda for conference delegates.

Labor panel cites toll of lost jobs as 'torrent' of imports flood U.S.

The United States is the 97-pound weakling in the rough world of international trade and a muscle-building course is long overdue, a panel of union leaders asserted at House hearings.

Their testimony, before an Energy & Commerce subcommittee headed by Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), came during the Industrial Union Dept.'s legislative conference. The focus of the hearings was the cause and effect of the nation's huge trade deficit.

These are some of the points they made:

● IUD President Howard D. Samuel said the "usually mythical" savings to consumers from unrestrained imports must be balanced against the very real costs of unemployment resulting from the destruction of an industry.

"There are still some economists around who seem to think that a 55-year-old sewing machine operator in New York City can pack her bags and head for Silicon Valley to take a job as a computer programmer," Samuel noted.

Other nations protect their economic interests without apology, he observed. Why should the United States be the only exception?

● Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams noted that most of this country's economic growth of the past two years has been "soaked up by the torrent of imports that have flooded the American market." Economic recovery has "bypassed" steel, "and left us with continuing high unemployment."

Williams noted that steel imports accounted for about 13 percent of the American market in 1974 and have doubled over 10 years to more than 26 percent. During that period, employment in basic steel fell from 400,000 to under 200,000.

● Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman said there were 204,000 fewer workers in the textile and apparel industries at the start of this year than in 1980. Last year, he noted, 89 shoe factories in the United States gave up the fight against imports and closed.

The Administration has been reluctant to take remedial action against unfair trade policies by developing nations because of their debtor status, "yet with our mounting trade and deficit budgets, we are becoming the world's largest debtor nation." When it comes to trade retaliation, "as our trading partners know, we are a paper tiger."

● Auto Workers President Owen Bieber said abandonment of the voluntary restraint agreement with Japan threatens "long-term, irreversible damage to the American economy."

Bieber urged retaining VRA "until the yen and the dollar return to a fair balance." The existing imbalance, he said, "provides Japanese automakers with a huge cost advantage that overshadows much of the efforts made to improve U.S. competitiveness."

Ineffective

● Ladies' Garment Workers Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur said neither the Multifiber Arrangement (MFA) nor bilateral agreements have prevented the "steady erosion" of the U.S. apparel industry. Since the MFA was agreed to, the import share of the apparel market has climbed from 21 percent in 1973 to 50 percent last year.

He noted that two-thirds of women's apparel imports last year came from four countries—Hong Kong, with a $1.18 an hour wage rate, Taiwan at 57 cents an hour, South Korea at 63 cents, and China at the equivalent of only 16 cents.

Mazur said importers get around quotas by shifting production to other countries and falsifying country-of-origin labels.

● Machinists President William W. Winpisinger pointed out that new products that were made possible by U.S. inventions are increasingly being produced overseas for the American market. He said joint ventures with foreign firms can be profitable for industry executives and shareholders, but the losers are U.S. workers and their communities.

Winpisinger urged an overdue "measure of reality and fairness" in the rules governing international trade relations.

U.S. goods barred

● James B. Booe, executive vice president of the Communications Workers, noted that nations that have expressed concern about "protectionist" actions by the United States have no hesistancy themselves in utilizing non-tariff barriers to keep out U.S. goods.

Booe complained of weak bargaining in past trade talks by U.S. negotiators, some of whom, he pointed out, have since gone on to represent foreign clients.

"We hope Congress will deny the President new negotiating authority and press for enforcement of existing laws," he said.

● Electronic Workers President William H. Bywater said the United States, with "the most open market in the world," has been swamped with "subsidized, dumped and targeted goods."

IUE members have lost their jobs through the virtually total destruction of the radio and black-and-white television industries, a decline of more than two-thirds in color television manufacturing, and jobs lost in auto parts production.

The United States can no longer make economic and foreign policy without regard to the impact on trade, Bywater stressed.

IUD delegates press safety, trade issues

their individual role in building that future and making it successful."

Among congressional leaders who addressed the delegates were House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.), Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.), who spoke at the luncheon on the second day, and Rep. Frank Guarini (D-N.J.), a cosponsor of the trade reform bill, who warned that the United States is "literally giving away the country store" and will soon become a debtor nation unless trade laws are revised.

Wright told the delegates that it is "time for action" in the Congress to reduce the record $123 billion trade deficit and to attack the federal budget deficit in a fair way. He called Administration proposals to tax health care, pension and other worker benefits "outrageous and arrogant," particularly in light of policies that permit many multi-billion dollar corporations to pay no tax at all.

Other bills

Besides the trade "modernization" bill, specific legislation being pressed as part of the IUD program includes the measure to ban benzidine, introduced by Rep. Donald J. Pease (D-Ohio) along with Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.); the High Risk Occupational & Environmental Disease Notification & Management Program, introduced by Rep. Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.); a bill to protect a broad range of workers and their communities from the devastating effects of sudden plant shutdowns, sponsored by Reps. William Clay (D-Mo.), Silvio Conte (R-Mass.) and William D. Ford (D-Mich.).

Velasquez, Young get new COPE region posts

COPE Director John Perkins has announced the appointment of Joe Velasquez as region director for Ohio and Michigan. And W. C. Young, formerly director of the Michigan and Missouri region, has been designated director for Kentucky and Missouri.

Velasquez, who will be based in Columbus, was Hispanic political coordinator for the Mondale-Ferraro campaign and had previously been field director for the Labor Council for Latin-American Advancement. Earlier, he was an international representative with the Auto Workers and served with the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Seafarers endorse promotion effort of 'American' tuna

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Seafarers have joined with C.H.B. Foods, Inc., of Terminal Island, Calif., to promote a new product line of totally American canned tuna fish.

SIU President Frank Drozak reported to the AFL-CIO Executive Council that members of the union had accepted a $1-an-hour wage rollback to be matched by the company to promote the new "American" brand tuna and narrow the market advantages enjoyed by foreign producers.

Drozak reported that the company also will operate a fleet of unionized fishing boats to supply its Terminal Island cannery operations. The "American" tuna is the only brand packed exclusively in the continental United States by a national tuna company, he said.

If the campaign succeeds, Drozak said, it could lead to the reopening of another cannery that has been idle for three years, providing job opportunities for an additional 1,000 workers. It would also help revitalize the domestic tuna boat fleet and other support industries.

Trade aid needed 'more than ever'

The Trade Adjustment Assistance program the Administration wants to kill off "is needed more than ever," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said.

The existing program of cash benefits, training, job search help and relocation allowances is scheduled to expire in September, and the Administration opposes its renewal.

Ending the program would be a double blow to the workers affected, Denison said in a letter to Rep. Sam Gibbons (D-Fla.), chairman of a House Ways & Means subcommittee on trade. Workers who "lost their jobs due to U.S. trade policies will now lose adjustment aid because of U.S. budget policies."

At hearings chaired by Gibbons, Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden said that the need for trade adjustment assistance will become even more urgent if Japan's voluntary restraint agreement limiting auto imports is allowed to expire and more U.S. workers lose their jobs as a result. Thousands of Americans are now jobless due to the imports.

Talking back

Federal workers whose pay and pensions would be slashed under the Reagan Administration's budget proposals get a chance to talk back at House hearings. Members of the Government Employees and other federal-sector unions confront the architect of the pay cut proposal, Director Donald J. Devine of the Office of Personnel Management.

AFSCME analysis

Reagan budget scored for scuttling programs

An AFL-CIO public employee union charged that the Reagan Administration is making needed social programs the "scapegoats" for its "unsound fiscal policies," and the losers are low- and middle-income Americans.

Of the $18.4 billion in domestic social spending cuts in President Reagan's 1986 budget, 75 percent, or $13.8 billion, represents federal aid to state and local governments, the State, County & Municipal Employees pointed out in an analysis of the budget.

Describing the cuts as "huge and reckless," AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee told reporters at a Washington press conference the reductions are "unjustified."

"The huge federal deficits were not created by domestic social programs and cannot be solved by continually cutting these programs," McEntee said.

"Only addressing the source of the deficits—namely, defense spending and corporate tax loopholes—will restore the fiscal integrity of the federal government.

"The major share of the Administration's proposed cuts are in grants-in-aid to state and local government," McEntee observed. "The workers that AFSCME represents will see the effects of the service cuts first hand.

"We are very concerned that real public needs will go unmet and that moderate- and middle-income taxpayers will be hurt as a result."

The AFSCME analysis lists the state-by-state effects of the $13.8 billion in domestic spending cuts proposed by the Administration. The report analyzes more than 200 federal programs supporting public education, mass transit, social services, child nutrition, Medicaid, job training, highway construction, and Medicare.

Program cuts

Among the major findings of the report, titled "State of the States," are:

- Programs providing direct payments to individuals would be reduced by $4.6 billion. These cuts would be concentrated in just two programs—Medicare and aid to college students.
- The programs that would sustain the deepest cuts, in percentage terms, are libraries, 100 percent reduction; child nutrition, 17 percent; community services, 100 percent; juvenile justice assistance, 55 percent; subsidized housing, 72 percent; Appalachian regional programs, 100 percent; energy conservation, 24 percent; urban development action grants, 100 percent; urban mass transit, 100 percent; general revenue sharing, 100 percent, and student aid, 21 percent.
- The 10 states that would suffer the highest per capita reductions in grants from the federal government are Alaska, New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, Montana, Rhode Island, Wyoming, West Virginia, Maryland and New Jersey.
- The states with the 10 highest per capita losses in payments to individuals would be Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Maine, South Dakota, Pennsylvania, New York, Florida, Missouri and Oregon.

"The Administration justifies these cuts by saying that states and local governments are well off and able to shoulder a larger role in the delivery of government services," McEntee observed.

"In fact, the small surpluses that some states enjoy are unequally distributed, with half the surpluses being concentrated in just five states."

The proposed cuts would represent the second largest reduction ever in domestic spending for a single year. Only the omnibus domestic spending cuts enacted when Reagan first took office were greater.

Impact ignored

Besides the elimination of needed and effective programs, including the Job Corps, the work incentive program and revenue sharing, the Administration's budget proposes partial cutbacks in virtually every other domestic program. Yet, little consideration is given to the consequences of these actions, McEntee said.

"Nothing could be so shortsighted as to slight our investment in education, infrastructure, health and nutrition—the basic building blocks of a productive society," he declared.

McEntee said the Administration would like to pretend that state and local governments have enough funds to replace lost federal aid. But the truth is they are in precarious fiscal health, he said.

Current state and local government surpluses are very low by historic standards, are concentrated in just a handful of states, and are the direct result of hefty tax increases and persistent belt-tightening, McEntee pointed out.

The proposed slash of $13.8 billion in federal aid to state and local governments will force untenable choices, he warned, choices between additional state and local tax increases or massive service cuts.

"It is clear who will pay. It will be the low- and middle-income recipients of these federal programs and state and local taxpayers—you and I," he said.

Transport Workers picket Pan Am at New York's Kennedy Airport.

Striking Pan Am workers assail union-busting tactics

New York—The Transport Workers accused Pan American World Airways of embarking on a union-busting course and said TWU members are continuing to show their solidarity on the picket line.

The union, which represents more than 5,700 mechanics, baggage handlers, flight dispatchers and food service workers, struck on Mar. 1, two months after its former contract had expired.

TWU, along with other Pan Am unions, had made substantial pay and contract concessions in 1981 and 1982 when the airline was in deep financial trouble. Now, in what was supposed to have been a "snapback contract," to recoup past concessions, Pan Am has been demanding further givebacks, including reductions in vacations and holidays, work rule changes and sharply reduced starting salaries.

Of the five unions that bargain with Pan Am, only the Pilots had reached an agreement when the strike began. Pilots respected the TWU picket lines for the first week of the strike, but then agreed to return to work.

Despite the move, Pan Am's domestic flights remained almost entirely suspended and a number of overseas flights were cancelled.

Union supporters turned out Mar. 5 for a big rally in front of the Pan Am building in midtown New York to bolster the strikers' cause. Some 5,000 persons took part in the demonstration.

The company's abrasive bargaining table stance had angered unions representing nearly all of the 19,000 workers, many of whom have been on layoff. An unaffiliated flight attendants' union had set an Apr. 1 strike deadline.

700 jobs eliminated

TWU negotiators were particularly irked by Pan Am's unilateral action in dismantling its commissary operations in New York, San Francisco and Honolulu two days after the strike began. The company contracted out the work to a Marriott operation, eliminating the jobs of some 700 TWU members.

Employment opportunities or compensation for these workers has become a major strike goal, the union said.

John Kerrigan, director of TWU's airline division, said Pan Am's actions indicate that it doesn't want to reach a settlement at the bargaining table.

He charged the airline with "purposely provoking continued conflict in order to ultimately break all the unions on the property."

TWU's advice to travelers was that "if they want a safe, clean, on-time trip with quick baggage retrieval, they'd better take another airline until the strike is over."

Mediation found effective tool in settling Article XX disputes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Mediation continues to prove its effectiveness as a means of settling disputes between affiliates under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said.

Reporting to the Executive Council on the operations of the Article XX Internal Disputes Plan, Donahue said 2,344 cases have been filed since the plan's inception in 1962. Settlement was achieved through mediation and discussions between the organizations in 1,328 cases, or 56.6 percent. In 1984 alone, 24 cases—35 percent of those processed during the year—were settled at the mediation level.

Since February 1982, all cases have been handled by a permanent mediator, John N. Gentry. In cases not settled through mediation, hearings are conducted and determinations made by the impartial umpires, D. Quinn Mills and Howard Lesnick. There have been 995 such determinations since 1962.

Sixty-three new cases were filed in 1984 and 15 remained pending at the mediation level at the end of the year. Umpires' determinations found violations in 15 cases and no violations in 13, with four cases pending. A justification report was issued in one case.

At the appeals stage, 13 cases were pending at the start of the year and 17 new appeals were entered. Council subcommittees sustained the umpires' determinations in 11 cases. Five appeals were withdrawn and four were referred to the Executive Council Appeals Committee, leaving ten cases pending.

The Appeals Committee affirmed one determination and set aside or modified two, with one case remaining pending.

Seventeen non-compliance complaints were pending at the start of the year and two others were filed during the period. Compliance was achieved in four cases, four remained pending and 11 non-active.

Two affiliates remain listed as in non-compliance and subject to Article XX sanctions: the International Typographical Union and the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians.

In other action, the Executive Council approved extensions of jurisdictional protection for the State, County & Municipal Employees in seven units. Three of the extensions are to February 1986 for units in Buffalo, Baton Rouge, La., and Sacramento, Calif. The other four are to May 1986 for two units in Los Angeles, one in Maine and one in Warm Springs, Mont.

Apprentice organizers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Sheet Metal Workers announced a new program to put up to 2,000 apprentices into the field as union organizers.

SMWIA President Edward J. Carlough said the program will begin with a pilot effort in several cities next summer. About 200 third-year and fourth-year apprentices will work full-time as union organizers. The ultimate objective is to add a fifth year to the training program with the third year devoted to organizing.

Carlough said the plan grew out of a locally inspired test. Thirty apprentices from Local 35 in Atlanta emerged from a building trades organizing conference so enthusiastic that they volunteered for local organizing efforts on their own time.

"We knew why we were union," said one of the participants, James McCullough. "We figured we could explain the advantages to other young workers better than somebody 30 years older could. And we turned out to be right."

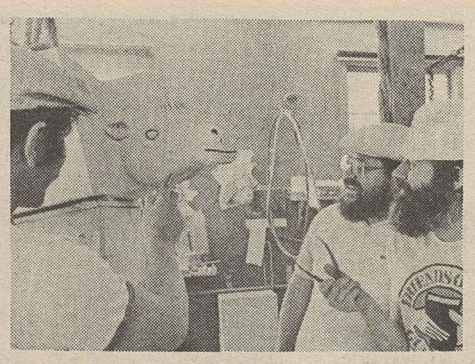
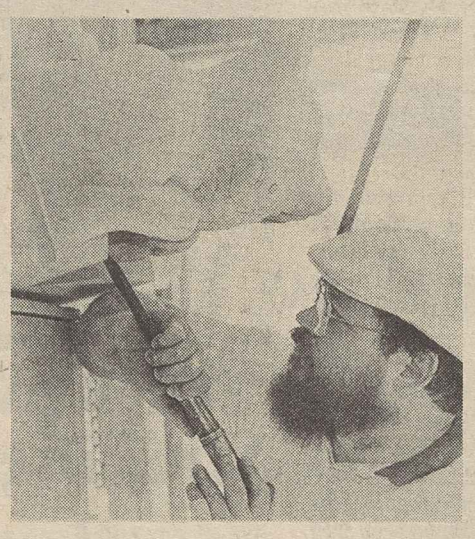
Walkout by Machinists grounds Alaska Airlines

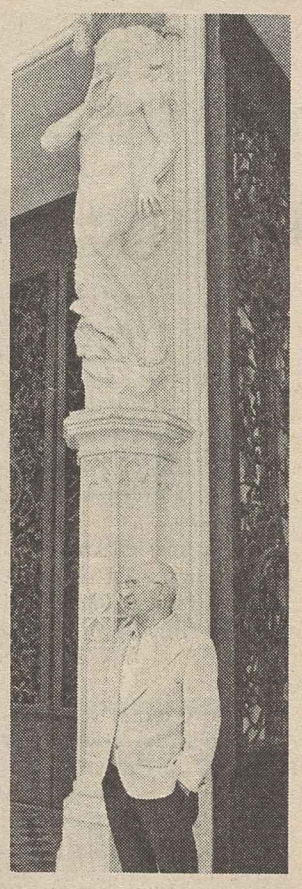
Seattle—Mechanics and baggage handlers represented by the Machinists struck Alaska Airlines after failing to reach agreement on a new contract with the Seattle-based airline.



The union represents about 1,400 of the airline's 2,750 employees. The strike began on Mar. 4, ten days after expiration of a 30-day cooling-off period required under the Railway Labor Act governing labor relations in the airline and railway industries.



Gary Peterson, secretary-treasurer of IAM Local 2202 here, said that pickets were put up at airline destinations throughout Alaska, Washington and California. Issues include cost-of-living adjustments and the length of time required to reach the top pay scale.



IAM also represents ticket and freight agents and workers in other job classifications, but these workers are not included in the contract being negotiated.

The carrier reported a record profit of $23.9 million in 1984.

Stonecarvers Vincent Palumbo, Bill Bucher and Patrick Plunkett on the job at Washington Cathedral. Retired master carver Roger Morigi, right, with his work "Adam."

Stonecarvers—their labor of love

The work and lives of Italian-American craftsmen are featured in a new documentary film, "The Stonecarvers," which has been nominated for an academy award. The film focuses on four union stone carvers—members of Laborers Local 571—working at the Washington Cathedral, a Gothic-style structure begun in 1907 that is still under construction.

Vincent Palumbo, master carver at the cathedral, was 9 years old when he began to learn the trade, not carving at first, but "sweeping up, doing what my father would tell me," he recalled. "Soon, he gave me chisels, a piece of stone in the shop where he was working and asked me to try to do this or that. Now, I've been doing this all my life. I feel strange doing something else."

Palumbo came to the United States in 1961 to join his father as a stonecarver. He said he never thought of earning a living in any other way.

"We work here at the cathedral because it is an honor as well as to make a living. I've been here half of my life and I want to stay. My father was here before me. It's my trade, what I was born to do."

Roger Morigi was the cathedral's master carver until he retired in 1978, after 60 years in the specialized craft. Morigi also learned the trade as a young boy in his native Italy. He joined his father in America in 1927 and worked on some of the nation's landmarks — the U.S. Capitol, Supreme Court and National Archives.

Creative work

Both men agree that stone carving is a very special craft. As Palumbo described it, "the sculptor is the creator but the carver is the performer. We do the statue, and yes, we copy the model, but when the finished product goes into the cathedral, we have put our feelings into the stone. We have put life into it."

Palumbo noted that while stonecarvers keep up with technology and use some electric tools, "the hands must still control the machine." Most of the fine carving and finishing is done with the same kind of tools stonecarvers have used for centuries. According to the film's producers, the craft is "remarkably unchanged since the days of Michelangelo."

Morigi and Palumbo expressed regret that they may be the last of a centuries-old line of stonecarvers. Changes in architecture and building style have nearly eliminated the need for their very special talents. But as one carver in the film declares, "our handiwork is going to stay forever."

"The Stonecarvers" was produced by Marjorie Hunt of the Smithsonian Institution and Paul Wagner, who won an Emmy award for his film on the Sleeping Car Porters, "Miles of Smiles, Years of Struggle."

Union sees hope for reopening of closed steel mill

Pittsburgh—Prospects for the eventual reopening of idled portions of U.S. Steel's huge Duquesne Works and the restoration of hundreds of jobs brightened with the Steelworkers' announcement that two investment banking firms have agreed to conduct financing and marketing studies toward that end.

USWA District 15 Director Andrew Palm told a news conference that Lazard Freres Co. of New York and Russell, Rea Zappala Inc. of Pittsburgh will work as a team, using their worldwide financial contracts, in carrying out the studies.

An initial feasibility study, commissioned by the union and released last month, showed the plant could be restarted at reasonable costs, and a market existed for steelworkers to produce semifinished steel, Palm observed.

"Today, we are taking that effort a step further," he said. "We want to find out what will be required in the way of financing, and if financing is possible. We also want to zero in on specific customers.

"We do know that the market for semifinished steel will increase," Palm said.

U.S. Steel announced late last year that it planned to raze the blast and basic oxygen furnaces at the Duquesne Works as part of its corporate strategy to reduce steelmaking capacity.

About 1,200 members of USWA Local 1256 were laid off at the Duquesne Works when the mill completely shut down last May.

Two more states stymie drive for constitutional convention

Labor's efforts in Illinois and Washington state helped stall the attempt to convene a national convention that would initiate a balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The double setback for the right-wing drive came just a week after the Montana House of Representatives had defeated a "con-con" resolution.

At legislative hearings, union witnesses have opposed the constitutional convention resolutions both on the merits of the proposed amendment and on the procedure. Labor has repeatedly stressed that a dubious and probably unworkable economic doctrine has no place in the Constitution. And the never-used procedure of forcing a constitutional convention by petition of two-thirds of the states could open the gate to a drastic reshaping of American government.

10-year campaign

Proponents of a balanced budget amendment have been successful in 32 of the required 34 legislatures in more than 10 years of trying, but there have been few additions to the list since the 1970s, when the proposal wasn't taken very seriously.

The Illinois Senate rejected a con-con resolution five years ago, and the proposal hasn't reached the floor since then. It probably won't this year either. The Senate Executive Committee killed the resolution on a 6-4 vote.

In Washington, the battle has been closer. Last year, the state senate defeated a con-con resolution by a single vote. On this round, the resolution was blocked in the Senate Judiciary Committee by a 7-6 vote.

At the committee hearing on the resolution, State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams was a principal witness against the measure. The National Tax Limitation Committee, one of the self-styled taxpayer organizations pushing for a constitutional amendment, brought in a former U.S. senator from Virginia, Harry F. Byrd Jr., to testify for it.

The con-con campaign is likely now to focus on the Michigan and Connecticut legislatures.

Despite labor opposition, it passed the Republican-controlled Michigan Senate earlier this year by a 19-12 vote and House hearings are scheduled later this month.

The turnabout in both houses of the Connecticut legislature from Democratic to Republican in last November's election has made that state a battleground.

President Reagan, who has never yet proposed a balanced budget to Congress, has regularly endorsed a constitutional amendment that would prohibit Congress, except in certain emergencies, from voting to spend more than the estimated revenues from taxes.

In Congress, proponents of a balanced budget amendment have used the threat of a runaway constitutional convention as an argument for Congress to initiate the amendment through the conventional procedure of a two-thirds vote by the House and Senate.

ators who face re-election battles in 1986.

The Senate bill was attached to an African relief measure. The House, which had passed its own version of farm assistance, then approved the Senate measure intact by a 255-168 vote, sending it to the White House. Thirty Republicans supported it, about half from farm states. Eighteen Democrats and 150 Republicans voted against it.

Reagan immediately vetoed the measure, declaring sternly: "Just as your families don't have a blank check for whatever your needs may be, neither can government—and that means taxpayers—bail out every farmer hopelessly in debt or every bank that made imprudent or speculative loans."

Earlier the President had announced a series of administrative actions he said would help farmers, but he backed the position taken by his budget director, David Stockman, who said farmers shouldn't look to the government if they can't pay their debts.

While Reagan's critics couldn't muster the two-thirds majorities needed to override his veto, the President was having his own troubles with the lopsided budget he submitted to Congress earlier this year.

No agreement

Republicans on the Senate Budget Committee couldn't reach a consensus on the huge rise in military spending sought by the President at the same time that he was demanding cuts in domestic programs. The outcome was a bipartisan 18-4 vote to hold the military increase to inflation levels, slashing $79 billion over three years from the President's spending request.

Eight Republicans joined nine Democrats on that vote, with only four committee Republicans sticking with Reagan.

The committee then followed through by voting 13-9 to maintain subsidies for AMTRAK passenger train service and mass transit grants to cities—both programs Reagan wants to abolish. And it voted 11-8 to continue three other Administration-opposed programs, Urban Development Action Grants for cities, the Appalachian Regional Commission, and the Economic Development Administration.

The President, however, maintained a public stance of "no retreat" from his budget priorities and in his weekly radio address to the nation called on Congress to approve his domestic budget cuts by Easter.

Holocaust Memorial fund appeal endorsed

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has urged strong labor support for the current drive to raise funds for a national museum and living memorial to the victims of the Nazi Holocaust in Europe during World War II.

In a letter to the heads of affiliated unions, departments and central bodies, Kirkland noted that the AFL-CIO Executive Council two years ago endorsed the proposed memorial museum. The council urged generous contributions by labor groups to help the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council created by Congress raise upward of $75 million to establish the museum. President Reagan is honorary national chairman of the campaign.

Kirkland noted that the American labor movement has been speaking out against anti-Semitism since the beginning of the century. He pointed out that the AFL Executive Council in its report to the 1933 convention specifically condemned Hitler and the Nazis in Germany for suppression of trade union rights and persecution of Jews.

"The record of U.S. labor in this regard is one of which we can all be proud, and I have recommended that labor's record become a part of the memorial museum," Kirkland said.

$5-million award

Fired hotel workers regain jobs, back pay

Miami Beach—An appeals court decision has paved the way for reinstatement and hefty back pay awards to some 300 hotel workers fired after a 1977 strike.

Individual payments will range from about $3,000 to $20,000, with the total close to $5 million, according to estimates by Local 355 of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees.

The reinstatement and back pay had been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board in 1979, and the strike in which the workers participated began on Christmas Day 1976 and ended about three weeks later.

In its verdict, the 11th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals agreed with the NLRB and the union that the dismissals were intended as retaliation against the workers, and the pretext that they were being dismissed as "unqualified" was a sham.

The firings had been engineered by management officials of the Doral hotels who have since been replaced, and the union reports that relations improved significantly while the case was making its way through the courts. The hotels involved are the Doral Beach Hotel, the Doral Hotel & Country Club and the Carillon Hotel.

It was after the workers ratified a new contract and returned to work that the firings took place, with management insisting on its right to fire "unqualified" workers.

The action came after the union had insisted on and obtained as a condition of the strike settlement a promise that strikebreakers hired by the hotels would be the first to be fired in any reduction of the workforce.

Testimony before the NLRB, cited in the appellate decision, showed that management encouraged the designation of union members as unqualified so that replacements could be kept on.

Anti-union bias

Whatever the words used, the intent was clear. Thus the hotel's personnel director didn't tell supervisors to put active union members on an "unqualified" list for dismissal. But, as the court noted, his "hostility toward the strikers and the union colored the delivery of his instructions to the supervisors, leading them to believe that he wanted them to consider unqualified the strongest union supporters, to teach the employees a lesson and discredit the union."

The decision noted that "no one had previously complained about the performance of the vast majority of those labeled unqualified," and personnel records weren't even consulted in drawing up the list.

"Many strikers labeled unqualified had worked for the Doral hotels for over 10 years," the court noted. "Their only shortcoming was supporting the union."

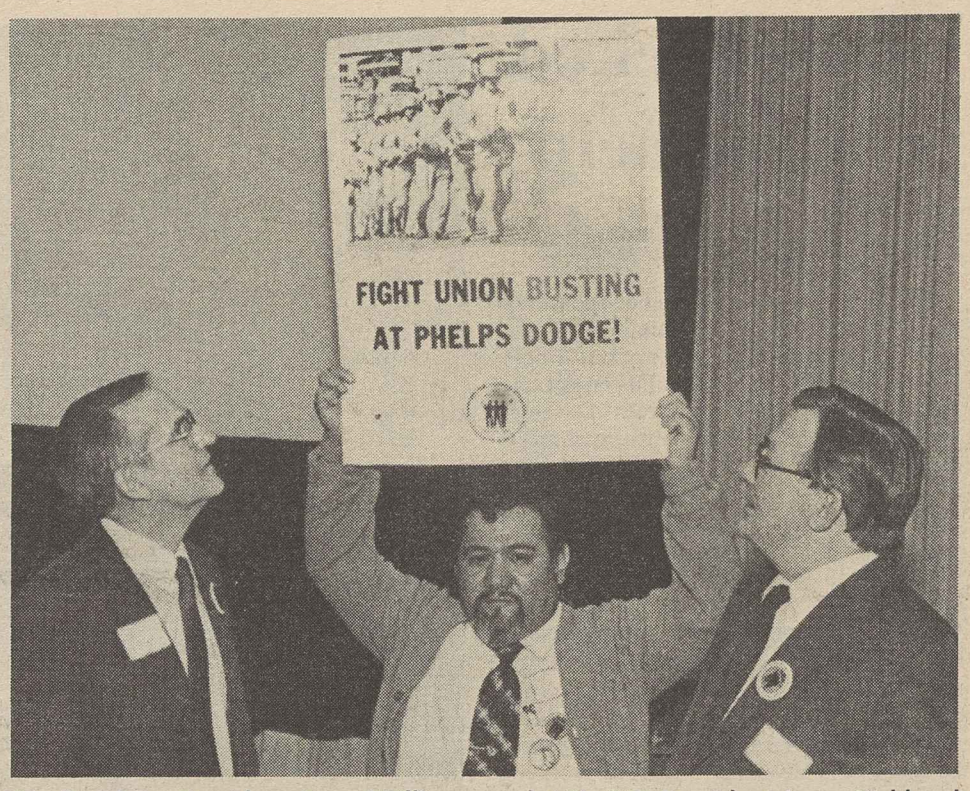
The drawback in the decision, from the union's view, is that the appellate court reversed an NLRB finding that 36 employees of the Doral Beach Hotel who had picketed the hotel three days after the contract had been ratified were entitled to reinstatement. The court said their dismissal was legal and the no-strike provision of the contract was binding.

Local 355 Business Manager Al Gonzalez deplored the length of time the case took and the hardships that many of the illegally fired workers had to undergo.

But in the end, he said, justice was achieved.

Struck storm sash producer added to labor's unfair list

Rusco Industries, Inc., a producer of storm windows and doors, has been placed on the AFL-CIO Unfair List, while Mapco Petroleum, Inc., has been removed from the list, Sec.-Treas. John Mara of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. reported.



Local 562 of the Allied Industrial Workers has been on strike against Rusco's Cochranton, Pa., plant since Aug. 1, 1984, after rejecting a contract that would have cut wages and benefits by 15 percent, ended the cost of living adjustment, eliminated three paid holidays and reduced insurance coverage, pension programs and excused absences.

Rusco hired replacements within 48 hours after the strike was called and has been operating since with more than 100 scabs. The local is still awaiting a ruling on unfair practice charges filed with the National Labor Relations Board. Ironically, the federal government is the company's largest customer.

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers requested that Mapco be removed from the Unfair List after Local 3-631 ratified a new three-year agreement covering workers at the company's Delta Refinery in Memphis, Tenn.

OCAW conducted a corporate campaign that included leafleting at Delta service stations, along with informational picketing in Memphis and Tulsa, Okla., site of Mapco's headquarters.

During negotiations a year ago, the company attempted to impose new work rules on the OCAW members, hoping to provoke a strike. The workers, however, remained on the job, demonstrating a strong spirit of solidarity during difficult times, OCAW President Joseph M. Misbrener said.

trade union movement is all about, he declared.

The "We're Not Leaving" theme gave the title to the 15-minute video documentary that hushed the hundreds of union supporters crowded into the lobby of the AFL-CIO building.

It brought the sights and sounds of the long struggle into dramatic focus—whether in scenes of tear gas and hovering helicopters or the bitterness of old-time Phelps Dodge workers for a company that has never settled a contract without a strike.

"Because of the union tradition that we have," Local 616 President Angel Rodriguez says in the film, "we have something that Phelps Dodge doesn't have, we have each other."

The film, intended for strike relief fundraisers, closes with a rollcall of the unions joined in the struggle. Besides the Steelworkers are the Boilermakers, Machinists, Electrical Workers, Operating Engineers, Teamsters, Chemical Workers, United Transportation Union, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Carpenters, Railway Carmen, Painters and the Morenci-Clifton Metal Trades Council.

Si Kahn, whose strike support song was the musical theme for the film and echoed the words of the strikers, was on hand to sing it for the AFL-CIO gathering. This is how the refrain goes:

"This is our home and we're not leaving.
These are our jobs and we won't go.
We stand together for our union.
This is our work,
This is our home."

U.S. trade deficit worsens as import tide keeps rising

ing of U.S. trade imbalances in the months to come," he said. "Strong action must be taken by Congress to deal with the trade problems of particular industries, and improve the remedies for injurious trade practices.

"The overvaluation of the dollar must be curbed," Oswald stressed.

The January deficit was up from an $8-billion deficit in December as imports rose to $29.7 billion, the highest monthly figure since last September, the Commerce Dept. reported. Meanwhile, exports edged up to $19.4 billion, the highest monthly figure since September 1981.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said the trade deficit could hit a record $140 billion this year. Last year's deficit was a record $123.3 billion, compared with $69.39 billion in 1983, the previous record.

Oswald noted that the huge increase in imports in January continued to plague the manufacturing sector of the economy. He said the problem is "particularly serious" in industrial machinery, computers, autos, and similar durable goods.

Leading the import surge were telecommunications gear, electronic sound equipment, and passenger cars from Europe.

Steel imports rose 22.6 percent in January to 2.6-million tons, reflecting a surge in orders last fall to beat the Administration's new import quotas. Those restrictions recently took effect, but there is a three-to-four-month delay between orders and deliveries.

January steel imports from Japan rose 33 percent from the December level, while shipments from developing nations increased 52 percent.

While auto shipments from Japan were up 7 percent to 179,955 units, sales of cars from Europe climbed 66.3 percent to 44,817 units.

The trade deficit with Japan and Europe both showed large increases in January. The deficit with Japan rose to almost $3.7 billion, up almost $900 million from December, while the trade gap with western Europe widened to $2 billion from $1 billion the month before.

Union-busters evade law to undermine collective bargaining

Albany, N.Y.—Union-busting employers and their consultants threaten the future of collective bargaining, the Labor Committee of the New York State Assembly charged.

The committee report, based on hearings held last year, said that in today's "deepening anti-labor atmosphere," the right of workers to organize that is supposedly protected by the National Labor Relations Act is increasingly "being called into question."

It cited a "pattern of union-buster activity" reflecting the increased role of management consultants. And it warned that "if the activities of these consultants—which almost always evade the spirit and often the letter of U.S. labor laws—continue unregulated, then the rights of U.S. workers to bargain collectively will be in serious jeopardy."

The state committee, headed by Assemblyman Frank J. Barbaro, quoted from the letter sent to a Rochester, N.Y., firm by a consultant firm that promised a "custom-made counter-organizing campaign that will ultimately lead to the defeat of the union." It acknowledged that because of "severe competition in this field," some other attorneys or consultants might claim to offer lower fees for their services but asked the employer not to be "misled." It claimed the odds were 99-to-1 it would be successful in keeping a union out.

Increasingly, the legislature's committee found, employers have provoked strikes in order to replace union workers and bring about decertification of the union.

"The greatest abuse of the strike weapon today comes from management," the committee concluded.

Union-backed projects help fill job needs

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Labor-sponsored projects are opening up training and employment opportunities for workers whose jobs have been wiped out, officers of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute reported at a trustees' meeting here.

Institute President Alan Kistler said HRDI is now administering a number of programs for dislocated workers on behalf of state and local central bodies, as well as continuing to provide technical assistance to both unions and central bodies.

Under the Job Training Partnership Act, states receive federal funds to allocate for job development and training projects. HRDI has undertaken statewide surveys to assess the needs of displaced workers, helped them in their job search and alerted them to training opportunities, Kistler said.

He noted that HRDI has also been involved in statewide efforts to spot potential plant closings and to set up quick-response programs to assist the workers affected.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who serves as chairman of the HRDI board of trustees, said the institute has done "a great job" in responding to the needs of workers stranded by plant closings or heavy layoffs.

Kirkland warned, however, that HRDI's mission is endangered by funding cutbacks.

Executive Director Mike Arnold reported that the institute's ability to function will be seriously curtailed if Congress approves the funding cancellations. HRDI's mission, he stressed, is to help bring about maximum labor involvement in job training programs as a partner with business and government.

New projects

Reports by Kistler and Arnold noted that HRDI helped develop 42 labor-involved programs for jobless workers last year and has a major role in programs under way or planned in eight states.

It has also:

- Furnished assistance and technical guidance to more than 1,000 labor representatives serving on JTPA state bodies and private industry councils that review plans for employment and training programs in their localities.
- Held leadership training seminars for unions setting up assistance programs for displaced members.
- Carried out a survey of 93 labor-involved programs in 40 states that were supported by JTPA funds.

Major projects involving HRDI are in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, California, New Mexico and New York, Arnold noted.

Civil rights vigil

Union members join with other elements of the civil rights coalition in lighting up the steps of the U.S. Capitol with this "Simple Justice" message. The flashlight display was in support of legislation to remedy damage that a 1984 Supreme Court decision inflicted on enforcement of the nation's civil rights laws.

Central America aid backing tied to principles of justice

Congress should substantially increase aid to Central America and insist that it be used in developing societies "which provide justice for their citizens," the AFL-CIO declared.

In a statement submitted to a House Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development called for legislation to carry out the recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America.

The so-called Kissinger commission, on which Federation President Lane Kirkland served, recommended the creation of a Central American Development Organization (CADO) that would channel U.S. assistance to seven Central American countries — Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama.

The panel would be empowered to cut back aid to those countries that fail to comply with basic human rights and democratic guarantees. Legislation to establish CADO was introduced in Congress last year, but was not acted on.

Doherty — just back from a two-week tour of Central America as AFL-CIO representative on a factfinding mission of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions — said the need for such legislation has not diminished in the past year.

He stressed that the AFL-CIO stands as firmly today as it did a year ago behind the principle of "conditionality" in the disbursement of foreign aid funds. The concept provides that all aid, particularly military aid, be conditioned on social, trade union, and political rights.

Committed to change

Doherty said that meetings with heads of states and all segments of the trade union movement, human rights organizations and political parties on his recent trip convinced him that "the democratic labor movements of Central America and other democratic political forces are as committed to change as they were a year ago."

While supporting a regional, or multinational, approach to many Central American problems, the AFL-CIO favors a bilateral policy in the cases of El Salvador and Nicaragua, Doherty said.

"Both . . . have problems which require solutions before the rest of Central America can concentrate its energies on economic growth, justice, and political development," he said.

Most reasonable people question the motives and intentions of the Marxist-Leninist Sandinista dictatorship, "and the AFL-CIO is unaware of any case currently being made by responsible people which would indicate that human, political, and trade union rights would be improved by continued leadership of the Nicaraguan government," Doherty said.

El Salvador gains

In El Salvador, on the other hand, the forces of democracy appear to be holding their own, he said.

"Few now believe that the Marxist-Leninist guerrillas can ultimately win," he said. "President (Jose Napoleon) Duarte continues to struggle for a national consensus. U.S. policy should be to aid him in this struggle.

"U.S. policy toward El Salvador, because of its persistence, is beginning to pay off. It would be a huge mistake, at this point, to slacken in our efforts to support this new democracy."

Idaho petition drive

Idaho Fire Fighters President Robert Chase signs the first United Labor of Idaho petition calling for a referendum to repeal the state's "right-to-work" law. The petition drive was launched simultaneously at the state capital and seven other locations across the state. In the first weekend, it drew more than 3,000 of the 32,666 signatures needed to put the measure on the 1986 general election ballot. Enforcement of the law, enacted Jan. 31, remains blocked pending outcome of court challenges brought by the Idaho AFL-CIO.

of the loss of America's lead in important technologies related to auto manufacture."

Bieber called the move "a severe blow to the recovering U.S. vehicle industry and especially to the 2.5 million Americans and their families whose livelihoods depend directly on a healthy auto sector."

In a telegram to Reagan, Bywater noted that the pullback on quotas came a day after the government reported that surging imports from Europe and Japan widened the U.S. trade deficit to $10.3 billion in January.

"IUE deplores your decision," Bywater said. "The shocking January trade figures demonstrate that the U.S. should not permit unrestricted imports of Japanese cars or any other product."

Market share

The voluntary agreement has been in effect since 1981. In the current 12-month period, which ends Mar. 31, the ceiling on Japanese car imports was set at 1.85 million units, or a little under 20 percent of the domestic market.

With lifting of the VRA, Data Resources, Inc., predicted in a recent report that 1985 Japanese sales in the United States will reach 2.2 million units. Other estimates of the number of additional cars that might come in have ranged as high as 1 million.

The Administration's rationale for removal of the quotas is that the American auto industry has sufficiently recovered from years of depressed sales to compete in the open market with unrestrained Japanese imports.

U.S. auto companies, however, while noting they have come a long way, pointed out that the continuing decline of the yen compared with the dollar, together with certain Japanese tax practices, has nullifed their progress in competing with Japan.

Bieber said the UAW will step up efforts for legislation mandating a certain level of local content in cars sold in the United States, or for a newer proposal linking import totals to trade deficits.

"Most important, the UAW will continue to insist that U.S.-based auto companies keep jobs and production here where their market is, rather than rush into foreign sourcing of cars and components."

A domestic content bill along the lines of that sought by the UAW was reintroduced in the House by Rep. Dennis Hertel (D-Mich.). Auto content legislation passed the House twice before, but did not get through the Senate.

UFCW's growth linked to bypass of labor board

Organizing strategy designed to bypass National Labor Relations Board involvement helped the Food & Commercial Workers add more members in 1984 than any year in its history, UFCW President William F. Wynn said.

The UFCW reported that it organized 65,248 new members last year, compared to 58,841 in 1983.

The NLRB has been "converted to an anti-union, anti-worker agency by the Reagan Administration," Wynn charged. He said that "We've told our organizers and lawyers to find ways to organize without going through the board, so we can avoid the interminable delays it creates."

To do that, Wynn said, the union has returned to "old-fashioned, hard-nosed organizing" that includes informational picketing and protests against non-union firms that don't pay area standard wages. It seeks voluntary recognition through card checks and uses corporate campaigns, billboards, handbilling and radio and television ads.

Common Ground

THE FARMER-WORKER alliance that has been a force for progress during much of this century has been revived and strengthened by President Reagan's harsh veto of the farm assistance bill.

The President made clear that he considers farm families burdened by debt and high interest costs as another "special interest" out to upset the social Darwinism of his budget priorities.

Reagan's veto message, bluntly put, was "Drop Dead!"

That's the same message his Administration has given to workers threatened by a torrent of job-destroying imports, to the poor and homeless, to students and to the elderly.

In the plains states of the Midwest, where corporate agriculture has not yet displaced efficient family farms, the farmer-worker ties of yesteryear have never been completely severed. When Minnesotans refer to the party of Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale as the DFL, it is a reminder of the historic merger that Humphrey helped bring about between the Democratic Party and the state's progressive Farmer-Labor Party.

Some 14,000 midwestern farmers made their way to Ames, Iowa, the other week to give voice to their disenchantment with the Reagan Administration. The sponsors of the rally included groups that have stood with the labor movement on other issues, such as the National Farmers Union, the American Agriculture Movement, the National Catholic Rural Life Committee and the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association.

ONE OF THE speakers, a farm woman from Colorado, spoke of the desperation that has gripped farm and ranch families and appealed to "urban America to join us in a plea to President Reagan to change the current philosophies he and his Administration are following."

Farm equipment workers, who bridge both worlds, know the mutual dependence of farm and factory. A speaker from Rock Island, Ill., cited the decline in the union workforce at the International Harvester tractor factory there from 3,800 in 1980 to 250 now.

The same artificially high exchange value of the dollar that makes it difficult for even the most cost-efficient U.S. goods to compete against imports has priced U.S. farm products beyond the reach of potential world markets. Yet American agriculture remains the most productive in the world.

Not every position of workers and farmers coincides. But both groups have been so battered by the Reagan Administration's policies that it's not hard to find common ground.

Remembering Selma

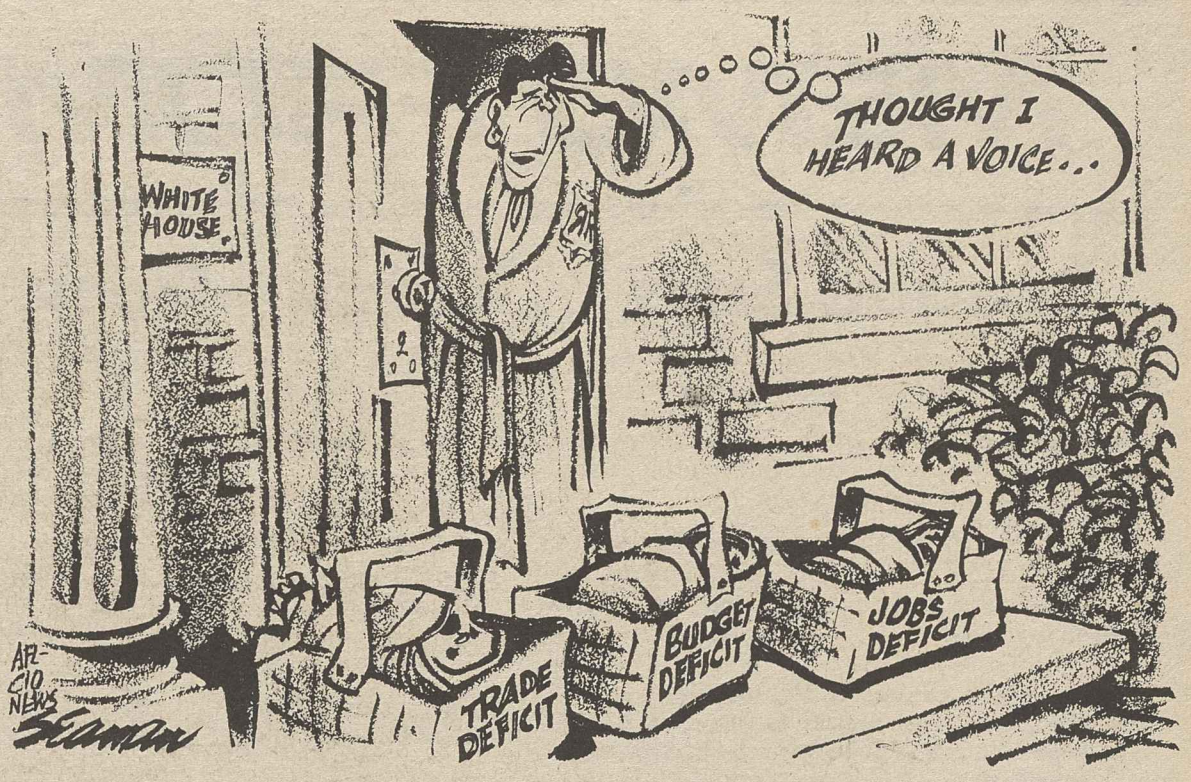
TWENTY YEARS ago, the civil rights march through Alabama, from Selma to Montgomery, was the catalyst for passage of the Voting Rights Act, which unshackled the ballot box for millions of black Americans.



AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard, who marched the route 20 years ago, was back in Montgomery Mar. 7 for the anniversary observance.

The labor movement was there in 1965, he noted, with some 17 AFL-CIO unions in the line of march.

And "labor is here in 1985 to give witness to our continuing commitment," Pollard stressed.

"The battle for equal rights is as ongoing as it was two decades ago." As for the AFL-CIO, its dedication "to equal justice, equal rights and equal opportunities" has not diminished over the years. The labor movement enlisted in the civil rights coalition for the duration.

Rights, once achieved, must be defended. A damaging Supreme Court decision must be rectified. An indifferent Administration must be prodded.

Reagan wants more cuts as hunger epidemic rages

By Press Associates, Inc.

During its first term, the Reagan Administration slashed $12.2 billion from federal food stamp and child nutrition programs.

Shortly after the first food program cuts were steamrollered through Congress, the nation entered the deepest recession since World War II.

Those managing private food programs reported during the 1981-82 recession that they were swamped with a massive influx of the unemployed and poor seeking food for themselves and their families and that they had to turn people away.

President Reagan and other Administration officials shrugged off those reports as "anecdotal" and kept saying economic recovery would solve any problems.

Even after the spotty recovery, reports continued nationwide from social workers, private food programs and physicians of widespread hunger and its effects on health.

A survey by the non-profit Food Research & Action Center (FRAC) found that the demand for food from private programs increased some 21 percent from 1983 to 1984. Field hearings conducted by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) last fall made similar findings.

Worsening problem

Most recently, a 10-month study by the 22-member Physician Task Force on Hunger, which includes prominent doctors and public health experts around the country, concluded that "hunger is a problem of epidemic proportions across the nation" and "is getting worse, not better."

The physicians' report said evidence indicates up to 20-million Americans may be hungry at least some period of time each month.

Even though all the reports on hunger link its rise directly to the Reagan recession and budget cuts, the Administration now wants to cut another $800 million from federal food programs. According to analyses by FRAC and other anti-hunger groups, this is how the cuts would fall:

- School lunch and breakfast programs would be cut by $550 million by freezing food price inflation adjustment for free and reduced-price meals in school nutrition programs and the milk program and by eliminating all federal subsidies for meals for moderate-income children. FRAC said schools rely on federal subsidies for all children to maintain the programs.
- The child care food program for 250,000 children in family day care homes and 750,000 children in child care centers would be cut by 30 percent.

Sharp cutback

- An estimated 100,000 women would be cut from the women, infants and children special supplemental food program (WIC). WIC, which has been recognized as one of the most effective anti-hunger programs, currently serves only one-third of those eligible because of limited funding.
- The $50-million Temporary Emergency Food Distribution & Shelter Program, which helps private food programs obtain and distribute food to the needy, would be eliminated.
- Title III services and meals for the elderly would be frozen at current levels, which would cause fewer elderly below the poverty level to be served as inflation shrinks the number served. The program now serves about 43 percent of eligible poor seniors.
- The food stamp program, which was cut by some $7 billion from 1981 to 1985, would be frozen at current levels of about 20-million recipients of the 35-million poor eligible .However, the Administration has recommended mandatory workfare for employable recipients and a cap on state administrative expenses, which together would shift considerable extra costs to the states.

Although these proposed cuts seem small compared to past years, they demonstrate that the Administration is callously continuing in the wrong direction. Evidently, the President's "second American revolution" means letting 20-million Americans go hungry.

MEMO FROM COPE

Reagan Says . . . Reagan Does (and often the twain don't meet)

(From last months of Reagan 1984 re-election campaign and first month of second term)

REAGAN SAYS: In October 1984 at University of Alabama, "we have no intention of reducing" loan programs for college students.

REAGAN DOES: His budget seeks sharp cuts in amount students can borrow per year for their college education and a family income ceiling for a student to qualify.

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: In September campaign appearance, "we can make further budget cuts without affecting how much actually goes to the needy."

REAGAN DOES: His own Administration estimates programs for the poor will be cut by five percent. Others claim the figure will be even higher—this on top of huge gouges from programs for the needy in 1981-82.

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: Campaigning in Buffalo at dedication of federally funded apartment complex for elderly and handicapped, the project is a "truly great thing."

REAGAN DOES: His budget proposes no funding for the next two years for the program that made the project possible.

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: Any revisions in Medicare would not be "in restricting the patient" but would instead aim at controlling hospital and doctor costs.

REAGAN DOES: In addition to limits on costs, he now proposes Medicare patients be required to pay more for their care. He also calls for a multi-billion-dollar retreat from Medicaid for the needy.

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: In October, on a major environmental concern, "we have now budgeted for going back to purchasing land for parks" for the recreation and enjoyment of Americans.

REAGAN DOES: His new budget proposes a three-year moratorium on "discretionary acquisition of recreation lands."

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: In September, veterans would continue to receive "benefits to which they're entitled," implying at least continuation of benefits at present levels.

REAGAN DOES: He now proposes a means test that would deprive scores of thousands of veterans of benefits for which they are now eligible.

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: Repeatedly throughout campaign claims he will protect programs that help hard-hit farmers hold on to their land, in August specifically promising the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) "will continue reaching out to help tens of thousands of farm borrowers hold on to their farms and stay in business."

REAGAN DOES: His new budget proposes major cutbacks in the FmHA program, and negotiations between his Administration and farm leaders and farm-state officials fail to provide the relief farmers need. In addition, he's called for king-sized slashes in farm price supports. Most recently, he vetoed legislation aimed at assisting debt-plagued farmers.

(Estimates of impending family farm failures in the absence of adequate help range from 20-30 percent of the approximately 640,000 small growers. It would be a calamity for those in agriculture almost equal in numbers to the job wipe-outs in recent years in auto, steel and other basic industries. Some of the harshest criticisms of the Administration come from Republicans. On the farm issue, said one, "the Administration has bungled.")

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: Throughout 1984 campaign, he can slash his record budget deficits by the simple device of economic growth.

REAGAN DOES: His budget proposals call for substantial-to-massive cuts in dozens of key programs—mass transit, education, agriculture, health, housing, employment—you name it (see below). He no longer talks of economic growth being sufficient by itself to curb deficits.

* * * * *

REAGAN SAYS: On the day after election, he would "not go along with the idea that the only way you can cut spending is to eliminate or reduce some programs."

REAGAN DOES: Following is the money projected three-year cuts and freezes will withhold from a variety of federal programs (in billions of dollars):

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Medicaid | $ 6.3 | Agriculture | $26 |
| Medicare | $18.5 | Job Corps | $ 1.3 |
| Student aid | $ 3.9 | Revenue sharing | $12.5 |
| Veterans care | $ 2.4 | Mass transit | $ 4.2 |
| Child nutrition | $ 2.5 | Health training | $ 0.5 |
| Housing | $13.8 | Small business | $ 5.4 |

'Our Kids Will Pay for This Folly'

. . . There's nothing in the Constitution that requires a President to advertise calamity. So Reagan, like his predecessors, hid it away, deep in the thickets of (his) budget document. . . .

I'm going to put down a series of numbers for you to look at: 32.3; 36.7; 49.5; 65.8; 67.6; 111.1. Here are four more: 130.4; 142.6; 152.9; 159.2.

I'm not trying to be mysterious. The numbers measure the annual interest payments on the national debt. Put a dollar sign in front of them. Put a billion behind them. What they describe is a runaway locomotive.

The first six numbers, running up from $32 billion to $111 billion, represent the actual increase in the annual interest payment between 1979 and 1984. (Only the last number is included in Reagan's budget.) It's more than tripled.

The next four numbers, jumping from $130 billion to $159 billion, are Reagan's projection of the annual interest payments in the next four years.

Note two things: first, the rate of increase slows, because Reagan's budget assumes that "the 91-day Treasury bill rate (a key to the rate of interest the government pays) will decline steadily from an average of 9.6 percent in calendar year 1984 to 5.9 percent in 1988." Set aside that blue-sky forecast and annual interest payments zoom to the $200 billion range.

Note, too, that even under Reagan's optimistic forecast, annual interest payments will have quintupled—multiplied by five—in 10 years.

And they will continue to soar because under Reagan's budget, if every single one of his savings proposals is accepted by Congress (fat chance!) he would have us increase the federal deficit by $144 billion in 1988 and add proportionally to the annual interest bill.

The point is not complicated; it's just one Reagan wants to keep secret: The deficit is eating us alive; it's running away with us. And it can't be cured on the spending side, even if you swallow all Reagan's medicine.

This is no big discovery on my part. Last September, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) wrote that, "The interest deficit has begun to go out of control. In 1980, the Treasury spent $52 billion in interest payments. This year, the bill will reach $111 billion. By 1989, $214 billion. . . . What Lord Keynes called the "magic of compound interest" works with debt as well as with savings. It starts slowly, then explodes.

That explosion is now happening. It will occur whatever Congress does with Reagan's proposed budget cuts—even if Congress accepts them all.

It will go on until it ravages the value of the dollar, unless—unless someone has the courage to say we have to pay for the amount of government services we get. Unless someone says, "Raise taxes."

Reagan won't, because he promised not to. The Democrats won't, because Walter Mondale did, and he lost 49 states. I am a political reporter, and I understand political realities. But I can also add and subtract. And since I'm not running for anything, I can tell you what the politicians won't: taxes have to go up. . . .

If the cost of a weapons system or a welfare program were quintupling, everyone would say it was out of control. But interest payments are quintupling in a decade—and almost every politician looks the other way. . . .

But Reagan says taxes must not be raised, and Reagan won 49 states, so that settles the matter.

We have a President who believes in traditional values. All but one: he doesn't believe in paying his bills. And the Democrats are too scared to challenge him.

Our kids will pay for this folly.

Quiz Time: Who's Your State Rep? (It Pays to Know)

Quick . . . who's your state representative?

Or your state senator?

One will get you two you don't know. Most of us don't. But we ought to take the trouble to know who they are and what they stand for—and when the time comes, vote accordingly. An example why:

Recently, the Idaho legislature passed a right-to-work-for-less law. It then overrode the governor's veto to make it stick.

Enactment of the law was dated in January.

But it as good as passed on November 6, election day 1984. That's the day the state legislature was made RTW-prone. On that day, voters replaced seven Democratic state senators with seven conservative Republicans, leaving that body 28-14 GOP, exactly enough to override a veto on straight party-line voting.

At the same time, voters in Idaho dumped 16 Democrats in the lower house, changing the balance to 67-17 for the GOP. At its previous 51R-33D, a straight party line vote would have upheld a gubernatorial veto. All that's water over the dam.

But in other states, similar situations may arise in the next couple of years, and for-less promoters are counting on legislative gains to help them knock over more states.

Colorado is one such state. GOP gains last November of three in the senate and seven in the house built advantages of 24-11 and 47-18 respectively. In Colorado, unlike Idaho, however, not all GOP legislators can be counted on to back for-less, or to vote to override a veto.

Right now, Democratic Governor Richard Lamm presides. But he has announced he won't run again. A combination of a GOP governor and additional legislators committed to for-less elected in 1986 would put the state within reach of the open-shoppers. So, what do you think they're going to do between now and then?

New Mexico often has teetered on the brink of passage of an open shop law. More than once, only a governor's veto stopped it. The present Democratic governor, Tony Anaya, can not succeed himself. A Republican gubernatorial victory in 1986, with GOP legislative gains, would put the state on the priority list of the Right to Work (for less) Committee.

In Indiana, too, for-less always looms as a possibility. The state once had the law but repealed it. Presently, a proposal is in the state legislature to apply open shop to teachers. If successful, it would undoubtedly be the foot in the door for a full-scale open shop law after 1986 elections.

The sitting GOP governor is not up until 1988. The GOP at present has a 3-2 edge in both houses. It would take only modest Republican gains in 1986 to forge a solid pro-open shop vote.

So . . . who's your state representative and who's your state senator? And where do they stand on open shop and other issues important to working people?

It pays to know.

2 nominated for seats on Labor Board

President Reagan has moved to fill the two vacancies on the National Labor Relations Board with another management lawyer and a career NLRB attorney.

Reagan announced the nominations of Marshall B. Babson, a partner in a New Haven, Conn., law firm, and Wilford W. Johansen, director of the NLRB's Region 21 in Los Angeles. They would fill vacancies that have left the five-member board short-handed since the fall of 1983.

Babson represented Leon's Restaurant in New Haven during a bitter 1983 strike by waitresses seeking recognition of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees as their bargaining representative. The strike, which began Nov. 29, 1983, was settled early last year without agreement on recognition. His law firm, Wiggin & Dana, also is local counsel for Yale University, whose dispute with HERE over white collar salaries and pay equity was settled early this year.

Babson, 39, is a Democrat, but worked for Reagan's election in 1980 and 1984. He also worked briefly for a San Francisco law firm that represented employers in labor disputes. He was nominated to succeed Don A. Zimmerman for a term ending Aug. 27, 1988.

Career man

Johansen, 56, first joined the NLRB legal staff in 1958 and has been Region 21 director since 1971. He was acting general counsel of the NLRB from Apr. 27 to Oct. 12 of last year, after which Reagan named Rosemary Collyer as general counsel in a recess appointment. Johansen is a political independent and is regarded in both labor and management circles as a skilled profesisonal.

The current board members—all of whom were appointed by Reagan—include two other former management attorneys, Chairman Donald Dotson and Patricia Diaz Dennis. The third member is Robert P. Hunter, who came to the NLRB after service as chief counsel and chief of staff for the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee under Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). Collyer, the general counsel, also was a management attorney.

The AFL-CIO has protested both the delay in filling the NLRB vacancies as a principal cause of the heavy case backlog and Reagan's stacking of the board in favor of employers. Federation President Lane Kirkland last May charged that the Administration had gone "beyond the bounds of decency" in its NLRB appointments. Kirkland noted that past administrations, both Democratic and Republican, "had pretty well observed" an understanding that NLRB appointees wouldn't be active partisans of unions or management.

Put nation's needs first, labor tells budget panel

At House budget hearings, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue with Legislative Director Ray Denison and Research Director Rudy Oswald, right, and Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor.

Donahue hits moral gap in Reagan plan

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO branded the Reagan Administration's budget morally as well as fiscally unbalanced and called on Congress to substitute its independent assessment of national needs and priorities.

"Ask first what the nation needs," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue urged at a House Budget Committee hearing.

The one thing the United States can't tolerate is continued massive unemployment, Donahue stressed. Yet "the President's budget would destroy more than a half-million jobs," he said, and "many times more" are being wiped out by the Administration's monetary and foreign trade policies.

The Budget Committee, which is responsible for a resolution setting spending levels and revenue goals, met in an unusual night session to hear Donahue and leaders of business groups.

Donahue presented the economic program shaped by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month and stressed in his remarks the concept of government "as an instrument created to advance the interests of all our citizens."

Citizen needs

Americans "look to their government to provide for the nation's security," he said. But they also expect government to concern itself with health, education, opportunity for its citizens—and "to alleviate distress that individuals cannot cope with."

The men and women who make up the trade union movement "do the nation's work, fight its wars and pay most of its taxes," Donahue said. The movement they built speaks not just for those with jobs but "for all who want to work and for all who can no longer work."

Jobless duration longer as rate hovers at 7.3%

By James M. Shevis

A slight drop of one-tenth of 1 percent in the civilian jobless rate to 7.3 percent in February left 8.4 million persons still without work and pointed up the continuing problems in the manufacturing sector.

While employment in the service-producing sector grew by 255,000 jobs, there was a loss of 75,000 manufacturing jobs and an unusually large drop in the factory workweek, to 40 hours from 40.6.

Although the declines in the goods-producing industries were pervasive, they were felt mainly by workers in the auto industry, which sustained a loss of 25,000 jobs over the month. Auto employment levels had been particularly strong in recent months.

Elsewhere among durable goods industries, large declines occurred in the lumber and wood products, machinery and fabricated metals industries, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said in a report.

By historical standards, last month's 7.3-percent jobless rate was still high. Between the Great Depression of the 1930s and 1975, unemployment never climbed so high even at the trough of a recession.

The BLS unemployment rate understates the true extent of joblessness because it does not take into account the number of discouraged workers holding part-time jobs because they are unable to find anything better.

The Full Employment Action Council said that if these groups of workers are included, the real unemployment rate in February was 12.9 percent.

The February report on joblessness showed a rise in black unemployment. While the jobless rate for white workers dropped slightly, from 6.4 to 6.2 percent, the unemployment rate for blacks surged

Long-term unemployed

400,000 facing loss of benefits

Nearly 400,000 long-unemployed workers will be cut off from benefits at the end of March unless Congress extends the Federal Supplemental Compensation program, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison reminded members of the House Ways & Means Committee.

Denison's letter to committee members noted that the duration of unemployment has continued to rise even though there has been little change in the overall jobless rate in recent months. But the percentage of unemployed workers jobless for 27 weeks has gone up from 14.6 in January to 16 percent at latest count.

For most workers, the federal program is the only recourse after exhaustion of the usual 26-week maximum for state benefits, Denison noted. Only Alaska, West Virginia and Puerto Rico still provide the additional 13 weeks of combined state-federal benefits that helped bridge the gap in previous years.

The federal FSC program provides an additional eight weeks of benefits in most states, with up to 14 weeks in the highest-unemployment states.

In the Senate, the spotlight was on the Budget Committee's attempt to reshape President Reagan's proposals into a more palatable package.

Narrow edge

Republicans hold a 12-10 majority on the committee. But there were only four votes for a motion to approve the Reagan budget.

The committee began with a series of preliminary votes that included bipartisan rejection of Reagan's call for a pay cut for federal workers and a military spending increase substantially less than that which the President had sought.

But with the total cuts below a deficit reduction target and Reagan forcefully declaring his intent to veto any tax increase, committee Republicans caucused and decided to push through their own package, even though it contained provisions unacceptable to Democrats.

It includes a freeze on social security benefits, eliminating the cost-of-living increase next year. It would cut Amtrak subsidies, mass transit aid, revenue-sharing and urban development grants — but not as drastically as Reagan had sought. Agricultural supports would be kept at current levels, $6 billion over Reagan's budget.

The package was pushed through by an 11-9 vote, but further changes are likely before a resolution is brought to the Senate floor.

Endowment for Democracy bolsters free trade unions

The National Endowment for Democracy has enabled labor, business and other non-government groups to aid in the development of democratic institutions in other countries, and should be reauthorized, the AFL-CIO urged Congress.

Endowment funding, begun last year, has given American labor the opportunity to support struggling democratic unions in ways that would not otherwise have been possible, Executive Director Eugenia Kemble of the AFL-CIO Free Trade Union Institute told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee.

"We believe that such support for democratic unions is support for democracy itself," she said. The subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Daniel Mica (D-Fla.), is considering an Administration request for a $31.3-million authorization for the coming fiscal year, including $13.8 million earmarked for the Free Trade Union Institute.

In a statement submitted to the panel, Kemble said that endowment-funded programs provide a new and different approach to safeguarding and promoting human rights.

Current policy

"The United States posture on human rights has concentrated on economic sanctions, military aid cutoffs, expressions of outrage, and loan denials as ways of pressuring governments whose democratic and human rights standards we abhor.

"While these are often useful techniques, we have largely ignored their fundamental complement—the ability of private domestic groups in these countries, particularly labor, business, and political parties, to develop the power to obtain basic rights and to protect them once they are granted.

"Certainly, the commitment of public funds to such private needs is in our own national interest as well as in the interest of democracy," she said.

Without free trade unions, Kemble stressed, governments can easily ignore their promises and rule arbitrarily and undemocratically. Thus, American labor's help to aspiring democratic unions abroad is consistent with NED's larger purpose of building democracy, she said.

Not only do democratic unions in other countries need help just to enable them to consolidate and grow, but they also need it to compete effectively with international efforts to subvert democratic trade unionism, Kemble warned.

The Free Trade Union Institute is beginning the work of establishing a trade union rights monitoring apparatus to collect data on government efforts to intimidate unionists the world over, Kemble said.

Aid to unions

In countries where democratic unions face challenges from hostile governments or rival anti-democratic unions, FTUI has provided assistance for those unions to carry on, she said. Technical assistance, plus transportation and communication help, have gone to free unions in Chad, Cyprus, Fiji, Papua New Guinea as well as in Chile, Portugal, Poland and elsewhere.

Other funding has helped groups in Latin America and the Philippines seeking to promote democratic principles and has assisted trade union exiles.

"All such FTUI activities are supported only in response to initiatives taken by host unions," Kemble stressed. "All comply with the laws of host governments. All conform to the NED policy that no funds be used to finance the campaigns of candidates for public office."

Kemble noted that all of these efforts have been carried out with more limited funds than the existing authorizing legislation intended. While the same amount, $31.3 million, was budgeted in fiscal 1985 as is now sought in fiscal 1986, Congress appropriated only $18.5 million overall for the Endowment last year.

Printing unions cancel merger vote

The Typographical Union and the Graphic Communications Union canceled a scheduled Apr. 10 referendum on a proposed merger. The ITU executive council called off the referendum after the GCIU executive board voted against the merger proposal.

ITU President Robert S. McMichen said he was disappointed at the GCIU action, but he stressed that the ITU is financially sound and said the development will not affect the union's ability to represent and serve the needs of its 74,000 active and retired members.

The ITU leadership will be considering further options in the weeks ahead, McMichen said.

The AFL-CIO also expressed regret at the development. "But it does not change our commitment to help the unions in the printing trades to better represent their members, which we think can best be accomplished by merger within the national house of labor," the federation said.

Macy's store pact brings gains for 6,000 in RWDSU

New York — Some 6,000 members of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union approved a new four-year contract with R. H. Macy & Co. providing substantial increases in wages and benefits.

The agreement, ratified by a vote of 12 to 1, gives members of RWDSU Local 1-S a $20 weekly pay hike retroactive to Feb. 1, and weekly raises of $15 in each remaining contract year, for a total of $65 a week over term. The contract covers workers at Macy's stores in New York City and White Plains.

Other highlights include increases in pension benefits and insurance coverage and a new prescription drug maintenance program. All company giveback proposals were successfully resisted.

Employees who retire with 10 years' service now will receive a minimum pension of $47.50 a month. Those with 30 to 40 years of service will draw minimum benefits of $10 a month per year of service with a maximum of $400 a month, up from $8.50 and $340, respectively.

Major medical health coverage was raised from $50,000 to $75,000. Group life insurance was increased from $3,000 to $4,000. Employees will receive a second optional holiday annually.

Postal budget slash termed threat to union publications

One of the cuts the Reagan Administration is demanding in the domestic federal budget would have a devastating effect on the nonprofit press—including the publications of labor, religious, veterans and farm groups—the International Labor Communications Association told Congress.

The cuts would eliminate all federal support for nonprofit second- and third-class postal rates along with discounted rates for publications mailed to subscribers located in the same county.

For the labor press, the cuts would mean immediate increases in mail costs of 95 to 175 percent, the ILCA said in testimony submitted to the House Subcommittee on Postal Operations & Services.

The proposed hikes would come on top of increases in rates for nonprofit publications in recent years that have been higher than those for any other class of mailer, ILCA President Robert J. Kalaski and Sec.-Treas. James M. Cesnik pointed out. They urged Congress to appropriate the full amount necessary to continue the limited postal subsidy for nonprofit groups.

Representatives of other nonprofit mailers voiced similar opposition to the Reagan proposal. So did representatives of some for-profit mailers.

The earlier increases caused many labor papers to curb their frequency and size and others ceased publication, Kalaski and Cesnik stressed.

For Congress to cave in to the Administration's demand would be another step toward limiting First Amendment rights to the price of stamps, ILCA said.

The higher postal rates would undermine the intent of Congress to encourage the free and open exchange of information and differing points of view, they pointed out.

Noting that a portion of the subsidy was mandated by Congress in 1974, the ILCA said the labor press views that legislation as "a contract between the Congress and the nonprofit press that was signed by the President."

ILO rebuffs Soviet bloc on worker rights

Geneva—Soviet objections failed to deter the International Labor Organization from going ahead with plans for a study seeking better ways of setting international standards for protecting the world's workers.

The Soviet government had sought unsuccessfully to get the ILO Governing Body to direct the 40-member review committee to consider changes in the procedures for checking on compliance with ILO standards by member countries.

The Communist bloc has contended that ILO investigations of worker rights violations in countries such as Poland represent unacceptable "interference" in the internal affairs of sovereign nations.

At a news conference announcing his country's refusal to take part in the study, Soviet delegate Leonid Kostin cited as an example of such "interference" the condemnation by an ILO commission of inquiry of the Polish government for having banned the Solidarnosc free trade union movement and its leaders—in violation of Poland's commitments under the ILO's freedom of association convention.

AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown, who is the U.S. worker delegate to the ILO Governing Body, said the overwhelming majority of ILO members had clearly rejected communist attacks on the monitoring of worker rights.

The majority sentiment in the ILO, he said, is that standard-setting is the organization's most important function and the ILO's watchdog role should be improved, not weakened.

Soviet protests

The USSR's Kostin also protested that a committee on which Brown represents the worker delegates had bottled up Soviet proposals to involve the ILO in debates on "peace and disarmament."

Brown, addressing the Governing Body, stressed that the ILO is fully committed by its constitution to promote peace by working for social justice. It should continue on this course, he urged, and not attempt "to do the work of the United Nations."

The Governing Body approved a proposal by ILO Director Francis Blanchard to convene a special meeting of experts on chemical and other industrial hazards in the wake of the disasters at Union Carbide's plant at Bhopal, India, and a gas plant in Mexico City.

Expert guidance will be sought on safety precautions in hazardous industries and on the production and storage of chemical products.

Court cracks down on anti-union 'persuaders'

Cincinnati — Management lawyers who try to "persuade" workers to reject union representation must file disclosure reports required by the Landrum-Griffin Act, the 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals ruled here.

Its decision was a setback to a Chattanooga, Tenn., law firm hired by Southern Silk Mills, Inc., to help beat back a 1977 organizing effort by the Clothing & Textile Workers.

The law firm of Humphreys, Hutcheson & Moseley didn't deny its activist role in the campaign, including captive audience speeches by two of the partners to groups of workers. But it said the reporting requirements weren't applicable because the speakers had been properly identified as company attorneys and no "covert" activity was involved.

One attorney's speech, quoted in the appellate court decision, referred to the union as "a company of infidels" led by "New Yorkers" whose only interest in coming "down here" was "taking money out of people's paychecks" for union dues.

The appeals court's 3-0 decision rejected the argument that Congress intended only to force disclosure of covert activity by persons hired to influence workers.

'Suspect' activity

Congress considered all persuader activity as "suspect," Judge Bailey Brown wrote in the decision and did not distinguish between "legitimate and nefarious" actions. Its intent was to curb all such activities "by subjecting persuaders to glaring publicity."

Firms or management consultants found subject to the law are required to file both monthly reports and comprehensive annual reports that disclose all receipts from all employers for labor relations advice or services. The disclosure must show all disbursements made in connection with labor relations advice and services, and the purpose of each disbursement.

The Tennessee law firm's fallback position was that if the law indeed required it to report such information, it would violate the attorney-client relationship and have a chilling effect on First Amendment rights. Other labor relations clients would be reluctant to employ a law firm obligated to make its ties a matter of public record, the argument went.

The court said lawyers who engage solely in providing legal service and representation aren't affected by the reporting requirements. But if they choose to take on an activist role in labor relations, they can't hide behind the lawyer-client relationship.

Weak argument

As for the firm's expressed fears that identification of its client list would embarrass the companies on it and perhaps subject them to union boycotts, the court held this was mere speculation. It did not involve the threat of physical harm and loss of employment that was a factor in a Supreme Court precedent protecting the NAACP from a forced disclosure of its membership list.

The Labor Dept. notified the law firm of its obligation to file disclosure reports in 1978 and the order was upheld in a 1983 ruling by a federal district court.

Housing cuts seen forcing more families to double up

Many more families will be doubling up and moving in with relatives if Congress goes along with President Reagan's budget proposals, the AFL-CIO warned.

Reagan has proposed a two-year moratorium on new federal housing assistance, coupled with a sharp cutback in community development funds used for housing rehabilitation and housing for the homeless.

That would rip huge holes in an already riddled safety net for the poor, Henry B. Schechter testified for the AFL-CIO at House hearings. Schechter, who heads the Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, said that a shortage of affordable housing is approaching the critical stage.

Instead of a halt to housing assistance, Schechter urged, Congress should pass the broadly supported housing bill introduced by Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez (D-Tex.) and assigned the coveted designation of H.R. 1. Gonzalez is chairman of the Housing & Community Development subcommittee holding hearings on the issue.

Low-rent housing

The labor-backed bill would authorize funds for additional low-rent public housing, provide housing for the elderly and handicapped, and set up a homeownership program for families up to the medial income.

It got a strong endorsement and high-priority designation from the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting.

In related testimony, before the House Budget Committee, National Housing Conference President Floyd H. Hyde expressed "outrage" at the Reagan Administration's abandonment of housing and community development commitments.

Hyde, who serves as chairman of the AFL-CIO's Housing Investment Trust, is former Under Secretary of Housing & Urban Development. He urged Congress not to let itself be stampeded into "further weakening of the nation's social fabric by way of more devastating cuts in domestic programs."

Since 1981, Hyde reminded the Budget Committee, "housing programs serving the nation's low- and moderate-income persons and the elderly have been cut by some 67 percent—far more than any other program."

Schechter noted in his testimony that the number of families living doubled-up had dropped to a post-World War II low of 1.4 million in 1979, but had risen to more than twice that number last year.

Worsening shortage

The housing squeeze isn't limited to low-income households, Schechter noted. At current prices and interest levels, two out of three American families couldn't afford to buy homes. And rental units are becoming scarcer as well as less affordable.

But for low-income families, the shortage is critical, Schechter testified. Federal funding has been cut back in recent years and the number of housing starts under federally assisted programs has been declining. The number of new starts plus substantially rehabilitated federally assisted housing units dropped from 144,000 in 1981 to 42,000 in 1984, he noted, and are projected to decline still further. The "pipeline" of previously authorized projects "is emptying out."

Proposed cuts in community development as well as housing programs would "seriously aggravate our national housing problems in future years," Schechter said. And it would keep construction industry unemployment at unacceptably high levels.

In endorsing H.R. 1, Schechter noted that it would not require high outlays from the fiscal 1986 budget but would set in motion programs that would significantly help to relieve the housing shortage.

Schechter asked the panel to consider also legislation to provide mortgage payment loans so that homeowners who lose their jobs can avoid foreclosure.

Cutbacks protested

"Devastating cutbacks" in federally assisted housing are protested at House Budget Committee hearings by Floyd Hyde, right, president of the labor-backed National Housing Conference. Other witnesses, from left, Presidents Willard Gourley, Mortgage Banks Association; John Koelemij, National Association of Home Builders, and David Roberts, National Association of Realtors.

Labor calls on budget panel to put nation's needs first

dress their needs, Donahue said. "It calls for more and faster growth in military spending and for more and deeper cuts in domestic programs, and it rests on a tax structure that is unfair and incapable of meeting the nation's needs."

The AFL-CIO dissents from President Reagan's contention that the huge budget deficit makes it necessary to abandon domestic commitments and "deny government services to the middle- and low-income people who provide the major sources of the nation's tax revenues."

Donahue voiced the AFL-CIO's strong opposition to Administration budget proposals that would penalize middle-class Americans as well as those at the bottom of the economic ladder.

"Many of the things the President says the country can't afford are things we can't afford not to do," Donahue said. He attacked proposals that would:

- Demolish federal training and employment efforts and cut off unemployment compensation for those most in need.
- Cut deeply federal aid to education, "including the college tuition programs on which working families rely to give their children a better start in life."
- Eliminate revenue sharing, the Economic Development Administration and support for Amtrak and cut back community development, housing and mass transit programs.
- Make further cuts in Medicare, Medicaid and child nutrition programs.
- Cut the pay and pensions of federal employees, "who have already been shortchanged again and again."
- Repudiate promises to veterans and ignore the plight of family farmers.

In response to questions about Reagan's attack on federal employees, Donahue reminded the panel of the congressional promise of salary comparability with the private sector—a promise that has repeatedly been broken. As a result, he noted, federal pay scales are some 18 percent below the comparability line even as Reagan proposes new takebacks.

Donahue suggested that a return to full employment goals would be the biggest contribution to bringing down the federal deficit. The trade deficit alone, he noted, has cost the nation some 3 million jobs.

Each one percent of unemployment costs the Treasury about $32 billion in lost tax revenues, he said, plus some $7 billion in additional social outlays.

A policy that perpetuates high unemployment is wasteful and irresponsible as fiscal policy, Donahue said. And "as social policy, it is wicked."

Social security is not responsible for the deficit and "the deficit should not be used as an excuse for neglecting the old, disinheriting the young, and depriving the middle class."

Real cause

Donahue reminded the House panel that the massive deficit is the product of the 1981 tax cut Reagan pushed through, the accumulated burden of high interest rates, the economic drag of continued high unemployment and the vast expansion of military spending.

Congress can narrow the revenue gap and make the tax system fairer by closing corporate tax loopholes, Donahue said. But the AFL-CIO will oppose "proposals that unfairly pile new taxes on middle-class Americans who are already bearing their fair share of the tax burden."

It's up to Congress, Donahue urged, to demonstrate the "sense of responsibility" that has been lacking in the Administration on taxes and spending.

Donahue said Reagan's repeated use of veto threats, and his actual veto of the farmer assistance bill, reflect the President's apparent belief "that one of the things this country can't afford is an independent Congress."

Compensation claims upheld for deaths tied to job stress

Providence, R.I.—The widow of a newspaper sports writer who died of a stroke is entitled to workers' compensation benefits because her husband's death was stress-related, the state Supreme Court ruled.

Its unanimous decision upheld the determination of Rhode Island's Workers' Compensation Commission that Edward Mulcahey's wife was entitled to compensation because his death was job-related. Mulcahey, a member of Newspaper Guild Local 41, died after covering a football game in 1978 for the Pawtucket Times.

The commission ruled the job's deadline pressure and work hours aggravated Mulcahey's high blood pressure and diabetes, contributing to his death. But the newspaper's management argued that medical experts could not prove any one specific incident brought on Mulcahey's stroke and appealed the commission's decision.

"An employer takes its workers as it finds them," the court said. "When the employer aggravates an existing condition and the result is an incapacity for work, the employee is entitled to compensation for such incapacity."

Mrs. Mulcahey will receive $55,000 in retroactive compensation benefits and weekly payments of $200 for the rest of her life as a result of the court's finding.

In an earlier case, the South Carolina Court of Appeals also upheld the payment of workers' compensation benefits for stress-related disabilities. That court ruled unanimously that the widow of a Greenville, S.C., drive-in restaurant worker was entitled to state compensation benefits because her husband's heart attack was related to stress on the job.

New approaches for unions to meet workers' needs

The following is a summary of recommendations in the recent report of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work, titled "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Union":

► Unions should experiment with new approaches to represent workers and should address new issues of concern to workers. Many workers, while supporting the concept of organization, wish to forward their interests in ways other than what they view as the traditional form of union representation. For example, in some units workers may desire a representative to negotiate minimum guarantees that will serve as a floor for individual bargaining. In other units, a bargaining approach based on solving problems through arbitration or mediation may be most effective.

Unions must also seek out and address new issues of concern to workers, such as pay equity for women workers and greater participation in workplace decisions.

► Consideration should be given to establishing new categories of membership for workers not employed in an organized bargaining unit. A substantial number of employees in non-union workplaces are workers who formerly were union members and left their union jobs or who supported a union representation effort that fell short, and these workers might well be interested in affiliating with a union, especially if the costs are not prohibitive and the union offers services and benefits outside the collective bargaining context.

► The AFL-CIO should undertake a study of providing direct services and benefits to workers outside of a collective bargaining structure. A large number of non-union workers desire job-related services and benefits that are not normally available to them. The labor movement provides a logical vehicle for meeting these employee desires, and doing so could introduce some non-union workers to the benefits provided by union representation. A feasibility study should be done to determine what services can be provided on a cost-effective basis, what vehicle would be most effective in providing such services and to whom the services should be made available.

► Unions should expand their use of the electronic media. It is imperative that, within the limits of our resources, we mount and sustain a coordinated and long-range communications program, employing every technique and medium available. We are committed to reversing the near invisibility of American trade unions and their members in TV and radio programming and to

"Return to Basics" For the Nation's Unions

After a stunning political defeat, leaders of organized workers are giving top priority to rebuilding ranks.

BAL HARBOUR, Fla.

It's back to the basics for organized labor.

After mobilizing thousands of workers and spending millions of dollars on the unsuccessful presidential campaign of Walter Mondale, unions are putting fresh emphasis on the nuts and bolts of rebuilding their thinning ranks.

Gathering here in late February for the annual winter meeting of the AFL-CIO's executive council, veteran labor leaders repeatedly stressed an urgent need for membership gains if labor is ever to recapture the muscle it once had at the bargaining table and at the polls.

sure tactic called a "corporate campaign" against companies. The increasingly popular technique employs proxy fights, pressure on a company's major creditors and other public displays of opposition when labor disputes arise. In organizing, the aim will be to stop employers from actively opposing unionization.

▪ Greater use of modern communications technology to explain to unorganized workers what unionization is about. This would include small-group video sessions and strategic advertising campaigns to get a union's message across.

▪ More involvement and personal contact in organizing by union leaders and rank-and-file members, as well as polling of prospective members to gauge their attitudes toward unionization and the likelihood of success.

ger workers. Among these are pay equity and participation in the decision-making process at the workplace.

Behind these and other recommendations made by the federation's Committee on the Evolution of Work is a plunge in membership that has reduced organized labor's power and contributed to serious setbacks at the bargaining table.

Government figures confirm the erosion. In the first report of its kind from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics since 1980, new data show union membership dropping to 18.8 percent of all wage-and-salary workers in 1984 from 23 percent four years earlier. That represents a slide in members from 20.1 million to 17.3 million, or a falloff of 13.9 percent.

More important, the statistics illustrate what experts say is still organized labor's greatest weakness—its inability, over all, to offset substantial membership declines in old-line, heavy industries with growth in the booming service sector of the economy. While manufacturing membership has plunged from 32.3 percent in 1980 to 26 percent in 1984, the union share in services has

Labor's Study: Blend of Old and New

By WILLIAM SERRIN
Special to The New York Times

BAL HARBOUR, Fla., Feb. 22 — Confronted with difficulty after difficulty, the American labor movement has taken a long, serious look at itself.

A report on this examination, two and a half years in the making, describes changes in work, here and abroad, and what effect these changes are having on American unions. It is a remarkably candid, self-critical document, particularly for an institution not often given to self-examination, one which, critics have long said, is stuck in the past, defensive and slow to change.

News Analysis

Many of the proposals in the report are not new, said Lane Kirkland, president of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, whose 35-member executive council approved the report this week. Some proposals are already in use by unions. Some seem surprisingly late for a major institution in American life.

Report as a Blueprint

But many labor representatives here are exuberant that the proposals have been adopted, and say they are convinced the report can be a blueprint for

Workers of America, not a member of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., is placing major reliance on rank-and-file organizers, one of the proposals in the report.

The United Fruit and Commercial Workers is using television advertising to confront companies; numerous unions are using other electronic communications techniques, and modern accounting and policy and analysis techniques have long been stressed.

As for union mergers, there have been numerous in recent years, with the number of unions in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. decreasing from 135 in 1955, when the two labor groups themselves merged, to 96 today.

Such proposals, by themselves, are not automatic solutions.

Mergers of ossified unions bring only larger ossified unions, critics say.

The Emphasis on Electronics

And there is so much talk in the labor movement of using television and other electronic communication techniques, it sometimes seems the fact that the American labor movement was built by tough, exuberant, innovative leaders, not by communications techniques, is being disregarded.

"Problems are caused by solutions," said Mr. Kirkland, who enjoys a droll joke.

pushed by many companies, with one level for new workers and another for older workers; the weakening of many master industry contracts; labor laws that, many experts say, make it far more difficult to organize in the United States than in many other Western industrialized nations, and the use of tough, antilabor consultants by many employers to thwart unionism.

Commitment Being Lost

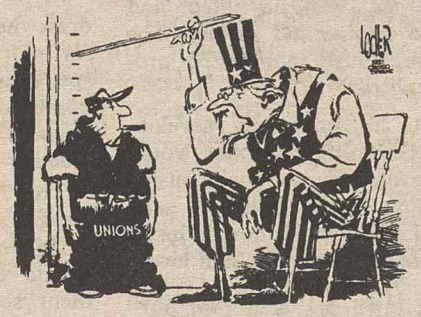
Morton Bahr of New York, a vice president of the Communications Workers of America, who is scheduled to become president of the union this summer, also noted that many unions "have lost some of the old commitment."



But many unionists here are buoyed by the report, which concludes with a statement made by Eugene V. Debs, the Socialist and railroad union leader, after the Pullman strike of 1894:

"Ten thousand times has the labor movement stumbled and bruised itself. We have been enjoined by the courts, assaulted by thugs, charged by the militia, traduced by the press, frowned upon in public opinion, and deceived by politicians.

"But notwithstanding all this and all these, labor is today the most vital and

Dawning of a 'new day' for U.S. labor . . .

By David S. Broder

WASHINGTON — The headlines speak of a miners' strike being broken in Britain, and of Pan American's workers staging a walkout that threatens the future of that American flag carrier. Union writers in Hollywood and New York risked the public's ire by a strike that could have cut off favorite soap operas and situation comedies. The Bureau of Labor Statistics puts out a report saying that union membership in the United States dropped below 20 percent of the labor force — to 18.8 percent, actually — in 1984, continuing a steady downward trend.

It is an odd time to talk about a "new day" for the American trade-union movement. But it is possible that future historians may see the winter of 1985 as some kind of a turning point. At the meeting of the AFL-CIO executive council in Bal Harbour, Fla., in February, the labor leaders approved and issued a report, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," that clearly suggomed as the real engines of opportunity and progress.

The union movement has been social change — as being more worried about protecting past gains than in helping its people prepare for the future.

In the largest sense, the AFL-CIO report is a declaration by labor's top leaders that they are ready to tackle that future. It is a remarkable document.

Starting with the blunt declaration on the first page that "unions find themselves behind the pace of change," it documents the growing gap between the perceived positions of union leaders and the desires of the rapidly changing work force where, as the report says, people "are less likely to see work as a straight economic transaction providing a means of survival and more likely to see it as a means of self-expression and self-development."

Candidly citing survey findings that a majority of nonunion workers believe union leaders force members to accept decisions they don't like, including strike decisions, and that unions stifle individual initiative, fight change and increase the risk of companies going out of business, the successful on either score."

There are several dozen specific recommendations for experiments in organizing and representation techniques that individual unions have begun to discuss or, in some instances, put into place. But the report is optimistic about the ability of unions to adapt. The reasons may surprise you as much as they did me.

The most important of those reasons is that unions are middle-class institutions and are still a ticket to the middle class. Union workers earn one-third more than their nonunion counterparts, the report says. They recruit best among the elements that are growing fastest in the work force, especially the better-educated.

Only 26 percent of union members (compared to 28 percent of the general population) lack a high-school the committee that prepared the report, pointed out in an interview, how successful the unions will be in organizing the new work force depends critically on the labor laws. Canada and the United States have similar economies, but very different labor laws. In Canada, where the laws favor organizing, the percentage of the labor force in unions has grown from 30 to 40 percent in the

Unions Admit Errors, Call for Reforms in Harsh Study

By HARRY BERNSTEIN, Times Labor Writer

BAL HARBOUR, Fla.—The AFL-CIO released Thursday the harshest self-assessment it has ever made, a 2½-year study in which it concedes that it has made serious errors in pursuing its goals and in which it advocates a series of major internal reforms necessary to keep pace with the "magnitude and velocity of change in the work place."

The study said that unions should consider abandoning the traditional labor contract in some cases. Instead, unions could negotiate minimum wage and working condition guarantees that would serve as a floor for individual bargaining between employees and employers, thus allowing workers greater rewards for enterprise and talent.

In addition, the report said that strikes could almost be eliminated if disputes were resolved through arbitration, a process now rarely used to reach contract agreements.

Such steps could "enable unions to remain the authentic voice of workers and their chosen vehicle for expressing their will," said the report, compiled by 28 union leaders with the assistance of a panel of labor experts from business and academia. It was released at the annual meeting here of the AFL-CIO executive council.

"It is not enough to search for more effective ways of doing what we always have done," said AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. "We must expand our notion of what it is workers can do through their unions."

Labor Tries to Revive Embattled Movement

By HENRY WEINSTEIN, Times Labor Writer

BAL HARBOUR, Fla.—These have not been easy times for Bill Bywater, the energetic, 64-year-old head of an organization once known as the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers.

Last year, Bywater told his staff that the union, whose membership had plunged from 360,000 to 180,000 since 1970, no longer had an appropriate name because it no longer represented any workers making radios.

So Bywater took a step that he thought was long overdue and dropped "radio" from the title. "I first suggested that to our president, Jim Carey, in 1964 when I realized all the radio work had gone offshore to foreign countries," Bywater recalled in an interview here. "He went berserk."

That little step of changing the union's name, in some ways the least painful of many tough decisions Bywater has had to make since he fulfilled a teen-age dream and became president of the union in 1981—is symbolic of the hard times that have befallen the nation's labor movement.

Labor Leaders Adopt Blueprint for Change

AFL-CIO Executive Council Sets Path Toward Reinvigorating Unions

By Peter Perl
Washington Post Staff Writer

BAL HARBOUR, Fla., Feb.21—Leaders of the 13-million-member AFL-CIO today adopted a blueprint for reinvigorating organized labor, including more mergers of its 96 unions, new recruitment methods, better use of the media, and new cooperative and confrontational tactics for dealing with employers.

The report acknowledges that "unions find themselves behind the pace of change" in American society. But it says current "prophesies of doom and despair" are similar to those of the 1920s and 1930s, when unions were considered to be dying but rebounded by altering strategies to fit the times.

The AFL-CIO said it endorses cooperative approaches with employers, such as "quality of work-life" programs, but said those approaches must be coupled with "true equality" in decision-making between workers and managers.

The changes—recommended by a 25-member top-level AFL-CIO study committee—in most cases would have to be approved by individual unions.

The recommend from public opinion unions by pollsters Lc
Peter D. Hart, and commissioned by from labor experts at versity, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Xerox Corp. and other institutions.

The recommendations include:

▪ Actively promoting mergers to improve the clout of individual unions, and adopting new guidelines for mergers. (The AFL-CIO announced today the tentative merger of the 241,000-member Paperworkers, and the 124,000-member Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers into the United Paperworkers, Energy and Chemical Workers.)

▪ Establishing new categories of union membership at nonunion work places. By offering benefits such as supplemental medical or life insurance, job-training assistance or other inducements, unions could set up low-cost membership to "introduce nonunion workers to the benefits provided by union representation."

▪ Setting up mechanisms to stop costly and "wasteful" battles between unions competing to organize the same group of workers.

▪ Experimenting with new forms of collective bargaining. Workers often do not want traditional "adversarial" bargaining and formal employment contracts, the report said. Unions instead could provide "access to media to combat the "near invisibility" of unions on television. The AFL-CIO spends $3 million yearly on television advertising and production, and both the federation and its unions must expand the effort, the report said.

▪ Trying new approaches to organizing. Several government-employe unions began as professional "associations" for workers who originally were not allowed to unionize. The Service Employees union also has formed associations of women office workers who initially were reluctant to unionize. The report recommends that union organizers initially target "particular issues" in work places to win support for unionization.

▪ Promoting the use of so-called "corporate campaigns" employing new methods of pressuring recalcitrant employers. Such efforts include withdrawals of union pension funds, and vigorously publicizing corporate wrongdoing.

"It is a historic blueprint" for change, said Glenn Watts, head of the 700,000-member Communications Workers of America.

William Winpisinger, president of the 700,000-member International Association of Machinists, said that

A 'New Day' for Unions

The headlines speak of a miners' strike broken in Great Britain, and of Pan American workers' staging a walkout that threatens the future of that American flag carrier. Union writers in Hollywood and New York risked the public's ire by a strike that could have cut off favorite soap operas and situation comedies. The Bureau of Labor Statistics puts out a report saying that union membership in the page that "unions find themselves behind the pace of change," it documents the growing gap between the perceived positions of union leaders and the desires of the rapidly changing work force where, as the report says, people "are less likely to see work as a straight economic transaction providing a means of survival and more likely to see it as a means of self-expression and self-development."

roduce new technologies to help make unions more effective.

► Corporate campaigns and the pressure of public opinion should be used to secure the neutrality of employers whose workers seek to organize a union and to assure good-faith bargaining. Although the corporate campaigns that have attracted the most attention were large-scale campaigns at the national level, such as the J. P. Stevens and Beverly Enterprises campaigns, non-workplace pressure can be exerted on a smaller scale as well.

► The AFL-CIO should establish a pilot project of experimental organizing committees. The experience gained in earlier periods of union growth suggests that an entity single-mindedly devoted to helping unorganized workers form unions may be more successful than an ongoing entity whose first priority must be to provide service to its present members. To test this theory, a carefully designed program should be developed, bringing together interested unions, to form committees charged with the task of organizing the unorganized in a given area, industry or company.

► Unions need to provide additional opportunities for members to participate in union affairs in ways quite different from traditional attendance at meetings. A broad range of activities to attract membership participation, improved community services and community-related activities, and an expanded committee structure to provide membership advice and guidance to the leadership are all ways of involving more members in the affairs of their local union. Members also should have more opportunities to interact with their national leaders. Orientation programs should be developed for new members, and greater resources should be devoted to leadership training for officers, stewards and rank-and-file members.

► Efforts should be made to better publicize organized labor's accomplishments. "Labor in the Schools" programs should be developed by central bodies and state federations to provide information about the trade union movement and its contributions to workers and the American society.

In addition, programs to train union representatives in techniques for dealing with the media should be expanded. Union leaders at all levels should meet regularly with reporters to discuss union activities in a non-crisis atmosphere and to provide a trade union perspective on political, economic and social events.

A pilot project should be developed to test the usefulness of advertising to improve the public understanding of labor. And interferences with the right of workers to form unions should be forcefully brought to the attention of the public to develop broad support for labor law reform.

► There must be a renewed emphasis on organizing. The large increase in the workforce and in the extent of employer opposition requires an equal increase in the emphasis placed on, and the resources devoted to, organizing. Organizers should be carefully chosen and trained to suit the targets of organizing campaigns, and greater use should be made of modern communications technology to reach non-union workers in organizing drives.

► Union leaders and rank-and-file members should be more involved in organizing efforts. Renewed emphasis must be given to bringing the benefits of trade unionism to the unorganized as a prime function of every labor organization. Rank-and-file members are the best witnesses of union effectiveness, and organizing activity gives them another opportunity to expand their participation in the affairs of their union.

► Unions should make special efforts to attract those who belong to organized bargaining units but have not joined their union. These workers are known by the local leadership and are a natural audience for the union's message, and every effort should be made to turn them from free riders to full and enthusiastic members. These "internal organizing" campaigns can produce a far more closely knit work group and can add to the union's effectiveness in the workplace.

► A number of structural changes within the labor movement would enhance our overall effectiveness. For many smaller unions, mergers offer the best hope for continuing to serve their members. The AFL-CIO should develop guidelines to determine when mergers are appropriate, and help should be given in resolving the complex issues that arise in the merger process.

The AFL-CIO should establish a mechanism for resolving organizing disputes among unions, so as to eliminate wasteful competition for the same bargaining units.

A new method of funding state and local central bodies should be developed. It is essential in the current climate that labor's voice be effectively heard at the state and local levels as well as at the national level. At present, the state federations are funded by only some unions although they benefit all unions. This means that certain affiliates carry a disproportionate share of the responsibility for sustaining the state federations and that those federations are not as strong as they should be. A similar pattern prevails at the local level.

Leaders of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. Learned Last Week That All Was Not Lost on Election Day

The Union Movement Looks in the Mirror

By WILLIAM SERRIN

BAL HARBOUR, Fla.—The executive council of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. assembles here for a few days every winter on the Florida coast, far removed, it would seem, from the woes of the workaday world.

Last week the attention of many of the delegates at this year's meeting was firmly captured by an unusually frank study, two and a half years in the making, on the future of work and the ways in which profound changes in the workplace, technical and otherwise, are affecting American unions.

Among other things, the study calls for far greater emphasis on participation in unions by their members; reaching out to non-union workers, perhaps through new categories of membership; an easing of the customary adversarial relationships with business, whenever possible; far greater emphasis on organizing, with stress on new, innovative organizing methods.

As has been the case at most of these gatherings in recent years, there was a discernible feeling of depression among union presidents and their staff assistants — although last week's pronouncements on unemployment and other difficulties confronting the working class would, to critics of labor, have a hollow ring, delivered as they were amid the glitter of an ocean-front hotel.

One immediate cause of the gloom was, of course, the fact that the federation's Presidential candidate, Walter F. Mondale, was soundly thrashed by President Reagan last year.

But for all its well-documented woes, the American labor movement appears in some respects to be surprisingly vigorous. Unions in recent weeks have won organizing victories among clerical workers at Yale University and in the Iowa state university system.

Elsewhere, unions have shown strength in attracting white-collar and other professionals, including engineers, and are finding that many women are signing up.

Unionism is reported to be strong among American orchestras, around television studios and movie lots and in the sports industry. The Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union is planning a new, spirited organizing campaign. The American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees has taken the lead on the issue of pay equity, seeking to increase the wages of women to the level men earn in comparable jobs.

The depression here might have been further diminished by the study on work and unions, which the A.F.L.-C.I.O. regards as a blueprint for its activity in coming years.

The study, the first of its kind in the federation's 35 years, was the result of efforts by some of the more "progressive" union stalwarts. There have at times been doubts that such a report, which contained a great deal of self-criticism, would ever be completed by the generally slow-moving federation.

Unions 'behind pace of change' but can catch up, report says

FEB 22 1985

By James Warren
Chicago Tribune

BAL HARBOUR, Fla.—The AFL-CIO issued a much-awaited report Thursday on the future of organized labor that admits a drastic decline in membership and a deep skepticism by Americans about the benefits of unions. But it concludes that a "period of resurgence is . . . within our grasp."

The report urges organizations to offer nonunionists some union benefits and services if they pay union dues. It also proposes industry- and company-wide organizing campaigns akin to the historic efforts of the 1930s in the auto and steel industries.

The optimistic outlook is based on a compelling finding of a Harris poll done for the report: There are 27 million former union members in the work force, or 10 million more than the total membership of all unions, and most of them left the unions only because they switched jobs, not because of anti-union sentiment.

The report, which follows two years of study by the AF

More than 75 percent of all workers, union and nonunion, agree that unions improve the working conditions and wages of workers. Moreover, 80 percent agree that unions are needed so that employees' legitimate complaints can be heard.

But a different picture emerged when nonunion workers were asked whether they thought their wages, benefits and job security would improve if their companies went union. A total of 53 percent said they thought their wages and benefits would not improve, while 74 percent said job security probably would not improve.

Further cause for union concern might come from polling data indicating that most workers who are not union members believe that unions do not properly represent their members and that they stifle practices.

First, the report suggests attracting nonmember workers by providing them with services ranging from job-training information to group discounts on consumer products, but doing so outside any formal contractual arrangement. This approach resembles traditional nonunion employee associations, a favorite of teachers and nurses, and polling data indicate that the concept interests workers who are not union members.

Second, it suggests industry-wide and company-wide organizing efforts, instead of what is often a hodgepodge approach. The efforts resemble those used in the steel and auto industries by the Congress of Industrial Organizations led by the legendary John L. Lewis.

The report urges lessening "wasteful competition" among unions in organizing campaigns and calls for more mergers, pointing out that 50 of the AFL-CIO's 96 affiliates have fewer than 50,000 members.

Labor takes hard look at its own difficulties

New York Times News Service

BAL HARBOUR, Fla. — American unions have fallen "behind the pace of change," and should adopt innovative methods for representing their members and for attracting new ones, says a study by the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The frank study, the first of its type in the history of the nearly 35-year-old AFL-CIO, took 2½ years.

"It is not enough merely to search for more effective ways of doing what we always have done," it says. "We must expand our notions of what it is workers can do through their unions."

The report, by the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work, makes numerous suggestions for their jobs might retain union membership. It suggests expanded services for union members and an emphasis on organization.

"I consider this a revolutionary document," said Albert Shanker, president of the American Federation of Teachers, and a member of the AFL-CIO committee.

Lane Kirkland, the federation's president, said the proposals would allow unions to "continue the never-ending process of renewal and regeneration" that will enable them to remain "the authentic voice" of American workers.

The report was approved by the federation's 35-member executive council at its winter meeting here. Glenn E. Watts, president of the Communications Workers of America, and a member of the committee

Realizing Their Power Has Eroded, Unions Try Hard to Change

They Attempt to Determine Workers' Wishes, Adopt New Organizing Tactics

When labor negotiations at Standard Brands Paint Co. hit an impasse last month, the union didn't immediately hit the bricks—it hit the airwaves.

The United Food and Commercial Workers local representing 1,500 clerks and factory workers drew up a budget of $150,000. It bought a big ad in the Los Angeles Times to announce a series of radio commercials protesting the company's demand that the union agree to some concessions before talks could resume.

Within days after the ads went on the air, the California-based retailer dropped its demands, talks resumed and a tentative accord was reached. The company says the commercials didn't influence the negotiations. But Thomas Vandeveld, the president of the local, recalls: "The first thing they said after we got an agreement was, 'Would you pull the spots?' "

In organized labor's heyday, an immediate strike might have been the union's first reaction. But in these days of labor's weakness, unions are having to seek out alternative ways of flexing their limited muscle.

As the AFL-CIO's executive council meets this week in Bal Harbour, Fla., labor's leadership is doing some serious soul-searching. Stung by their own diminishing clout and the overwhelming defeat last fall of their favored presidential candidate, Walter Mondale, the labor chieftains will get a special report today on the changing nature of work and their own future role. The basic message: Unions must seek major innovations in the way they recruit, educate and lead.

Matter of Survival

For the ailing labor movement, retooling for the future may be less a matter of choice than one of survival. It has been battered by the effects of imports, recessions and nonunion competition. While the total number of civilian jobs rose by 5% between 1980 and 1984, union membership fell 13% over the same period. Union contracts settled last year called for the lowest average pay increases in 16 years. Unions now lose one of every two representation elections and three out of four decertification elections. And a 1983 Gallup Poll ranked labor leaders next to last—just above car salesmen—in terms of ethics and honesty.

LABOR'S BOLD PLEDGE TO COME BACK SWINGING

THE NEW STRATEGY COULD TRIGGER THE AFL-CIO'S BIGGEST OFFENSIVE IN 30 YEARS

If organized labor ever recovers from the membership, political, and bargaining losses that have shriveled its strength since 1981, Feb. 21 may be celebrated as the date the resurgence began. On that day, in a nondescript hotel meeting room in Florida, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland overrode his stodgiest peers and persuaded his 35-member executive council to approve a framework for organizing the burgeoning nonunion sector of the work force. The federation's action is overdue, and its 96 member unions may not succeed in this challenge. But in trying, they are likely to mount the most centralized offensive against management since the AFL-CIO was formed in 1955.

This will not be an industrial war, nor will it emerge full-blown. The AFL-CIO's 28-page blueprint, Kirkland said, is a "living document" that will undergo refinements at least through the federation's biennial convention next fall. Moreover, it may take years to implement the federation's several dozen suggestions—including softening up management with so-called corporate campaigns and multi-union organizing drives, emphasizing new contract goals, and spiffing up labor's public image.

million workers, achieve growth by adopting effective new strategies developed by a handful of unions. Arguing that President Reagan's conservative National Labor Relations Board is stymieing organizing, it proposes to skirt the NLRB. For instance, it says that corporate campaigns—until now used primarily as a last-ditch tactic against hardline employers—should be used to force companies to declare "neutrality" before organizing begins. Last year, for example, Beverly Enterprises, the nation's largest nursing-home chain, recognized the United Food & Commercial Workers (UFCW) and the Service Employees Inter-

Labor vows to be more flexible

UNIONS / from 1A

These statements were contained in a frankly worded, 30-page report that analyzed ways organized labor can fit more closely into an era when management is becoming more sensitive to personnel problems and often spends heavily to keep employees from organizing.

The report was the product of a two-year study by a panel of academics and labor leaders called the Committee on the Evolution of Work.

It pulled few punches in assessing organized labor's current plight.

After an obligatory opening restatement of labor's values, the report asserted that, "despite the accomplishments, unions find themselves behind the pace of change."

'Something mystical tells me that when the vultures are circling out with those seagulls, that's when we are on the verge of revival and a resurgence of growth.'

Lane Kirkland, AFL-CIO president little success in penetrating the "mass-production industry."

In both cases, labor adjusted and went on to prosper.

"I'm quite confident that we are going to succeed," Kirkland said. "Something mystical tells me that when the vultures are circling out with those seagulls, that's when we are on the verge of revival and a resurgence of growth."

The report noted that labor's hope for another such revival lies in appealing to the so-called service workers, those employed in businesses that provide financial, informational, custodial or a myriad of other services to the public.

Today, fewer than 10 percent of all service workers belong to unions. Yet, according to the report, that's the sector that is expected to flourish in the future, employing about 75 percent of the work force by 1990.

Weak labor tradition

The report also said this work force will be concentrated in the Sun Belt states, particularly in California, Texas and Florida — the latter two with anti-labor traditions.

"Only 12 percent of the workers are organized" in those states, the report said, "the third- and fourth-lowest in the nation."

In what may be the biggest change of direction, the AFL-CIO agreed that it needs to end its fixation with negotiating rigid contracts with employers. Instead, the report said, the unions should take individual needs into account.

Reorganized Labor

Organized labor has set out to reinvent the labor movement for the post-industrial age. At least that seems to be the upshot of a remarkable report recently adopted by the executive council of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. It's a set of ideas that even critics of organized labor can welcome. Like unions or not, this report ought to provoke fresh thought about jobs, job protection and "what it is workers can do through their unions."

The need for rethinking is plain from the steady decline in labor's fortunes. The unionized portion of the labor force has gradually dropped, falling below 19 percent last year from 23 percent in 1980 and 35 percent in 1954. Unions are seen as undemocratic, stifling of individual initiative, controlled by bosses. Perhaps most damaging, they are thought to "increase the risk that companies will go out of business."

An obvious response — better public relations — gets generous treatment in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. report, more than two years in preparation. But the report is better than that, emphasizing substantive changes in the way unions operate.

It calls on unions to explore alternatives to the traditional "adversarial collective bargaining relationship." Among other things, this could mean giving up comprehensive contracts in favor of "minimum guarantees that will serve as a floor for individual bargaining." For the worker this would satisfy the desire to assert independence and personal initiative; for the company it would allow considerably more flexibility in rewarding the best employees.

The report also urges unions to seek out and address new issues of concern to workers, like pay inequity or comparable worth and health and safety standards. Yet another recommendation calls for "quality of worklife" programs that give workers a say in their job environment.

The new report calls for new categories of union membership for workers not in organized bargaining units. This would let people who leave unionized jobs retain a union affiliation. It also could open up such affiliation to workers who voted for the union in an unsuccessful organizing election.

Such affiliations would be especially attractive in the light of another recommendation: study the feasibility of having unions become the direct source of benefits like job training and supplementary medical insurance.

There is skepticism about some of these things even among the labor chiefs who approved them. Issues like comparable worth could create as much division as enthusiasm. New categories of membership raise the question of what a union is. And direct benefit programs could prove costly to administer.

But the A.F.L.-C.I.O. report can provoke fresh thought and healthy experimentation as individual unions and locals take the next steps to test labor's new vision against reality.

Fighting for farmers

Actor Eddie Albert meets with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue during tour to bring attention to the plight of family farmers. While in Washington Albert also met with members of the Senate and protested President Reagan's veto of legislation to provide emergency farm loan guarantees as the U.S. spring planting season approached.

13-union committee girds for GE, Westinghouse talks

Unity holds the key to good contract settlements at General Electric and Westinghouse, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Electronic Workers President William H. Bywater told the steering committee of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE and Westinghouse Unions.

Kirkland is chairman of the CBC, which is made up of the presidents of 11 AFL-CIO affiliates. Bywater heads the CBC's working arm, the steering committee, which includes representatives of two unaffiliated unions which also have contracts with GE and Westinghouse.

"It is the unity you take with you that will assure that what can be done at the bargaining table will be done," Kirkland said. He pledged the AFL-CIO's "full and unstinting support" in this year's talks.

Kirkland noted that the CBC was founded in 1965 to put an end to the corporations' divide-and-conquer tactics and that the test of CBC unity came in the 101-day 1969-70 strike against GE.

"The strikers, who walked 101 days, understood unity in their bones," Kirkland said. They forced GE to abandon its take-it-or-leave-it bargaining strategy known as Boulwarism, he noted.

Bywater stressed the need for in-shop unity.

"We must concentrate on getting the rank-and-file behind us and remaining united—13 unions as one. That way we will come out with the best contracts possible," Bywater said.

Rallies planned

He urged full participation in rallies that are planned at plant locations around the country the week before negotiations begin—with GE on May 14 in New York City and with Westinghouse on June 4 in Pittsburgh. The contracts, covering 110,000 workers, expire June 30 at GE and July 21 at Westinghouse.

The steering committee agreed on a series of bargaining goals submitted by subcommittees on contract language, pensions and insurance, wages and cost of living, and service shops.

CBC Treasurer Dick Mills of the Electrical Workers presented a budget and outlined plans for the communications network through which those in the field can learn of daily bargaining developments by calling a special phone number.

George Poulin of the Machinists is vice chairman of the steering committee, which includes representatives of the IUE, IBEW, IAM, Auto Workers, Steelworkers, Allied Industrial Workers, Plumbers, Carpenters, Flint Glass Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Sheet Metal Workers, and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers and Teamsters.

USWA approves Hess Oil contract, ending boycott

The AFL-CIO and the Steelworkers lifted a boycott against Hess Oil Co. products after union members in St. Croix, Virgin Islands, ratified a new contract that ended a bitter 11-month dispute.

Management locked out the 377 members of Steelworkers Local 8526 last April 16, the day after the previous contract expired. The company had sought to restrict grievance rights, weaken seniority, and set up a permanent two-tier wage structure.

The new three-year contract provides pay increases each year, raising the average pay from $12.18 to $14.24 an hour in the final year. A progression schedule assures that new hires will reach full parity with present employees.

Other gains

The agreement maintains grievance rights and continues other protections the Hess management sought to eliminate. The company also promised that workers not immediately recalled will be put back on the job when the workload expands and not displaced by contracting out work.

The boycott, initiated by the Steelworkers, was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last summer and covered gasoline sold at some 500 East Coast service stations, heating oil and other petroleum products.

The AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., at the request of the Steelworkers, informed affiliates of the lifting of the boycott. The USWA also expressed thanks for donations that helped fund food banks for the Hess workers during the long dispute, supplementing benefits from the union's strike fund.

For 722,000 workers

Public sector contracts show pay rise pattern

Major collective bargaining agreements negotiated for state and local government employees during 1984 yielded pay raises averaging 4.8 percent in the first year of the contract and 5.1 percent annually over the full term, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The survey covered 240 state and local government contracts settled last year, each covering 1,000 workers or more. Altogether, the pacts covered 722,000 workers.

In key contracts, those covering 5,000 workers or more, total compensation—wages and fringe benefits—averaged 5.2 percent in the first contract year and 5.4 percent annually over the contract life. Some 304,000 workers were covered by such agreements.

The information comes from a newly expanded series that covers state and local government bargaining agreements with 1,000 workers or more. The original series, started in 1979, was limited to agreements for 5,000 workers or more.

The expanded series includes data on wage change developments for 2.1-million workers, or about one-half of the state and local government workers that bargain over wages, BLS said.

Local government settlements accounted for four-fifths of the state and local government contracts reached in 1984 and two-thirds of the 722,000 workers.

Sixty percent of the public-sector workers covered by the 240 contracts were employed in general government and administration, 20 percent in education, and the remainder in protective services, health care and transportation, BLS said.

Most of the settlements were "back-loaded"—that is, they provided smaller wage increases in the first contract year than in later years.

BLS said that 20 contracts covering 13 percent of the workers provided for no specified wage changes in the first year but called for subsequent increases. Forty-six contracts, covering 17 percent of the workers, provided smaller increases in the first year than in later years.

These 66 "back-loaded" settlements provided wage adjustments averaging 3 percent in the first year and 5.2 percent a year over the life of the agreements.

There were 62 "front-loaded" settlements covering one-fourth of the workers. They provided wage increases of 5.7 percent in the first year and 4.3 percent annually over the contract life. The remaining contracts typically were of 12-month duration.

The average duration of all major settlements in state and local government was 20 months, compared with 31 months in the private sector, BLS said. Thirty-five percent of the state and local government workers were under settlements lasting 12 months or less.

Besides the information on new settlements, BLS reported on wage changes put into effect in 1984 as a result of both new and earlier settlements in state and local government. These "effective wage adjustments" resulted from 1984 settlements, deferred changes under agreements negotiated earlier, and cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) provisions.

Effective increases

Average effective wage adjustments in 1984 were 6.6 percent for the 1.6-million workers who received them and 5 percent when prorated over all 2.1 million workers covered by major public sector agreements.

Only 2 percent of the state and local government workers under major agreements—all in local government, mostly transit—have COLA provisions, compared with 57 percent in the private sector, BLS said.

About 400,000 workers are under 84 contracts that expired or reopened before Jan. 1 but had not been renegotiated as of Dec. 31, BLS said.

In addition, 880,000 workers are under 200 agreements due to expire or reopen for wage negotiations between January and June 1985. Nearly half of these workers are employed in general government and about a third in education.

Joblessness still high, lasts longer

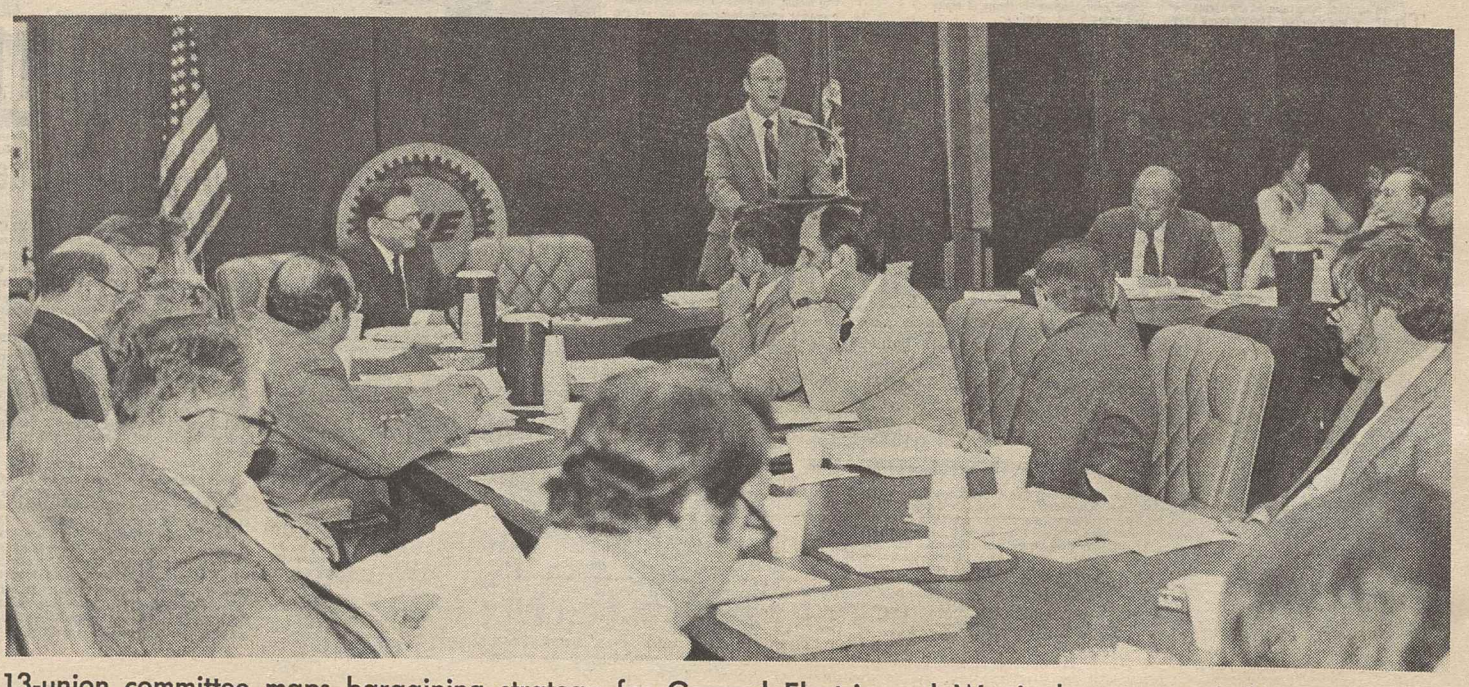
from 14.9 to 16.3 percent over the month.

Higher unemployment among adult black men accounted in large part for the 1.4-percentage-point rise in black joblessness, but the rate among black women also rose. The jobless rate among black teenagers went up over the month from 42.1 to 43.1 percent, while the rate for white teenagers fell from 15.8 to 15.2 percent.



Long-term unemployment was up significantly. There were 2.41 million workers who had been out of a job for 15 weeks or more in February, an increase of about 175,000, BLS reported.

Of these long-term unemployed, 1.34 million had been out of work for more than six months, a rise of 38,000 over the month.

A total of 108.4 million Americans were employed in February, a 300,000 increase from the previous month. That included 1.7 million men and women in the armed forces and 106.7 million civilian workers.

The labor force grew by 215,000 to 116.8 million, producing a decline of 85,000, to 8.4 million in the official number of unemployed.

Besides the loss of factory jobs, the February report showed a decline of 50,000 construction jobs. BLS attributed the sharp loss mainly to severe winter weather that closed down some sites entirely last month.

Unemployment's Cost

MANY OF the things that the President says the country can't afford to do are things that we can't afford not to do.

The Administration has declared war on a long list of programs that have been developed over the years to advance the interests of middle-class Americans, to safeguard the health and dignity of the old, to promote the educational and occupational aspirations of the young, and to protect the poor.

With the job market disrupted by sweeping changes in markets and products, in technology, in the kinds and levels of skills that youngsters need to find decent jobs; with the jobs of skilled older workers being wiped out by plant shutdowns all across the land, can we afford to wipe out the Job Corps, cut summer youth jobs, cut back on aid to displaced workers and eliminate job training programs?

CAN WE AFFORD to raise new barriers against young people and throw displaced workers on the scrap heap?

The longest step this country could take toward a balanced budget—the most prudent and responsible fiscal policy we could adopt—would be simply to live up to the law of the land, as embodied in the Humphrey-Hawkins Act of 1978, and go all-out for full employment.

By contrast, the policy we now have—a policy designed to increase and perpetuate high unemployment—is the most expensive "luxury" any nation ever tried to buy. As fiscal policy, the waste of financial and human resources that it entails is irresponsible. As social policy, it is wicked.

—From testimony by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue before House Budget Committee, Mar. 11, 1985.

Subminimum Snake Oil

ONCE AGAIN, the Reagan Administration is beating the drums for a subminimum wage, touting it in the most outrageous terms as a cure for the very high rate of teenage black unemployment.

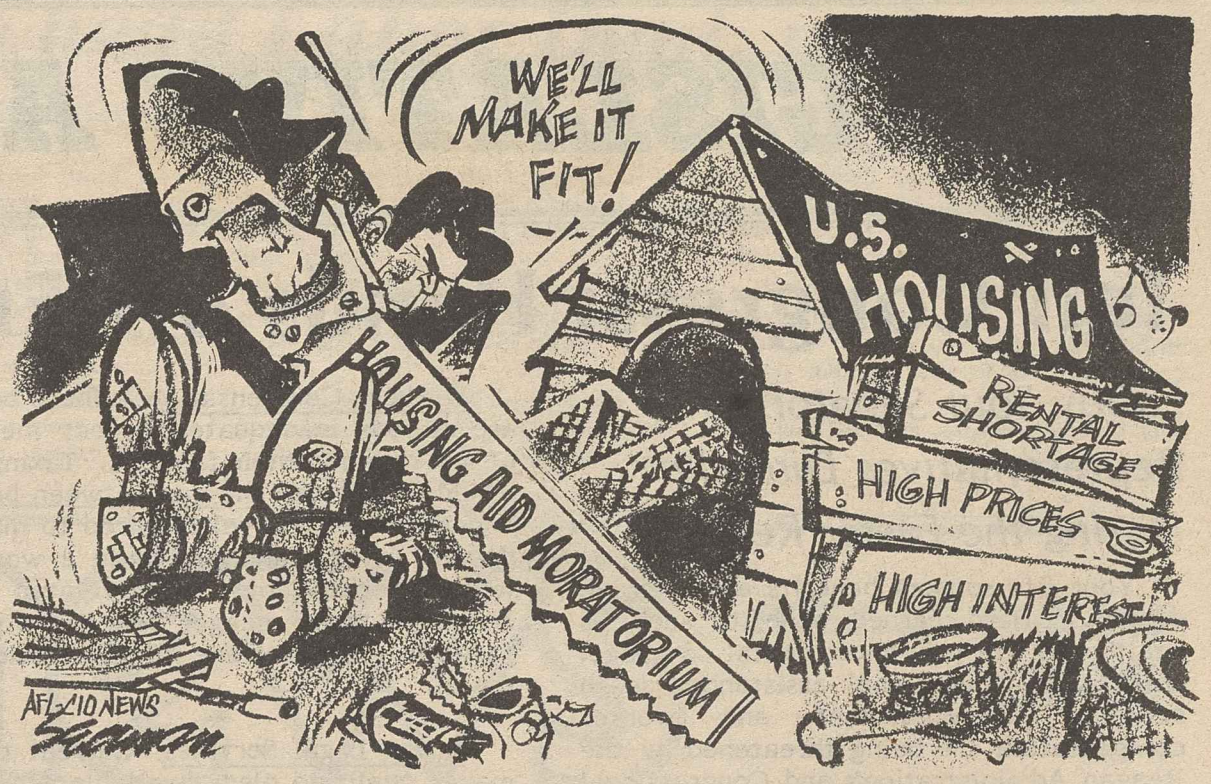
It is, of course, nothing of the kind. If Congress is foolish enough to set up a two-tier wage system, the chief beneficiaries will be the fast food chains and convenience stores that are the principal employers of young workers.

In the private sector, certainly, there is not a shred of evidence to back up Administration claims that 400,000 new jobs will be created by lowering an already subpar wage floor.

Political appointees at the Labor Dept., according to the New York Times, have been circulating among reporters obviously solicited letters of endorsement from a handful of black mayors, ministers and educators. But the Administration has not been able to make a dent in the wall of opposition from mainstream organizations like the NAACP and the Urban League.

Basing wages on either age or race is clearly wrong—grievously wrong.

AMONG ADULTS, black unemployment has been running twice the level of white joblessness. Should we then set up a two-tier pay structure based on race?



If the fast-food chains would be the big winners, who would be the losers?

For one, the youngsters whose summer earnings are essential to cover school expenses. The Administration has already declared its desire to reduce student loans, throwing a greater burden on middle-income families struggling to make ends meet. With a lower minimum wage, the gap would become wider.

For another, everyone in the world of work and especially those toward the bottom of the pay ladder. Does anyone really doubt that an employer of unskilled workers will hire a cut-rate younger worker in preference to paying a living wage to an older worker?

Mr. Reagan has already made clear his belief that the entire concept of a minimum wage is suspect, and that a teenage subminimum is merely the first step.

That knowledge makes it all the more urgent that the first step not be taken.

'Savings' on benefit cuts would rob needy retirees

By Press Associates, Inc.

Some members of Congress have proposed eliminating or reducing next year's cost-of-living adjustment in social security and other federal benefit programs to help trim President Reagan's bloated deficit.

They argue that cutting back COLAs for tens of millions of retirees and others would be a fairly painless way to cut federal spending since relatively small benefit cuts would be spread widely among large numbers of Americans.

They stress the "savings" involved—an estimated $7 billion less would be spent next year if COLAs were cancelled for social security, railroad retirement, civil service, and other federal cash assistance programs.

These proponents of COLA "savings" seldom mention the human costs which would result. These costs can be gleaned from a recent study by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. The 50-page CBO report said that cancelling the 1986 COLA in social security and other federal benefit programs would produce these results:

- Some 530,000 people would be pushed below the poverty line. About two-thirds of these newly poor people would be elderly, most of them social security retirees. The rest of these new poor would be early retirees, the disabled, and non-elderly recipients of survivors' benefits.

The needy poor

- Low-income families, particularly those with elderly members, are heavily reliant on social security, railroad retirement, and SSI. About 86 percent of total income for the elderly poor and 80 percent of that for elderly families just above the poverty level comes from these three programs. Thus, eliminating or reducing the COLA would have far greater percentage effects on their incomes than on the incomes of families well above the poverty level.
- Elderly poor families would lose an average of $140 a year in benefits, or 3.2 percent of their annual income.

The CBO study concludes that "curtailing COLAs would achieve significant savings but would do so at the cost of lower incomes for the poor and the near-poor as well as for those in better financial positions."

Skewing the program

Some legislators have suggested that most low-income beneficiaries could be protected by limiting COLAs to this group. However, this would be a big step toward changing social security and other entitlement programs into means-tested welfare programs and undermining the principle of worker-earned entitlements.

Further, such a means-tested approach, as the report notes, would be a bureaucratic nightmare—"difficult to administer since it would require that the Social Security Administration provide COLAs to some but not all beneficiaries, or for only part of most recipients' benefits."

Social security benefits are modest to begin with, averaging only $450 a month for retired single workers, $400 for widows and $776 for elderly couples. Many, of course, receive far less.

Congress in 1983 adopted the proposals of the bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform to ensure the long-term solvency of the 50-year-old retirement income system. Current and future retirees then were assured that the sacrifices which were part of that compromise, including a six-month postponement of the COLA, would make the system sound and that no further cuts would be required.

Indeed, the social security retirement trust fund now is running a surplus which will total an estimated $150 billion by 1990.

William R. Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, put it this way: "It would be a breach of faith to force the elderly to make new sacrifices when the system is financially sound and its surpluses already are helping to reduce the deficit. Congress should not violate the commitment made in the historic social security compromise of 1983."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Tell Congress: Hands off Employee Benefits

Lobby Your Senators and Representatives Directly During the Easter Recess

Your life-support benefits are in grave danger. Hard earned benefits such as health and life insurance, dental coverage, child care, educational assistance, death benefits, unemployment and worker compensation are being threatened by the Reagan Administration's and Congressional proposals to tax them. You must act now to save your benefits from being reduced -- and from your taxes being raised and your take-home pay reduced.

Between April 6 and 15, most of the members of Congress will be in their home districts to meet with constituents. Call your Senators and Representative's district offices right now (see your local telephone directory), and make an appointment directly or with your local union or other labor groups.

What the Tax Would Do

The Treasury Department's and several Congressional proposals would tax the life-support benefits of millions of Americans, jeopardizing the security of most of America's families. Members of unions and virtually every middle-class American wage and salary earner would feel the crunch: reduced benefits, cut take-home pay, and increased taxes.

This unfair tax proposal could be considered soon by the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee. But even before that the Budget Committees of both houses of Congress might seize upon the tax as a quick-fix revenue raiser to off-set Reagan's escalating deficits.

Here's how the proposed tax scheme would work:

Health Care - If an employer pays more than $175 per month for your family's health insurance, any sum paid over this threshold amount would be taxable to you. If, for example, your employer pays $250.00 per month for your family health coverage, $75.00 of that amount each month would be taxable to you, for an additional $900.00 at the end of the year. In the future, these dollar ceilings could be reduced, resulting in even higher taxes for Americans. As health costs skyrocket, employers would attempt to reduce and eliminate coverage below the tax ceiling. Meanwhile, your taxes rise and your take-home pay falls.

Group Term Life Insurance -Presently the tax code provides that employer-paid premiums for Group Term Life Insurance are not taxable to the employee up to a maximum amount of $50,000. The Treasury proposal repeals this provision, thereby taxing you for the entire amount paid for this insurance by your employer.

Unemployment Insurance -These benefits provide essential income to jobless workers. Above certain thresholds, they are already taxed, adding to the hardship of being unemployed. Under the tax proposal, these benefits would be fully taxed.

Workers Compensation - These benefits are already inadequate to meet the needs of workers and their families. Taxing them would only widen the gap between benefits and the income level required to maintain decent living standards while a worker is jobless because of a work-related injury. But even these meager benefits would be taxed in full under the Administration proposal.

Group Legal Services -Current tax law makes qualified plans available at a minimal cost to many who would otherwise be denied such protection. Under the Treasury Department's plan, whatever amount your employer pays for legal services on your behalf would be added to your taxable income.

Educational Assistance Program -This benefit provides significant opportunities to women, minorities, and other workers to upgrade their skills through training/retraining programs provided by employers. Under the Reagan Administration proposal, you would be taxed fully for any employer-paid, educational costs.

Warning: Don't fall for the argument that the tax on your life support benefits will be more than offset by the tax reform proposals to cut your rates, increase the value of your personal exemptions and raise the level at which your taxes trigger in. That's part of the package proposal now on paper, but already the Treasury Department is taking out parts that impact on the wealthy and large corporations, and already there are reports that the rate reduction and other adjustments may not come about. You could end up the loser twice: new taxes and lower benefits.

What You Must Do:

1. Call your local union now to see if a meeting has been scheduled with your representative esentative during the April 6-15 Easter recess. If not, urge your local union to do so now. Call your Representative and U.S. Senators at their district offices (The numbers are in your local directory under U.S. Government).

2. Make the appointment with your member of Congress -- not a member of his staff -- and confirm it 24 hours before you meet.

3. Bring along several fellow union members and spouses or leaders of other unions. This enhances your clout and shows the widespread concern about this tax.

4. Get right to a discussion of the employee benefits tax. Make your arguments forcefully - and don't be put off that the tax is dead or is not going to be considered in Congress for a long time. Ask the legislator for a specific commitment to oppose taxation of employee benefits in whatever form it takes. Obtain a pledge to oppose the benefits tax, either: (a) as a separate bill, or (b) as part of a budget bill package, or (c) as part of so-called tax simplification legislation. Tell him to tell his colleagues on the tax-writing committees: Hands off life support benefits!

5. If the legislator wants additional information, offer to provide it. Then contact the AFL-CIO and we will follow up and send along the materials in your name.

6. Thank them. If the legislator supports our position, thank him for taking the time to meet with you and for agreeing to oppose the taxation of employee benefits.

7. Report back. Let us know the results of your meeting. Lobbying is an informational gathering process. So contact the AFL-CIO and let us know what the legislator said.

Choice of Brock to head Labor Dept. welcomed

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland welcomed the nomination of William E. Brock as Secretary of Labor and said it could open the way to "a new and constructive relationship" between the trade union federation and the Labor Dept.

Brock has been the U.S. Trade Representative for the past four years, previously served in both the Senate and House, and is a former Republican national chairman.

"We have worked with him in many areas over the years," Kirkland said. While we have not always agreed, he has earned our respect."

President Reagan tapped Brock to replace Raymond J. Donovan, who resigned as Secretary of Labor after a New York state judge refused to dismiss criminal fraud and larceny charges against him. The charges relate to Donovan's actions as a construction company official before he was appointed to the Cabinet.

Donovan had been on unpaid leave of absence from the Labor Dept. since his indictment last October. Under Sec. of Labor Ford B. Ford has been the caretaker of the department since then.

Under Donovan, the Labor Dept. had tilted heavily to the side of management and against the interests of workers and their unions.

Key staff positions were filled with appointees hostile to the department's programs and suspicious of career professionals.

Occupational safety and health standards that were in the works at the 1981 change of administration were pulled back to be scrapped or gutted. The Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law was seriously weakened through new regulations, and only court intervention prevented the complete wipeout of longstanding prohibitions against industrial homework.

Within the Administration, Donovan proved the most eager of all the Cabinet members to carry out budget cuts that bit deeply into the bone of his department's programs.

When Donovan resigned, the AFL-CIO

Kirkland hits benefit-tax scheme

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assails scheme to tax worker benefits. With him at the House committee hearings are Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald, left, and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Cites threat to safety net for families

By David L. Perlman

Proposals before Congress to tax health insurance and other job-related benefits threaten to rip apart a life-support system on which millions of families rely, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

A lot more than tax dollars is at stake, Kirkland stressed in testimony before the House Education & Labor Committee. He said imposing a new payroll tax on employer-provided benefits would pit worker against worker, divided by age and family responsibilities.

Inevitably, he warned, family protection would be reduced and made more costly. And if the private sector doesn't do the job, it will be up to the government to pick up the pieces.

Kirkland's testimony noted the uniqueness of the United States as the only industrialized nation depending on its private sector to meet family needs that elsewhere are government responsibilities.

Basic necessities

"The industrial nations of the world have looked upon health care, education, retirement security, and life, disability and unemployment insurance as fundamental necessities," Kirkland said.

But the United States, instead, has taken the "different path" of encouraging employers to take over this social function and excluding from taxation the share of a worker's earnings that goes to meet "perceived social needs."

The result has been job-linked child care, educational assistance and prepaid group legal services as well as health and life insurance.

Kirkland's testimony reflected labor's

Bipartisan bill proposes plant-closing safeguards

Two House Democrats and a Republican have introduced a plant-closing bill they predict will gain bipartisan support despite the reluctance of the Reagan Administration to face up to a worsening problem.

Joining in a Capitol Hill news conference were the principal House sponsors—William D. Ford (D-Mich.), who has championed the cause of plant-closing legislation in previous congresses; Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.), who stressed that plant closings and layoffs "do not recognize regional or party lines," and Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), who said the bill will be a "top priority" of the Labor-Management Relations Subcommittee which he heads.

All three described the measure as a "first step" proposal that would alleviate but not eliminate a problem that has become as pressing in the Sunbelt states as in the tier of northeastern and midwestern states that some have dubbed the Rustbelt.

The legislation would require businesses to provide a 90-day notice of a plant closing or of the permanent layoff of 50 or more workers.

Where workers are represented by a union, the employer would be obligated to provide all relevant information related to the closure or layoffs and discuss alternatives that might save the jobs.

Penalties proposed

Employers could shorten the notification period only by convincing the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service that "unavoidable business circumstances" require it. And workers could be ordered reinstated with penalty pay if the employer failed to comply with the law.

A second part of the bill would establish a 15-member bipartisan National Commission on Plant Closings to develop policies to prevent shutdowns and programs to assist dislocated workers.

The bill's sponsors acknowledge that the legislation isn't as comprehensive as earlier versions. "We intend this bill as a realistic first step," Clay said, "one that can win the support of a majority of this Congress."

Ford stressed the urgency of the problem. "According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics," he said, "5.5 million Americans lost their jobs in plant closings and permanent layoffs between 1979 and 1984 without any advance notice."

Union victories grow at Beverly nursing homes

Two AFL-CIO unions have achieved an overall win rate of 71 percent in their campaign to organize nursing homes operated throughout the country by Beverly Enterprises.

The campaign by the Service Employees and the Food & Commercial Workers has brought to 88 the number of Beverly facilities which have been organized. Since the two unions jointly targeted the Beverly chain in 1983, unions have won 63 representation elections involving some 5,000 workers in 23 states. Fifty of these victories have occurred in southern states—Arkansas, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Study finds Pentagon waste adds billions to defense cost

By Arlee C. Green

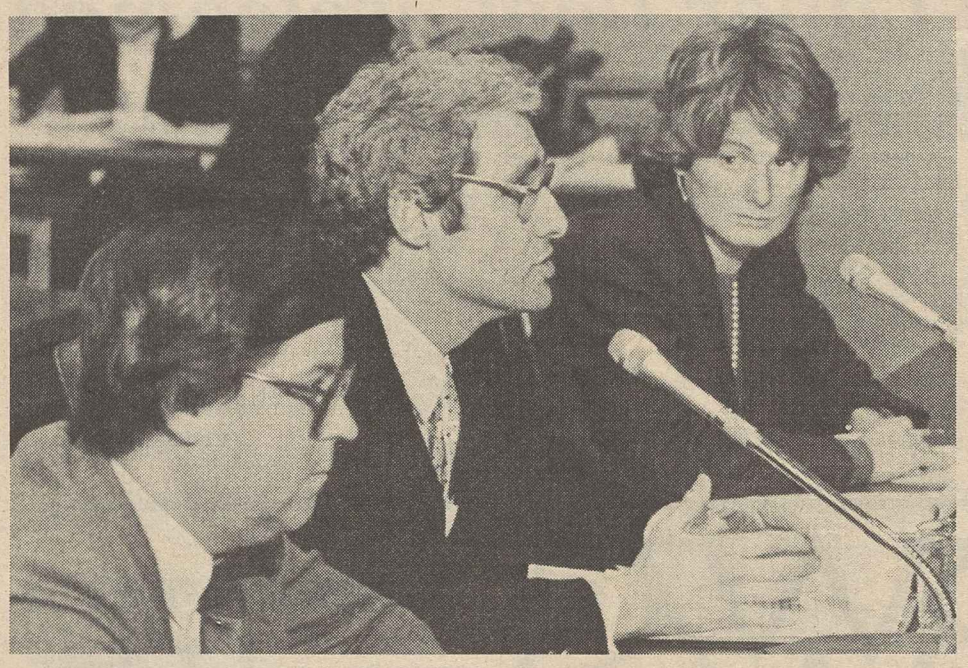
The Defense Dept. could save billions of dollars a year simply by eliminating waste and inefficiency—and without cutting wages, benefits or even a single weapon.



Those are among the major findings of a study commissioned by the Marine Engineers and released by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and MEBA President Jesse M. Calhoon.

The wide-ranging analysis of Pentagon operations, prepared by Ruttenberg, Kilgallon & Associates, identifies 104 documented cases of DOD waste which cost between $32 and $100 billion annually.

"Waste on this scale belies the contention that a budget freeze necessarily requires that we scale back or mothball our actual military power," Calhoon told reporters. He stressed that the study draws on the work of conservatives, liberals and moderates—"it is not ideological or partisan."

Titled "Waste in the Defense Dept.,"

AFL-CIO's David Silberman testifies on asbestos victims' compensation. He is flanked by Jay Power and Margaret Seminario of the federation staff.

AFL-CIO tells Congress

Asbestos settlements still need monitoring

The implementation of an accord between asbestos producers and their insurers must be closely monitored to make sure asbestos victims are properly compensated, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Labor & Human Resources subcommittee.

At the same time, the federation offered to assist in the development of guidelines to aid in settlement of asbestos-related claims, and pointed out that the long-term needs of workers can be best addressed by enactment of a federal occupational disease compensation law.

David Silberman, the federation's associate general counsel, noted at congressional oversight hearings that the accord, called the Wellington Agreement, "does not, in and of itself, advance the cause of providing adequate and timely compensation to asbestos victims." The agreement is basically a peace treaty between the producers and their primary insurers, Silberman said.

The Wellington Agreement is named for Harry H. Wellington, dean of the Yale Law School, who was instrumental in working out the treaty to end the legal liability war between the two groups.

Wellington cited in his testimony a Rand Corp. study that found only 37 cents of each dollar awarded in damages to asbestos victims actually goes to the claimant—the rest goes for lawyers and legal expenses.

Silberman pointed out that the Wellington Agreement should significantly reduce the amount of money paid to defense lawyers, but "there is no assurance that those savings will be used to compensate victims rather than being pocketed by the producers and primary insurers."

The crucial question is whether the producers and insurers will "proceed to seek peace" with the asbestos victims and their families or if they will "use their newfound harmony to wage a unified war of attrition against victims who seek compensation."

Silberman said the AFL-CIO would welcome the opportunity to work toward developing guidelines and procedures for processing claims. "We can advocate the interest of workers without any conflicting interests or obligations," he asserted.

Federal involvement

Some have suggested that the ability of the Wellington group to reach an accord somehow demonstrates that government involvement in the field of occupational disease is unnecessary, Silberman observed. "It would be a national tragedy of untold dimensions if that misperception were to receive any currency. The very problem stemming from asbestos claims "is eloquent testimony to the past failure of law," he said.

The experience of the Wellington group highlights the need for governmental involvement, Silberman declared, stressing that the only "genuine hope for a fair and comprehensive solution to the problem of occupational disease is enactment of a federal occupational disease compensation law." The AFL-CIO in testimony before the committee last year proposed that solution.

VDT safety bills spurred in legislatures of 14 states

Legislatures in 14 states are considering bills covering worker exposure to video display terminals, mainly in response to stepped-up activities by labor, and in another 13 states, workers are actively pressing for VDT regulation, according to the Service Employees and 9 to 5, the National Association of Working Women.

Adding to the case for legislation is a study done by the Communications Workers linking angina, a first sign of heart disease, to VDT use.

SEIU and 9 to 5 kicked off a "Campaign for VDT Safety" in December 1984. In a state-by-state update, the campaign noted these activities:

California—Sen. Tom Hayden will introduce a bill focusing on ergonomics, and the labor coalition being formed includes the State AFL-CIO and SEIU.

Colorado—Planning for Lobby Day and other activities during week of Apr. 19-23. The coalition backing the activities includes 9 to 5, state federation and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Connecticut—Statewide coalition including SEIU and the Teachers is backing a bill sponsored by State Rep. Joe Adamo.

Iowa—VDT bill in Senate will soon be submitted to the House.

Maryland—The Newspaper Guild has joined the CWA, SEIU and 9 to 5 in backing Del. Anne Perkins's VDT bill which includes pregnancy transfer rights.

Massachusetts — Two state-conducted studies will be released soon. The state AFL-CIO joined with SEIU and 9 to 5 in backing bill sponsored by Rep. Suzanne Bump and Sen. Gerard D'Amico.

Minnesota—A modified bill that would require a state commissioner to report on the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health's findings of reproductive hazards and make recommendations.

Missouri—Strong industry opposition to the labor-backed bill sponsored by State Rep. Ron Auer.

New Hampshire — Campaign includes the state federation and Women's Lobby and seeks VDT legislation based on the model bill drawn up by SEIU and 9 to 5.

New York—Rep. Frank Barbaro's bill is backed by the State AFL-CIO, SEIU, 9 to 5 and New York Committee on Occupational Safety & Health.

Oregon—The VDT bill passed the state Senate on Feb. 12 with near unanimous vote. House is expected to act soon.

Rhode Island—Campaign fighting for stronger legislation than current bill that seeks only to have information on hazards provided to VDT operators.

Washington—A House Committee approved a VDT measure which will go to the House floor shortly.

The CWA's study of 2,478 women workers employed by Southern Bell in North Carolina found that 15 to 16 percent of the workers using VDTs more than half their workday reported having chest pains. Less frequent users reported chest pains in only four percent of the cases.

The results "should be a red flag" for further research, said Tobi Lippin, who aided in the survey, which recommends a joint labor-management project to assess the relationship between VDTs and long-term health hazards.

Textile import curb pressed by union-industry coalition

Unions and manufacturers joined in a call for legislation to curb a fast-rising tide of textile, apparel and fiber imports that have already taken a huge toll on American jobs.

More than 130 House and Senate members, both Democrats and Republicans, are cosponsoring the measure. Rep. Ed Jenkins (D-Ga.), who heads the congressional Textile Caucus, said the legislation seeks to "sew up gaping loopholes" in existing textile trade agreements.

Both the Clothing & Textile Workers and the Ladies' Garment Workers are part of the coalition supporting the bill, along with 13 industry trade associations.

Imports now are regulated by the Multi-Fiber Arrangement, first negotiated in 1973 and since twice renewed. It is supposed to provide developing nations access to textile and apparel markets in the industrialized nations through an orderly process that would not disrupt economies.

That's not the way it has worked, U.S. unions and employers pointed out.

The reality, they stressed, is that apparel imports captured half the huge U.S. market last year, and textile imports soared 32 percent on top of a 25 percent rise the year before.

If this trend continues, the labor-industry coalition warned, "the American fiber, textile and apparel industry will simply cease to exist by the early 1990s."

Quota formula

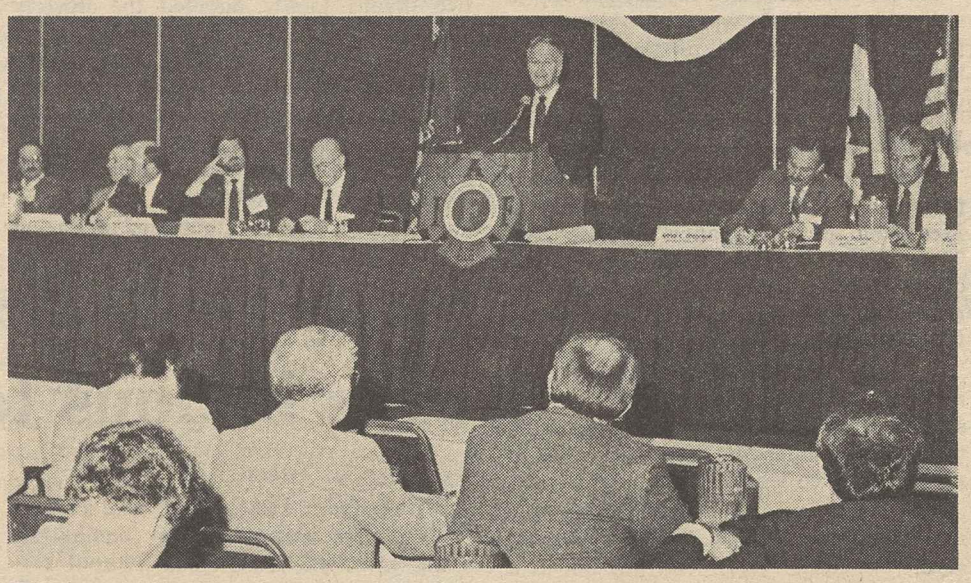
The proposed legislation would set quotas for access to the U.S. market for major exporting countries and somewhat more lenient quotas for textile, apparel and fiber shipments from countries with less than a 1.25 percent share of U.S. imports. For major exporting countries, the initial quota would be 1 percent more than the levels that would have existed last year if the Multi-Fiber Arrangement had been effectively enforced during the 1980-84 period.

Lack of proper enforcement, the bill's supporters contend, has been a big factor in a textile and apparel trade deficit that reached a record $16 billion in 1984, and in the heavy job loss that has plagued the domestic textile and apparel industry.

Michael Arnold named to new post in Housing Trust



Michael Arnold, who has been executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute for the past six years, will take on a new assignment in mid-April as director of investor relations for the federation's Housing Investment Trust.

The investment trust was launched in 1983 as a means of channeling union and pension funds into the job-generating single-family home mortgages.

In announcing Arnold's appointment, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland commended his "outstanding leadership" in promoting labor participation in programs to open up job opportunities for unemployed and disadvantaged workers.

Arnold, a member of the Bricklayers and a former local union officer in Dallas, joined HRDI shortly after it was founded 16 years ago. He was regional director for 10 southwestern states before becoming assistant director in 1973.

Kirkland announced that AFL-CIO Field Rep. Michael McMillan, now based in Houston, will serve as HRDI's acting director. Before joining the AFL-CIO's field staff in 1981, McMillan was with HRDI for 11 years, as an area representative, coordinator of building trades programs and assistant director.

Fire Fighters rally

Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), addressing the Fire Fighters annual legislative conference, voices opposition to Reagan Administration proposal to tax employee benefits. IAFF President John A. Gannon warned that a plan to eliminate federal revenue-sharing would be disastrous to the nation's fire service. Some 330 IAFF local and state leaders participated in the conference.

John F. Crowley dies, San Francisco official

Shanghai, China — John F. Crowley, secretary-treasurer of the San Francisco AFL-CIO, died of cancer here Mar. 17 while touring Asia with his wife Geraldine. He was 61.

Crowley, a member of the Mortuary Workers Union of the Seafarers and a vice president of the California AFL-CIO, has been the chief executive officer of the San Francisco labor council since 1972. He also had been secretary-business agent of Professional Embalmers Union 9049.

Survivors in addition to his wife include six children and 16 grandchildren.

Kirkland: benefit-tax scheme threat to safety net

concern that workers will lose both money and protections under various proposals that Congress will be considering.

These include a warmed-over Administration proposal to make workers pay taxes on the value of health insurance premiums above a specified amount.

Such a plan, imposing new taxes on many workers who could least afford it, "would dismantle the safety net of employee group health insurance," Kirkland testified. Many would choose to give up protection and, as a recent survey found, employers would respond by reducing benefits.

Fewer benefits

Other pending proposals that target worker benefits include the Treasury Dept.'s "tax simplification" plan and several "flat-tax" bills that have been introduced in Congress.

"If tax benefits for health care contributions were to be scaled back, most likely to be dropped from a benefit plan are coverage for preventive care, outpatient diagnostic services, dental, eyeglasses and other benefits that affect premium costs," Kirkland testified.

"These have little to do with the health cost inflation problems that plague the nation," he noted.

The safety net of health insurance protection and other life-support benefits was woven at the bargaining table by the American trade union movement, Kirkland said.

It has since become "deeply embedded" in the nation's employment structure, and some 140 million Americans now have job-related health care insurance.

"It would be hard to overstate the role of this life-support network," Kirkland said. "Its protection has given millions the sense of security and confidence to enter the marketplace and undertake commitments for long-term mortgages, college tuition loans, time-purchase agreements for cars."

The nation needs more, not less, of such family protections, Kirkland affirmed. During the last recession, he noted, the loss of health insurance proved a greater blow to many families than the loss of wage income. Some had life savings wiped out by a short hospital stay. Others were thrown on already overstrained public resources.

With those experiences so fresh in memory, Kirkland urged, "Congress ought to be considering ways to strengthen the private life-support system rather than devising new taxes to undermine it."

Didn't cause deficit

As for the need for tax revenue, Kirkland noted that the tax treatment of job benefits was not the source of the huge federal deficit.

The biggest part of the deficit, he said, stems from the 1981 tax changes which gave huge windfalls to businesses and disproportionately high tax cuts to the wealthiest.

"The revenue shortfall should not be met by levying additional burdens on working people and adding to the unfairness that has characterized economic policies of the past several years," Kirkland said.

One argument for taxing employee benefits is that persons receiving them have an advantage over those who don't get them. But such inequities should be resolved by encouraging adequate programs, he urged, not by tearing down those that exist.

Apart from employer-provided benefits, the Reagan Administration also wants to tax unemployment and workers' compensation payments, even to those in the low income brackets.

'Mean-spirited'

Kirkland branded this "the most mean-spirited" of the Administration's proposals.

Already, he noted, unemployment insurance is taxed for single workers whose total annual income is over $12,000, or over $18,000 for a couple.

"Just as devastating is the suggestion by the Administration to tax all workers' compensation benefits," which at most replace only two-thirds of lost wages.

Group life insurance, legal services, dependent care and educational assistance all would be discouraged by Administration tax proposals, Kirkland noted. Pensions, which already are taxed when paid to retired workers, are not yet on this year's target list. But "we know they were considered," Kirkland told the committee, "and set aside temporarily."

The AFL-CIO's position received a warm endorsement from both Committee Chairman Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) and Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), the chairman of the subcommittee which will hold further hearings on employee benefit issues

The programs under attack, whether health insurance or day care, serve important social and economic objectives, Hawkins stressed. They are not "fringes" or "frivolous perks" of expense account executives, he said.

Kirkland, responding to questions from committee members, warned that the imposition of taxes that would reduce the take-home pay of workers would "throw a monkey wrench into collective bargaining."

It would lead to reopening of existing agreements, create friction among workers on the basis of age and family repsonsibilities, and discourage programs that it is in the interest of the nation to encourage, he said.

Labor's alternatives

Asked whether the AFL-CIO has any alternative suggestion on raising additional tax revenues if employee benefits are left untouched, Kirkland responded:

"We have put forth year after year after year proposals to make the tax system more equitable and simpler."

And if they had been adopted, he said, the federal deficit today would be a lot smaller. Research Director Rudy Oswald, who with Legislative Director Ray Denison shared the witness table with Kirkland, outlined some of the federation's tax reform suggestions.

Union victories grow at Beverly nursing homes

Of the 63 wins, the SEIU scored 31, the UFCW 27 and other unions five, the Service Employes reported.

Mark Splain, director of health care organizing for the SEIU, said the win percentage has measurably improved in the year since the unions and Beverly reached an agreement on the conduct of the organizing drives. In March 1984, the SEIU and the UFCW signed an accord with the nursing home chain to end their "corporate campaign" pressures in exchange for Beverly's pledge to encourage a "non-coercive" atmosphere during representation elections.

Splain said the SEIU has since won 20 of 22 elections—91 percent—with the results of two others set aside and new elections ordered. He said organizing activity at Beverly homes has risen by about a third over the past year.

900 facilities

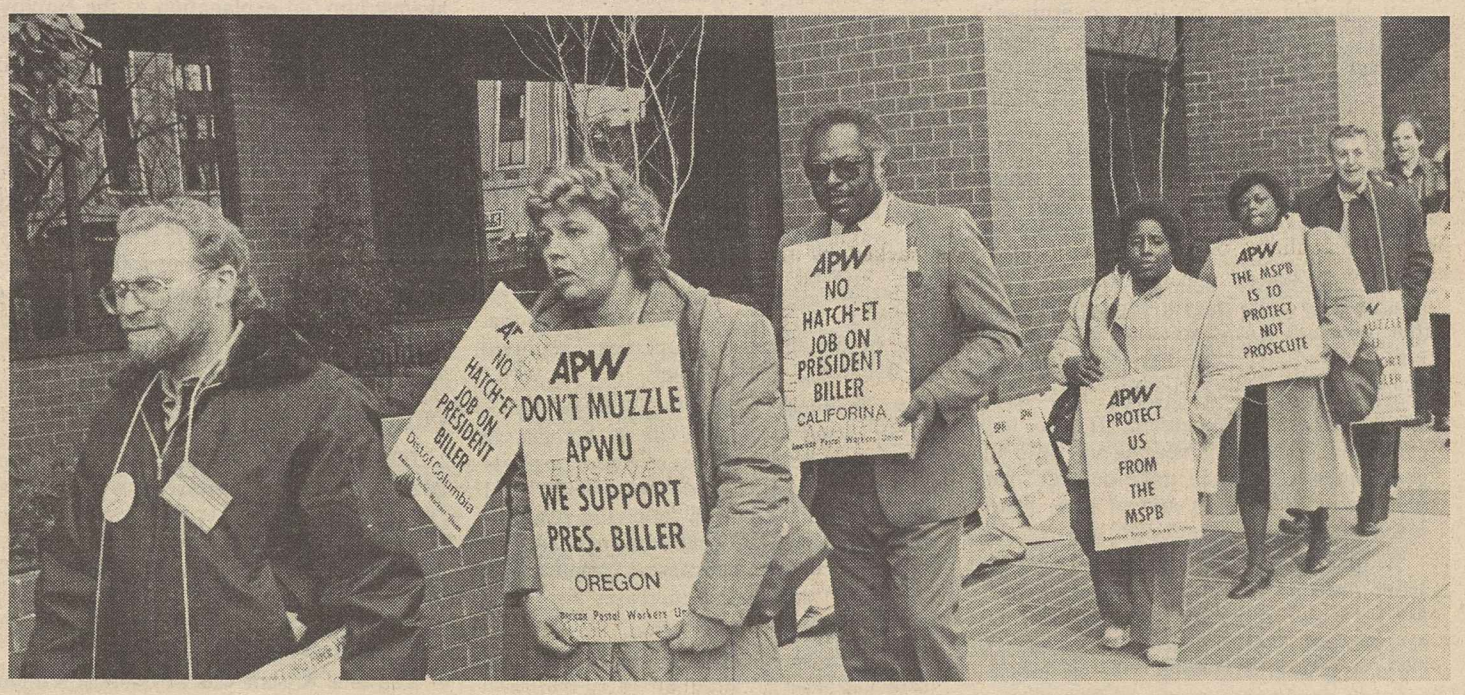
The company operates more than 900 long-term care facilities throughout the country. It says each has an average of about 75 "organizable" service and maintenance employees.

The pace of bargaining also has picked up since the accord was reached between the unions and management last year.



For example, the UFCW reports recent contract settlements with Beverly covering workers at three homes in North Carolina, one in South Carolina and eight in Arkansas. Agreements also are in prospect in Minnesota and Ohio, with bargaining continuing in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Florida and Mississippi, according to Richard Perry of the UFCW. Perry heads the union's Professional, Insurance, Finance and Health Care Division.

Another recent settlement was reached by UFCW Local 400 for workers at a Beverly nursing home in Washington, D.C.

Conventions

The Newspaper Guild convention has been rescheduled for June 24-28 in Pittsburgh. It had been slated for July 24-28.

The Woodworkers convention will be held Apr. 20-26, 1986, not Apr. 20-26, 1985, as previously reported.

Moving message

Postal Workers, taking time out from a legislative conference, picket the Merit Systems Protection Board to protest Hatch Act charges brought against APWU President Moe Biller, Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock and Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto because of their support of the Democratic presidential ticket. Another 200 delegates picketed the South African embassy to protest that nation's apartheid policy.

Study finds billions in Pentagon waste

the study focuses on five key DOD areas where waste of tax dollars occurs and it uses the estimates of a variety of military and budgeting experts in determining the dollar figures of waste in each area. Among those providing information used in the report are the Heritage Foundation, Brookings Institution, Rand Corp., federally commissioned task forces, former national security and defense officials; and other relevant federal agencies and individuals.

These are among the conclusions reached by the study:

- Waste in the Defense Dept. is massive and pervasive, and the rapid growth planned by the Reagan Administration may make the problems worse.
- Most of the problems have been identified and studied for years, but little, if any, progress has been made.
- Controversies over which weapons systems are unnecessary grab the headlines, but do not represent the largest waste at DOD. Because of the bow-wave nature of defense spending, savings from unnecessary weapons systems would take longer to achieve than savings from elimination of management waste, which recurs annually.
- Congress should review the defense budget in a unified way and with its own analysts.
- While weapons systems are constantly updated, DOD has antiquated computers and software systems and antiquated laboratories. Its management, organization and compensation systems are virtually unchanged from a generation, and sometimes a century, ago.
- Reform is needed in the military compensation system, but it must be based on a comprehensive review and consider long-run implications of such reforms.

Kennedy told reporters, "There is no question that this report is arriving at a special time." The fiscal 1986 defense budget will be reviewed by the Senate Armed Services Committee by the end of March. Kennedy said he was hopeful the study's recommendations will be evaluated and implemented.

The report urged the need for broad system-wide changes, and recommended:

- Management incentives within DOD should emphasize cooperation rather than competition among the service branches. This would extend to activities such as base consolidation, one military hospital system, standardization of weapons systems, increased interservice assignments, elimination of overlapping duties and joint management of base support, logistics and transport functions.
- Priority should be given to modernizing and consolidating DOD information systems, using one common computer language and effective hardware investment.
- Stability and competition for procurement should be achieved to hone down overhead and excess facilities capacity among contractors as well as to ensure lower prices and improved quality of weapons.

The report urged that "whistleblowers" be both protected and encouraged. Too often, it noted, they are punished or harassed.

Panning Pan Am

Outside the headquarters of Pan American World Airways, New York union members demonstrate support for striking members of the Transport Workers. Negotiations and mediation efforts continued in the strike by more than 5,000 TWU members which began Mar. 1. Pan Am management has demanded more givebacks on top of two previous years of pay and contract concessions.

Sluggish GNP growth rate shows softness in economy

Signs of weakness in the nation's economy showed up in the government's "flash" estimate that the gross national product is growing only at a sluggish rate of 2.1 percent for the first quarter of the year.

The Commerce Dept. estimate, which will likely be revised when all the figures for the quarter are in, pegs current economic growth at the slowest pace since last year's third-quarter rate of 1.6 percent. Most economists believe that a GNP growth rate of at least 3 percent is necessary to keep unemployment from rising.

The report also revised downward the fourth-quarter 1984 growth rate—from 4.9 percent to 4.3 percent. It also indicated that inflation is heating up, with the government's "implicit price deflator" running at a 5.4 percent annual rate, nearly twice the rate for the fourth quarter.

Another negative development was the sharp drop of 11 percent in housing starts for February, offsetting most of the January gain of 12.9 percent. The Commerce Dept. put the seasonally adjusted annual rate of new home starts in February at 1.6 million units, a drop of about 200,000 over the month.

The decline occurred entirely among multi-family dwellings, with construction starts of apartment buildings with five or more units down 36.7 percent.

Pattern reversed

"This is exactly the reverse of what happened the month before," observed Henry Schechter, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research. Schechter, who heads the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, noted that new apartment buildings were largely responsible for the January surge in housing starts. He said apartment builders were apparently rushing to beat any tax legislation that might reduce benefits by lengthening depreciation periods.

Of greater concern, Schechter said, was the February decline in building permits, which slipped 4.7 percent over the month to an adjusted annual rate of 1.6 million.

"We shouldn't be expecting any great strength in housing," he said, "because the permits are a signal of what's likely to happen in the coming months."

Although starts of single-family homes registered a slight rise in February—5.3 percent to an adjusted annual rate of 1.1 million units—the outlook was dimmed by a rising trend in interest rates. The average rate for 30-year fixed-rate mortgages was pegged at 13.2 percent in the latest survey by the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp. This was up from about 12.8 percent a month earlier, and the National Association of Home Builders forecast a continuing upward drift this summer to more than 14 percent.

Other economic reports were mixed:

● The nation's industrial production facilities—factories, mines and utilities—operated at 80.7 percent of capacity in February, a decline of seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month and the lowest level in a year. The Federal Reserve Board, in announcing the drop in capacity utilization, said it was partly due to harsh winter weather early in February. It reflected a sharp drop in industrial production of five-tenths of 1 percent, reported by the Fed a week earlier.

● Producer prices for finished goods edged down one-tenth of 1 percent in February. Food prices at the consumer level continued to drop—one-tenth of 1 percent over the month following a decline of six-tenths of 1 percent in January. Large price drops for meat, poultry and fish offset very large increases for fresh fruits, vegetables and eggs.

Prices for finished goods other than food and energy were up three-tenths of 1 percent over the month.

Producer prices also were down for intermediate goods requiring some processing, which dropped five-tenths of 1 percent over the month, and for crude goods, which declined 1.9 percent.

● The Labor Dept. report on unemployment by states for January showed increases in jobless rates over the month in 45 states. Measured from January to January, however, the rates were down in 42 states. West Virginia continued to suffer the highest unemployment rate—15.9 percent. In all, nine states had double-digit unemployment rates in January, up from five in December.

Ohio law struck down

Court ruling upholds right to contest firing

Public employees have a right to tell "their side of the story" before being fired for cause, the Supreme Court has ruled.

The high court, in an 8-1 decision, upheld a ruling by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that an Ohio law violates the due process clause of the 14th Amendment because it denies public employees a chance to challenge their discharges before they become final.

The case grew out of separate dismissals of school board employees in Cleveland and Parma, Ohio. In the first, a security guard was fired for allegedly lying on the job application, and in the second, a bus mechanic was dismissed after failing an eye examination. Both workers filed federal suits challenging the constitutionality of the Ohio civil service law.

Rulings reversed

Lower court dismissals were reversed by the 6th Circuit on a consolidated appeal.

In the Supreme Court's decision affirming the appeals court, Justice Byron White said "an essential principle of due process is that a deprivation of life, liberty or property 'be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case.'"

"The tenured public employee is entitled to oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story," the majority opinion said.

Justice William Brennan, in a concurring opinion, said the court's decision "puts to rest" questions as to the obligation of public employers to give notice before firing an employee for cause.

"The employee's right to fair notice and an opportunity to present his side of the story is not a matter of legislative grace, but of constitutional guarantee," Brennan said.

Other views

Justice Thurgood Marshall would have gone further. He expressed his belief that "before the decision is made to terminate an employee's wages, the employee is entitled to an opportunity to test the strength of the evidence by confronting and cross-examining witnesses" and engaging in other judicial procedures.

The lone dissent was by Justice William H. Rehnquist, who argued that a state may impose procedural limits on a property interest in continued employment which is created by state law.

In other actions:

● The high court ruled 5-4 that workers on offshore drilling platforms in state waters are not engaged in "maritime employment" and therefore are not covered by the death and disability benefit provisions of the federal Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. The majority opinion, also by Justice White, reversed a ruling by the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

● An 8-0 decision by the Supreme Court upheld amendments to the Rail Passenger Service Act that required Amtrak to restore the right of railroad workers and their families to reduced-fare rail travel, but at the expense of the employees' former home railroads. Five railroads sued, arguing that they had shed all their obligations when they turned over passenger service to Amtrak, and they were upheld by the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court reversed this action, saying that the amendments had imposed a new obligation.

● The Supreme Court struck down the $1,000 limit imposed by federal law on spending by political action committees (PACs) on behalf of presidential candidates in general elections. The 7-2 opinion written by Justice Rehnquist held that the spending limit violated the 1st Amendment rights of free speech and association.

The limit set forth in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act has come under repeated legal challenge and has never been enforced. Candidates of the Republican Party have been the chief beneficiaries of heavy spending by PACs.

Justices White and Marshall dissented from the decision.

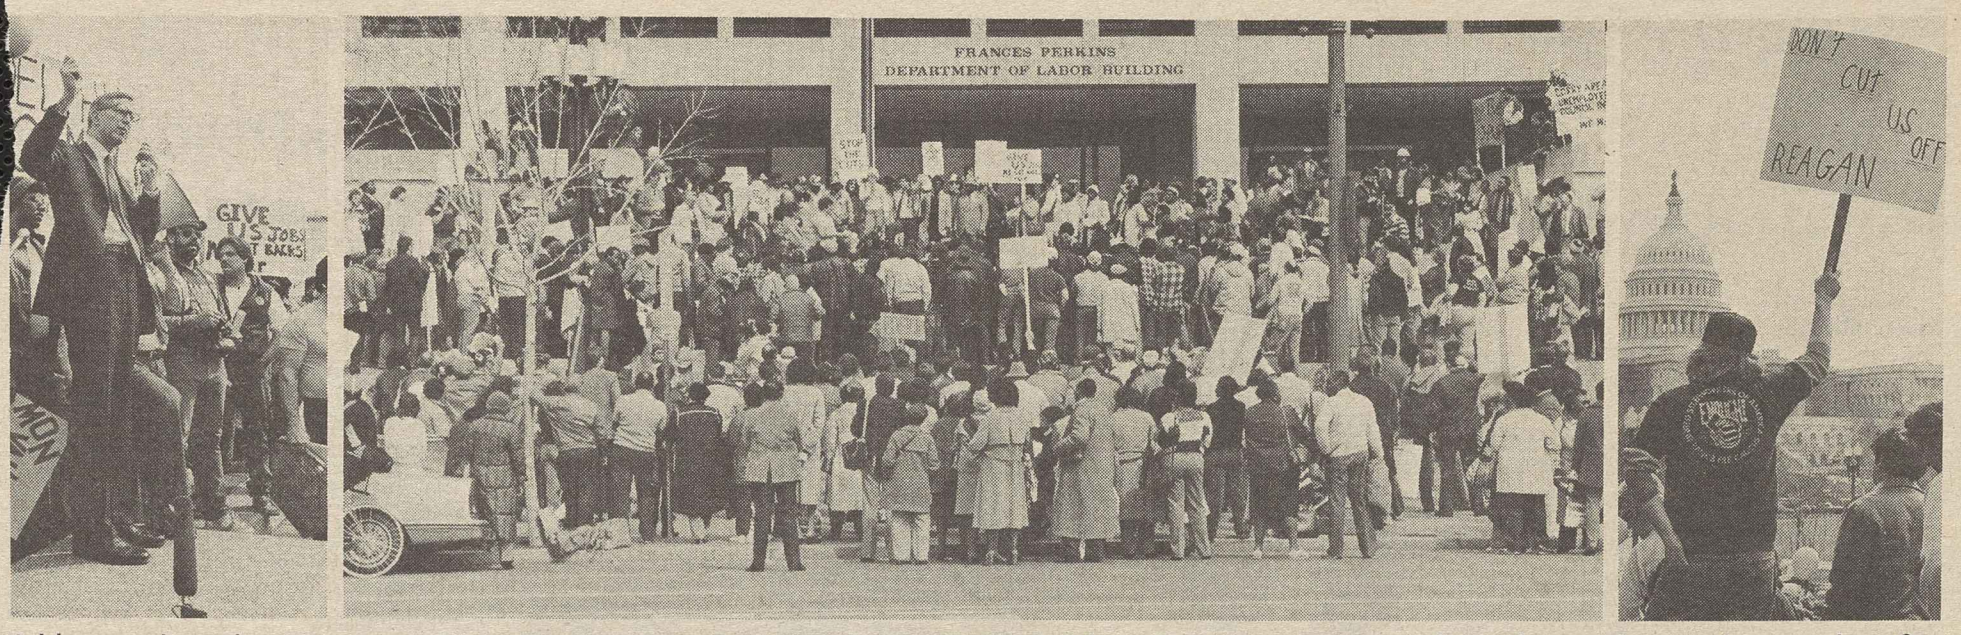
Columbia agrees to interim steps toward contract

New York — Clerical and technical workers at Columbia University represented by Auto Workers District 65 reached an agreement with the university that averted a strike over prolonged delay by the National Labor Relations Board in certifying a representation election.

Under the interim agreement, Columbia agreed to recognize District 65 as bargaining agent for the 1,100 workers as soon as the NLRB certified the election results and to begin negotiations on a contract.

A week later, the NLRB certified the union's narrow May 1983 victory, which Kitty Krupat, District 65 public affairs director, termed a "tremendous achievement" for all university workers who are "on the cutting edge of unionization."

She said that recent settlements won Locals 34 and 35 of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees at Yale University provided "breakthrough," and that District 65 negotiators would look closely at them as models at Columbia.



Columbia will make no unilateral changes in benefits until a contract is worked out. The university also agreed that in the last phase of an employee grievance procedure a union representative would be present.

Krupat said wage improvements would likely be a chief issue when bargaining gets under way. Other issues will be health and safety, affirmative action and an improved grievance procedure, she said.

Congress watch

Delegates to the Boilermakers legislative conference are advised by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue to let their senators and representatives know they are watching how Congress addresses labor's agenda. The 250 delegates, in a weeklong session, also made the rounds of the Capitol Hill offices.

Jobless workers demonstrate at Labor Dept. as Rep. Donald J. Pease (D-Ohio), left, calls for an extension of supplemental unemployment benefits.

Rally spotlights plight of nation's jobless workers

By Candice Johnson

Jobless workers from eight states sent an angry message to Congress and the Reagan Administration that the unemployed need "jobs, not hot air."

Nearly 1,200 workers rallied on the steps of the Labor Dept.'s headquarters building to dramatize the nation's continuing high unemployment rate and urge Congress to preserve the Federal Supplemental Compensation program, set to expire Mar. 31. If Congress does not act, nearly 400,000 jobless persons will be denied further unemployment benefits.

The demonstrators released helium-filled balloons to underscore their call for "jobs, not hot air." Sponsors of the rally included the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., the Full Employment Action Council, the Steelworkers, and the National Unemployment Network. Participants held afternoon meetings with their congressional representatives.

As the deadline neared, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., sent an urgent letter to President Reagan asking his support for some form of emergency action to prevent the cutoff of FSC payments.

The Labor Dept. has opposed an extension, and O'Neill saw little hope for getting a bill through the Senate unless the President signals his support.

Five busloads of workers came from western Pennsylvania, hard-hit by layoffs and steel mill closings. Sheryl Johnson of the Mon Valley Unemployed Committee called the rally and lobbying effort the last chance for the long-term unemployed.

"We have to be persistent today and get some answers," she said.

Steelworkers' locals in Cleveland and Lorain, Ohio, helped three busloads of unemployed workers make the trip. They were joined by members of the Plumbers & Pipefitters from Cleveland and Akron in appealing for "fairness and justice, not handouts."

Desperate need

Fran Christovich of the Cleveland Council of Unemployed Workers reported that the city's home foreclosure rate is the highest in the nation and that jobless workers there are desperately in need of help.

"All we can do is unite and try to make our voices heard," she said. "We're tired of excuses."

The demonstrators included white-collar as well as blue-collar workers. Carolyn Clayton, a psychiatric aide from Philadelphia reported that her job had been made part-time and her wages reduced to $4 an hour.

Loretta Horton, an organizer for the Communications Workers, and Holly Craker represented the People's Coalition of Missouri. Horton said fewer than 30 percent of the state's unemployed receive any compensation and that 14,000 workers in the state face loss of their benefits if the FSC program expires. Horton pointed out that Missouri, like most other states, has no other program to help the long-term unemployed.

IUD President Howard Samuel stressed the seriousness of the long-term unemployment problem by pointing out that the economic recovery has bypassed millions of persons. He urged the demonstrators to send a clear message to Congress that working people need help and that the federal compensation program must be extended.

Pennsylvania AFL-CIO President Julius Uehlein told the crowd the Reagan Administration hopes to use the army of unemployed against workers and their unions.

"Reagan's plan for 30 million unemployed workers is to bust unions," Uehlein charged. "People working are afraid to strike; they're accepting concessions; they know unemployed workers are ready to step in."

But this divide-and-conquer tactic can be defeated, he stressed: "We've got to hang together now."

Evelyn Dubrow, a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, said the government apparently has forgotten that jobless workers who receive no unemployment benefits cannot buy the goods America sells. She urged participants to keep up the fight in their home districts and stressed that labor's "main fight is for jobs."

Unshared recovery

Jack Sheehan, Steelworkers legislative director, said the Reagan Administration needs a strong reminder that many communities have not shared in the economic recovery.

Robert McGlotten, AFL-CIO associate director of legislation told the rally that "members of Congress need to hear from you" in Washington and back home.

The crowd also heard from senators and representatives who are pressing legislation to extend FSC benefits, including Rep. Donald J. Pease (D-Ohio), Rep. Sander Levin (D-Mich.), Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

At a news conference the following day, House Speaker O'Neill said he is prepared to bring an extension bill to a vote if there is a chance that it will become law and not be "an empty exercise." His letter to Reagan, O'Neill said, was "appealing to his decency."

UAW ratifies pact covering 7,000 at Jeep factory

Toledo, Ohio — The Auto Workers ratified a new three-year agreement with the Jeep Corp. that provides wages and fringe benefit improvements for some 7,000 UAW members.

The agreement, which averted a walkout, is similar in most respects to settlements between the union and the Big Three auto makers reached late last year. The UAW said 74 percent of members voting approved the contract.

It replaces an agreement that expired on Jan. 31 and provides for three lump-sum payments of 3 percent of a worker's previous year's straight-time earnings, payable each January in 1986, 1987 and 1988.

Workers received a $200 special payment upon ratification and $2.85 in cost-of-living adjustments under the old contract were rolled into wage hourly rates.

The settlement, covering office employees, engineering staff, and skilled craft workers, includes a job security program similar to that agreed to by Ford and General Motors. Jeep agreed to commit $16 million to a fund to continue pay or provide job training for workers displaced due to technological development, productivity improvements, or "outsourcing," the industry term for subcontracting work outside the company.

Under the old contract, workers had agreed to an "employee investment program" with Jeep's parent company, American Motors Corp., under which they gave up certain wage and cost-of-living increases.

Negligent labor law enforcement bolsters union-busting consultants

Indianapolis—Management consultants who coach employers in union-busting are the direct descendants of the hired thugs and professional strikebreakers of an earlier generation, union attorney Jules Bernstein charged.

Today's employer consultant industry goes in for "more ingenious and subtle forms of union-busting," Bernstein said. But its goal is the same, to prevent workers from organizing and to thwart collective bargaining.

Bernstein said inadequate enforcement of existing federal labor laws, as well as flaws in the laws themselves, has contributed to "the growth of the modern union-busting industry." His remarks were made at a labor law conference sponsored by Indiana University's School of Law and the National Labor Relations Board.

He was especially critical of the Labor Dept. under the Reagan Administration for its lack of enforcement of a section of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act which requires detailed disclosure reports from consultants involved in "persuading" workers regarding their choice of union representation.

"The law as it is written is far from toothless," Bernstein noted, and there is much the Labor Dept. can do to make it work.

Instead, he protested, "the department appears these days to be aggressively applying its investigatory authority almost exclusively against unions and union officials while the employer and consultant reporting provisions are being treated as dead letters."

Bernstein, who is a member of the law firm of Connerton, Bernstein & Katz, also was critical of the NLRB's reluctance to act against "unscrupulous employer consultants."

He suggested that the NLRB consider:

- Naming consultants as well as employers in unfair labor practice complaints with greater frequency than is now the case.
- Keeping agency-wide records of a pattern of consultant abuses of federal labor law "for possible broad remedial action."

Bar associations, too, should consider disciplinary action against attorney consultants "who promote illegality," Bernstein suggested. And the government should stop reimbursing its contractors for anti-union expenditures, he said, and for legal expenses they incur in contesting NLRB orders.

Lawyers who specialize in opposing union representation often go "far beyond" the legitimate function of "legal advice and counsel," he said.

"Attorneys now operate as strategists for employer 'Vote No' campaigns," Bernstein said, and often flout both the law and professional ethics in their actions. He said lawyer consultants conduct seminars in promoting decertification of unions, even though the law prohibits employers from promoting decertifications.

Too many employers, Bernstein suggested, "appear to perceive the law not as a system which has attempted to humanize and democratize labor relations, but as a set of rules to be bent, evaded and broken."

3-year accord settles Filene's strike

A new three-year contract with wage increases totaling 14.5 percent brought settlement of a six-day strike at Filene's department stores and distribution centers in Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

Members of Food & Commercial Workers Local 1445 ratified the agreement, which covers some 3,600 employees at 14 Filene's retail facilities and distribution centers. Local Business Agent John Phinney said most of the employees covered by the contract are retail clerks. It was the first strike in the 40 years the union has represented Filene's workers.

The wage package calls for increases of 4.5 percent for 1985 and 5 percent each year in 1986 and 1987. Lump sum payments totaling $500 a year were negotiated for those working on commission.

The company agreed to absorb increases in the cost of health care benefits in the final two years of the contract up to $10 a month for family coverage and $5 a month for individual coverage. Phinney noted a number of health care cost containment provisions in the contract including the option for coverage by a health maintenance orgainzation.

Nicaraguan labor presses for dialogue

Managua—The Nicaraguan labor movement called on all sectors of this divided country to join in a national dialogue to bring peace, freedom and justice to its people.

In an address to a fact-finding mission of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, Sec.-Gen. Alvin Guthrie of Nicaragua's Confederation for Trade Union Unification (CUS) warned:

"We cannot begin to reconstruct our ailing country so long as there is no genuine and authentic national dialogue leading to an effective political pluralism and to authentic trade union freedom. . . .

"So long as there are no basic pillars of democracy, it will be difficult to have peace in our country. It was for those sacred ideals that the Nicaraguan people went to war against the rightist dictator Somoza."

Guthrie said that CUS is willing to forget the harassment dealt its members by the Sandinista government on condition that the Sandinistas promote a "realistic and genuine democracy" in Nacaragua.

"We know and we are certain that if the Sandinista government enters into sincere dialogue with all sectors of the opposition, with the firm objective of achieving peace in Nicaragua, the effort of reconciliation . . . will certainly meet with a positive response," Guthrie declared.

The 17-member ICFTU mission, which included Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, will present its report on the trade union and human rights situation in Nicaragua to the ICFTU executive council's meeting in Washington on Apr. 15.

Besides Nicaragua, the mission visited the Dominican Republic, Panama, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras.

Saving the farm

Auto Workers and Clothing & Textile Workers in Glenwood, Minn., join with their farming neighbors to stop the foreclosure sale of a family farm. Gathered outside the Pope County courthouse, the farm-labor coalition got the sheriff to postpone one sale because of their activity, but he also had 24 pickets arrested.

Chrysler workers to get cash bonus, auto discount

Detroit — Auto Workers at Chrysler Corp. will receive a double $500 "thank you" for their sacrifices in helping return the nation's third largest automaker to excellent financial health, UAW President Owen Bieber and Chrysler President Lee Iacocca announced.

Bieber and UAW Vice President Marc Stepp, director of the union's Chrysler Dept., said a special one-time bonus of $500 will be paid to all workers who were on the payroll at the end of 1984.

Further, the Chrysler workers will be eligible for a $500 discount on the purchase of a new Chrysler product, provided they exercise the option and order a new vehicle by Apr. 30, or purchase one from a dealer by June 6, Bieber and Stepp reported.

Bieber credited the union's seat on the Chrysler board of directors for the special bonus. "The board is acknowledging the enormous contribution of the Chrysler workers to the corporation's return to robust profitability."

Chrysler posted profits of $2.4 billion in 1984 on sales of $19.6 billion. Between 1979 and 1981, however, the UAW members' concession aided the company by an estimated $2.5 to $3 billion. The sacrifice was even greater than money, though, as the workforce shrank from around 100,000 to 45,000 at the low point. It has rebounded to just over 60,000 active UAW members.

Bieber and Stepp emphasized that the one-time bonus will in no way change the union's overall position on bargaining when talks open to replace the contract that expries on Oct. 15.

The union will be pressing to bring the Chrysler workers' wages, benefits and working conditions "back on track with their sisters and brothers at General Motors and Ford," they said.

25,000 jobs threatened by Amtrak slash

The Reagan Administration's plan to derail all funding for Amtrak would force its shutdown, wipe out 25,000 jobs and cost taxpayers billions of dollars, Congress was warned.

Railway & Airline Clerks President Richard I. Kilroy and James R. Snyder, legislative committee chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association, were joined by Amtrak President Graham Claytor in detailing the impact of the Administration move to a House transportation subcommittee.

Snyder said the loss of 21,000 Amtrak jobs and some 4,200 jobs on other railroads that perform services for Amtrak would take $524 million in revenues from the 44 states where Amtrak operates. Hardest hit would be Pennsylvania, Maryland, New York and New Jersey, he said.

Key among the government's expenses if Amtrak closed would be the payout of $2.1 billion over six years for labor protection expenses to Amtrak employees as provided for in the 1971 legislation establishing Amtrak.

Snyder noted that in addition to the $2.1 billion, $200 mililon more in liabilities would be incurred by the carriers with which Amtrak contracts for passenger service. He stressed, too, that the elimination of 25,000 jobs would also have an adverse impact on the railroad retirement system.

Recouping savings

Kilroy, whose union represents about 7,000 of the Amtrak workers, pointed out that the 1981 contract between Amtrak and its unions provided for wage deferrals of up to 12 percent, which saved the railroad about $150 million. BRAC members account for about $51 million of that savings, Kilroy said, but union negotiators intend to recover that amount from Amtrak, rather than grant further concessions.

"Amtrak and the U.S. government are absolutely responsible for the full and justifiable monetary protections negotiated in good faith for the employees in the service of Amtrak," Kilroy and Snyder stressed.

Claytor told the subcommittee that the government's first-year liability under the labor protection agreements would be $645 million, which is larger than Amtrak's operating expenses for 1985. He stressed that the Senate Budget Committee's plan to scale back funding in fiscal 1986 to $479 million and lesser amounts in the subsequent two years is also "unworkable" as it would trigger cuts in service and steep labor protection payments.

Kirkland welcomes selection of Brock as Labor secretary

expressed the hope that his successor would be "a person who enjoys the respect and confidence of labor as well as management and the public at large."

As Kirkland put it, the new secretary should "vigorously pursue" the mission set by Congress in the 1913 law establishing the Dept. of Labor. According to the law, the department is "to foster, promote and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States."

Brock had a conservative voting record during his eight years in the House and six years as a senator from Tennessee. He was defeated for re-election to the Senate in 1976 by labor-backed James R. Sasser, and subsequently became Republican national chairman. He is 54 and before entering politics was an executive officer of his family's candy company in Chattanooga.

WILLIAM E. BROCK

As Republican chairman, he broke new ground with a determined effort to build bridges to groups traditionally aligned with the Democratic Party, insisting that Republicans "have to stop talking just to each other."

Soon after his appointment as U.S. Trade Representative, a Cabinet-level position, Brock met with the AFL-CIO Executive Council to discuss trade issues which then as now were high on labor's agenda.

Later, meeting with reporters, Brock said he had come to the council meeting because he will need the help of the nation's union leaders in dealing with complex trade negotiations because "they know the problems."

At the White House news briefing where his appointment was announced, Brock acknowledged the sharp rift between the Donovan Labor Dept. and the trade union movement.

Open talks

"We have a lot of communicating to do," he told reporters. "But that's precisely what I would like to do."

Brock said he had phoned Kirkland after accepting the appointment and described the AFL-CIO president as "a man I have a great respect for, and a man I think I can work comfortably with."

At a congressional hearing the next day, dealing with taxation of job-related benefits, Kirkland said in response to a question that he had hopes that Brock's appointment will restore the Labor Dept. "as a significant instrument for the advancement of working people."

Brock's nomination will be considered first by the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee and then put to a confirmation vote of the full Senate.

A Test of Fairness

THE INDUSTRIAL nations of the world have looked upon health care, education, retirement security and life, disability and unemployment insurance as fundamental necessities.

Most have dealt with them through government programs financed through general revenues. In all of the countries that have chosen this path, such programs have been endorsed, maintained and expanded by successive governments, liberal and conservative alike.

The United States has chosen a different path. Congress chose to try to meet these needs by encouraging the untaxed diversion of a part of each worker's wage to meet perceived social needs.

The success of this social policy is testified to by the fact that 140 million people now have job-related health-care insurance protection in the United States. Thus, this is not a tax incentive that has benefited only a small, powerful minority or a narrow, special-interest lobby.

This network of protection was created under the leadership of the American trade union movement, through the institution of collective bargaining, but it has long since become deeply embedded in the nation's whole employment structure.

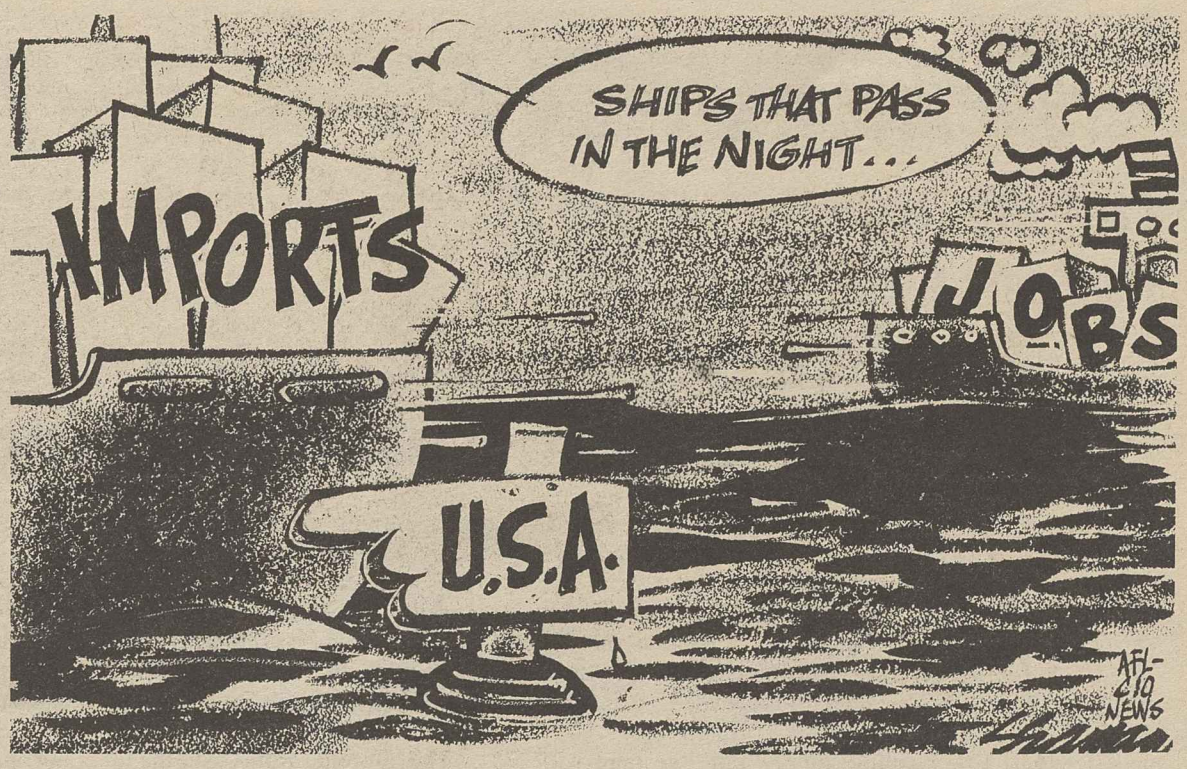
IT WOULD BE HARD to overstate the role of this life-support network in developing the nation's economy.

Until the late 1930s, working people and their families lived with the constant fear that illness or disability would mean dispossession and impoverishment as well. Such is still often the case if the job-related life-support system is disrupted by unemployment, as we saw in the recent recession. To many families whose breadwinner was laid off or fired, the loss of health-care insurance coverage proved a greater blow than the loss of the job itself.

Some found that even a short hospital stay wiped out all their savings. Others, without insurance or cash in hand, were stopped at the hospital door and sent to public health facilities, putting a heavy strain on public resources.

With the experiences of the recent recession freshly in mind, Congress ought to be considering ways to strengthen the private life-support system rather than devising new taxes to undermine it.

The attack on employee benefit programs is taking place at a time of huge and deepening federal deficits. But the tax treatment of benefits is not the source of this crisis. The revenue shortfall should not be met by levying additional burdens on working people and adding to the unfairness that has characterized economic policies of the past several years.



TAXING WORKERS' life-support benefits has been a part of this Administration's agenda since its earliest days. Health insurance, accident and life insurance, unemployment compensation, workers' compensation, day care, education programs, group prepaid legal plans—even pensions—are all on the hit list. The Bradley-Gephardt "fair" tax plan, it should be noted, also would tax employee benefits.

The Administration and others who would tax benefits seek to justify this effort with the notion of equal treatment of similarly situated taxpayers. This would make some sense if applied to preferences and abuses motivated by tax avoidance with few, if any, redeeming features. Unfairness is epitomized by such abuses as expense account living, country club membership, and other questionable preferences that discriminate in favor of those at the top. Such practices have no social purpose, and certainly should not be encouraged by the tax code.

In contrast, the employee benefit programs under attack are not frivolous perks or gimmicks to shelter income. They don't generate phony losses or otherwise reduce the taxes of the privileged, but are widely distributed in the national interest.

It is unfair that all workers do not benefit by an adequate medical program, pension protection, life insurance and other benefits. But such inequities should be resolved through public and private policies that encourage a leveling-up of benefits, not by policies that seek to reduce everyone to the lowest common denominator.

Reagan turns deaf ear to workplace noise curb

By Press Associates, Inc.

When the hearing conservation amendment to the federal noise standard was issued in January 1981, organized labor had good reason to celebrate. But not because the new rule was perfect as far as unions were concerned. It wasn't as strong as they would have preferred.

The amendment was important because it was the first time the federal government had really sanctioned labor's concept that just because a worker takes a job to make a living doesn't mean he or she must give up the right to hear.

Previously, the federal government had limited worker noise exposure to 90 decibels averaged over eight hours, reached through administrative and engineering controls. This was done first in 1969 under the Walsh-Healey Act by covering workers whose employers held federal contracts and then under the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970, which expanded the rule to employers engaged in interstate commerce.

Measurable hearing loss is possible at 90 decibels. The 1981 amendment culminated a decades-long struggle by labor to make employers responsible for work-related hearing loss through noise level monitoring, employee hearing tests, education and training and extra hearing protection when noise levels were 85 decibels or more—a level classified as "very loud" by noise experts.

Administration action

Labor's celebration was short-lived. Weeks after the Reagan Administration took office, then-Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan postponed the effective date of the hearing conservation amendment. After the AFL-CIO sued, the White House and the Occupational Safety & Health Administration let some parts of the new rule go into effect while it reviewed other provisions.

The Reagan action wasn't a surprise. White House budget director David Stockman earlier had targeted the hearing conservation amendment as an example of federal regulation adding to businesses' expenses, estimated at $270 million annually or $53 per worker per year for some 5.5 million workers.

The Administration seized every chance to further erode the standard which was so objectionable to business. After a 9th U.S. Circuit Appeals Court decision on Castle and Cooke that allowed cost-benefit analysis to be applied to the noise rule, OSHA amended the noise standard through a policy directive to its regional field offices.

Rule struck down

Then came the worst blow. The 4th U.S. Circuit Appeals Court in Richmond, Va., acting on a case brought by the Forging Industry Association, struck down the amendment. It ruled that the hearing conservation rules went beyond OSHA's authority because they made employers responsible for hearing loss that may be caused by non-occupational hazards, such as loud rock music or motorcycle noise.

OSHA hemmed and hawed, but finally asked the court to review its decision—the first step in what may be a lengthy appeals process. Meanwhile, OSHA directed its field offices not to enforce the hearing conservation amendment.

Where does this leave enforcement of the noise rule? Experts debated that question at a recent meeting of the Urban Environment Conference, a coalition of labor and environmental groups.

Dr. Alice Suter, a noise abatement expert formerly with the Environmental Protection Agency and OSHA who is now a private consultant, said noise programs "are mostly gone at this point."

One thing is certain, Suter said: The current state of hearing protection leaves American workers light years behind the protections in other industrial nations, such as West Germany, Sweden and the Soviet Union. In those nations, noise is viewed as life-threatening through its contribution to stress-linked diseases.

For the Reagan Administration, it seems noisy workplaces, hearing loss and noise-linked stress diseases are the price American workers must pay for their jobs.

MEMO FROM COPE

Supreme Court Rules...

For Presidential Candidates Sky's Limit on PAC Spending

The U.S. Supreme Court told non-party political committees (PACs) they can go ahead and keep doing what they've been doing anyway.

That is, they can raise and spend unlimited sums on behalf of presidential nominees as long as there's no contact or coordination with the candidate's committee. These are so-called "independent expenditures."

The court's 7-2 ruling simply put its stamp of approval on a practice used lavishly in 1980 and 1984 presidential campaigns by right-wing PACs supporting the Reagan candidacy.

In 1980, for example, three ad hoc PACs spent nearly $15 million to boost Reagan. In 1984, more than $16 million was put into "independent expenditures" for the President, most of it by the National Conservative PAC (NCPAC).

(Such spending skews the intent and use of public financing of presidential campaigns, which was meant to equalize candidate funding.)

It was NCPAC's expenditures that were challenged by the Democratic Party and the Federal Election Commission. They charged such expenditures were in violation of the $1,000 spending lid the law says applies to PACs for presidential candidates.

The Supreme Court said the lid is unconstitutional, basically on First Amendment grounds. Writing for the majority, Justice William Rhenquist said setting a limit on PAC expenditures on behalf of a presidential candidate would be "like allowing a speaker in a public hall to express his views while denying him the use of an amplifier."

Writing in dissent for himself and Justice Thurgood Marshall, Justice Byron White said the First Amendment "protects the right to speak, not the right to spend, and limitations on the amount of money that can be spent are not the same as restrictions on speaking."

White said the majority's "credulous acceptance of the formal distinction between coordinated and independent expenditures blinks political reality. That the PAC's expenditures are not formally 'coordinated' is too slender a reed on which to distinguish them from actual contributions to the campaign."

It is questionable now just what impact the court decision will have on future presidential campaigns. Right-wing PACs undoubtedly will continue to raise and spend funds as they have the past two presidential elections. Perhaps the decision will lead to a spate of Democratic-leaning PACs doing the same for their favored candidates.

One thing it's sure to do is further enrich the networks that carry the ads and the professionals who prepare them.

Senate Contest Spending Soars

U.S. Senate candidates spent $136.9 million in 1984 general elections, up 21 percent from 1982, a Common Cause study shows. For the 65 candidates, average spending was more than $2 million.

Political action committee (PAC) contributions to Senate candidates were $27.9 million, according to the study, a boost of 28 percent over 1982.

Meanwhile, final (or semi-final) figures showed, to nobody's surprise, that the North Carolina Senate race exceeded all others in contributions and spending. Sen. Jesse Helms raised $16.5 million and spent $16.2 in his successful re-election campaign. His opponent, Gov. Jim Hunt, didn't do so bad, either. He raised a little more than $10 million and spent $9.2.

In Texas, Phil Gramm shelled out $9.4 million to get elected to the Senate, and loser Lloyd Doggett put up $5.5 million.

$4-$5 Million Fund

GOP Starts 'Softening Up' Targeted Dems

It's called a "softening up" process.

Its premise is simple: Take a bunch of money and start using it early to attack about 30-40 incumbent House Democrats.

Then, keep up the attack right to election day 1986.

The plan is the National Republican Congressional Committee's. The fund for its 18-month campaign to unseat potentially vulnerable Democratic incumbents is now $4-$5 million. If the committee needs another $4-$5 million—or more—that'll be no big deal. Money has not been a GOP campaign problem for several years. The party is awash in it.

No "hit list" as such has been released, but much of it can be inferred, and it could include an odd blend of conservative and more mainstream Democrats.

For example, Rep. Guy Vander Jagt (Mich.), chairman of the GOP campaign committee, said many of the targets would be Democrats who "grabbed Reagan's coattails" to get elected or re-elected in 1984 then failed to support Reagan in the current session of Congress.

Vander Jagt said the records of these Democrats would be widely publicized by the GOP in their districts if they indeed show opposition to Reagan's program. Most of this element in the target group would be in the South and West, where 19 of the 30 closest House elections occurred last November.

By inference, other incumbents getting the early treatment will be mainstream Democrats who made it by a thin edge in November.

The GOP campaign will involve both direct mail and media advertising. More than $200,000 is earmarked per target district. However, this figure could balloon since there is no legal limit on the amount the committee can spend. That's because these will be so-called "independent expenditure" campaigns not directly urging the election or defeat of specific candidates, but rather "explaining" an incumbent's record and position on issues.

Republicans are optimistic about the potential impact of this campaign and other 1986 campaign efforts. They point to recent polls that show the GOP just about neck and neck with Democrats in voter party preference. They particularly are buoyed by present GOP strength among young voters.

Democrats aren't rolling over and playing dead, however. Said Rep. Tony Coelho (Calif.), chairman of the Democratic House campaign committee, "We're going to be out there just as aggressively . . . as they are."

Rightists See Their Own 'Golden Age'

Well, here's another "golden age."

A couple of months ago, Republican leaders—Sen. Paul Laxalt (Nev.) for one, GOP party chairman Frank Fahrenkopf for another—were heralding an approaching "golden age" for the GOP.

The phrase caught on with ultra-conservatives who, at a recent national meeting, were told that they had created "the golden age of American conservatism." (This news was spilled by William Rusher, publisher of National Review.)

Some believe a "golden age" for one is a "golden age" for the other. In fact, the conservatives practically picked the GOP's 1988 presidential candidate. In a straw poll, 39 percent went for Rep. Jack Kemp. But Vice President George Bush showed surprising strength with 35 percent support. The real sentimental favorite, Jesse Helms, picked up 10 percent.

The numbers that most reveal the fight for control of the GOP that will soon enough break through the surface show in the straw vote for Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole (Kan.) and his predecessor Howard Baker (Tenn.) who did not seek re-election last year.

Both are considered authentic, credible candidates for the 1988 GOP nomination. Both have solid GOP credentials. Both have national recognition.

Neither one of them got a single vote from among the 269 ultra-conservative activists who responded to the straw poll. It's as if they don't exist as Republicans. They are mainstreamers, but if the ultra-conservatives have their way, the mainstream will shift far to the right, leaving the Doles and Bakers and others like them isolated on a distant left bank.

Of course, there is already ample evidence of stream diversion. Ronald Reagan is in the White House for a second term. The ultras controlled the last GOP convention. They have large representation in the House and Senate and increasing power in the White House itself.

There will be a struggle to see whose "golden age" it's going to be . . . and the fight could louse it up both for mainstream and for ultra-conservative Republicans.

Rusher himself warned against it. He said conservatives could mess up their own "period of dominance and unity" because temperamentally "there are some who can't stand that. They have a siege mentality. They can't stand success." Amen.

One Vote Counts!

Barbara Casey of Roswell, N.M., doesn't have to be convinced that one vote counts.

Last November she won her state legislative race by 110 votes. At least, that's what she thought.

But errors and a cache of uncounted absentee ballots overturned the result and gave Ms. Casey's opponent, Melodi Salas, a one-vote victory—2,687-2,686. At least, that's what Ms. Salas thought.

Ms. Casey called for a recount, got it, and won it . . . by just three votes—2,693-2,690.

One vote counts!

Helms's PAC Charged With Violations

While Jesse Helms is busy looking for ways to buy control of CBS so folks will get their news straight and without any "liberal bias," his political action committee is defending itself against charges of violating the election laws.

The Federal Election Commission filed suit against Helms's National Congressional Club, one of the nation's most successful fund-raising PACs, and Jefferson Marketing Inc. The latter does political advertising and consulting. The FEC charges Jefferson Marketing counts on the National Congressional Club for most of its business and revenue, that it receives interest-free loans from NCC and "was created, financed and controlled" by NCC officials R. E. Carter Wrenn and Thomas Ellis.

The two groups are, in effect, one, the FEC says, and are in violation.

Chargese of illegalities by Helms's PAC come at a time when the North Carolina senator is spearheading a national effort to cram ultra-conservative views down the throats of the news media through acquisition of stock.

The particular target is CBS, but the media at-large could become gun-shy if the stock purchase plan Helms is pushing appears to catch on.

Helms's campaign to get conservatives to buy stock in CBS is being run by Fairness in the Media, which just happens to be led by Carter Wrenn, an official of Helms's Congressional Club.

City workers, mayors join in budget protest

By Candice Johnson

Teachers, firefighters, truck drivers and thousands of other city workers joined mayors, students and senior citizens at the U.S. Capitol to protest the Reagan Administration's proposed budget cuts in urban programs.

The rally, sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, brought nearly 5,000 workers from cities across the country to urge Congress to support a fair federal budget.

The Administration has proposed deep cuts in several programs vital to urban areas, including elimination of the $4.6 billion general revenue sharing program, an end to Urban Development Action Grants, reductions in mass transit and a freeze in housing aid.

The Reagan budget would cut back aid to state and local governments by $11.8 billion, forcing most jurisdictions to raise taxes, cut social services or both.

Need and neglect

President Gerald McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees told the crowd that the White House has declared war on every level of government and "aimed its guns at every Main Street in America." Its principal weapon, McEntee said, is the proposed budget slashing aid to cities by 50 percent. McEntee observed that "real people" live in the President's "shining city on the hill," and "they must deal with the realities of city life, and the ugliness of need and neglect." He said labor would be in the fight for a fair budget for as long as it takes.

Teachers President Albert Shanker noted that organized labor historically has supported both a strong national defense and social justice at home.

"We say don't destroy this country to maintain only one part of what the Constitution demands," Shanker declared "We must provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare." He called on Congress and the Administration "to do justice to our citizens."

A contingent of firefighters and police in dress uniform from Scranton, Pa., attested to that city's financial crisis. Scranton must cut its payroll by $3 million and plans to furlough 50 firefighters, according to IAFF member Jim Cooney. The only alternative to the layoffs is a 5 percent tax increase, but Cooney believes that Scranton, with one of the nation's largest populations of senior citizens, cannot afford higher taxes.

IAFF president John A. Gannon earlier had warned that the elimination of rev-

House showdown near on jobless aid renewal

Federation Vice President J. C. Turner raps Administration foot-dragging on toxic waste dump safeguards. With him at House hearings are Richard Duffy of the Fire Fighters and the AFL-CIO's Margaret Seminaro.

April benefit cutoff looms for 325,000

House Democrats stiffened their backbones and agreed to put up a fight to continue a still-needed program of federal benefits for America's long-term unemployed.

President Reagan wants to let the Federal Supplemental Compensation program die, which would mean that more than 325,000 long-jobless workers would get their last benefit checks early in April.

For a time, it appeared that he would get his way by default. An extension bill languished in a Ways & Means subcommittee, and House leaders expressed reluctance to do battle in the face of White House opposition.

Timetable set

But with the spur of a hastily convened Democratic caucus, the Ways & Means subcommittee approved a stopgap bill. The timetable calls for quick action by the full committee and a House floor vote on Apr. 4, before Congress starts its Easter recess.

The subcommittee bill would continue FSC for an additional three months but reduce the duration of benefits for persons newly eligible. The program would then phase out unless Congress extended it further.

A companion bill, also cleared by the subcommittee, would make more accessible the permanent extended benefits program that now requires a very high insured unemployment rate to take effect. But even if approved by Congress and signed

OSHA hit for ignoring toxic waste site hazards

By Arlee C. Green

The Reagan Administration has done nothing in the last five years to protect workers who are cleaning up toxic waste dumps despite requirements of the 1980 "Superfund" law, the AFL-CIO charged at congressional hearings.

The Superfund law stipulates that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Environmental Protection Agency jointly develop safeguards for the cleanup crews.

Federation Vice President J. C. Turner told a House subcommittee that given the hazardous nature of these dumps, "it is incredible that there are no OSHA standards governing cleanup work and very little OSHA inspection and enforcement activities at dump sites."

Turner, chairman of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Occupational Safety & Health and president of the Operating Engineers, stressed that "the greatest need is for a set of comprehensive standards governing toxic waste sites."

Margaret Seminario, the federation's industrial hygienist branded OSHA's enforcement record at toxic waste sites as "dismal." She said the agency schedules inspections only in response to complaints or requests from other agencies.

In detailing the need for a comprehensive program to protect workers, Turner told the Government Operations subcommittee that OSHA should not "waste time and effort trying to determine exposure limits to the individual chemicals and other toxics that may be at a site." A better approach, he said, would be to provide for continuous training, engineering controls, work practice rules on clean-up operations, medical monitoring on a regular basis, exposure monitoring, and effective right-to-know rules.

Turner noted that the clean-up of toxic waste sites has become a growth industry. Estimating it will take at least 50 highly trained workers at each cleanup site, "that translates into at least one million jobs," he said.

"The magnitude of the problem is mind-boggling and the dimensions of the workers' safety and health problem are directly proportional to the magnitude of the

'Violence' hearing rewrites script

By David L. Perlman

Senate hearings intended to build a case for making picket line misconduct a federal crime under the Hobbs Act ended up instead turning a spotlight on the tactics of a union-busting management and its paid agents.

That's not the script Senate Labor Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) had in mind when he singled out a still-continuing strike at the Missouri Portland Cement Co. operations at Joppa, Ill., to showcase "union violence."

The "violence" in support of the strike by Cement Workers Local 438, an affiliate of the Boilermakers, turned out to be quite a bit tamer than the assertion by Sen. Hatch that the hearings would show how union "threats, assaults and wanton disregard for human life" left the community "traumatized by violence."

What "violence" there was, testimony showed, came as much from hired strikebreakers and an army of private guards that outnumbered the strikers as from union members.

Consultant brags

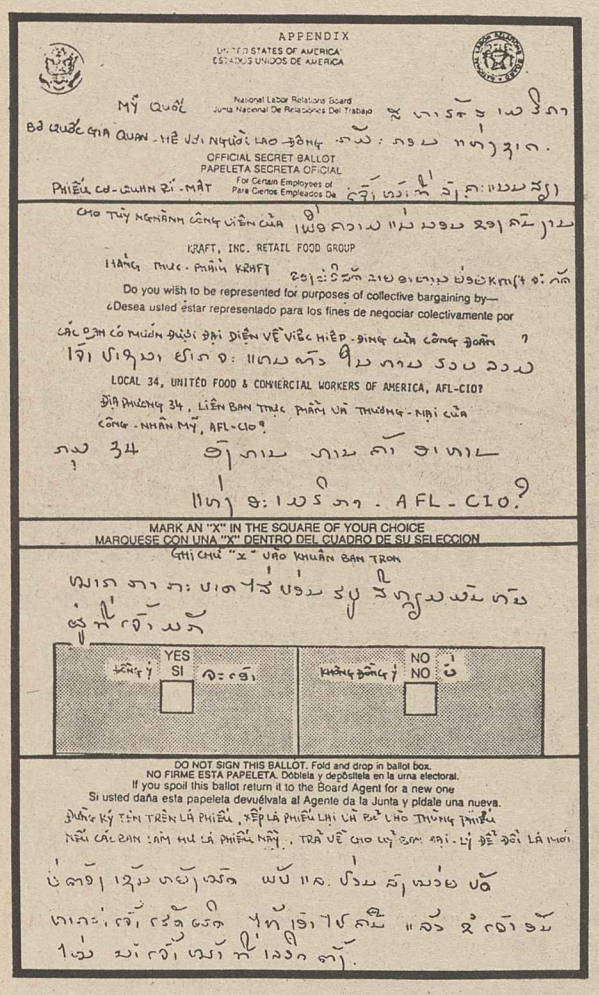
The union-busting strategy came in large measure from Thomas E. Hall, Jr., a hired management consultant. Hall was so proud of his "success" that he solicited other cement companies, with a letter including these boasts:

"No doubt you have heard that Missouri Portland Cement Co. has replaced its striking workforce at its plant in Joppa, Ill. This replacement of workers was conducted on a very discreet and successful basis by my firm, Hall & Associates. . . .

"I am pleased to say to you that my organization was able to recruit the necessary skilled and unskilled workers without the union ever realizing what was going on. As a result of our ability to replace Missouri Portland's workforce, the company has effected an ongoing cost savings of several million dollars as a result of:

"1. Reducing wage rates by 30 percent.



"2. Reducing benefits levels.

"3. Reducing workforce by one-third.

Kraft breaks eggs on its face

Dunkirk, N.Y.—For all its attempts to bust the union by circumventing labor law and using delaying tactics, Kraft, Inc., Retail Group wound up with egg on its face, giving the Food & Commercial Workers a big victory here.

Kraft sought to decertify UFCW Local 34, but the union won a Mar. 23, 1984, representation election 119 to 112, with no challenged ballots.

Because the labor force included Hispanic, Laotian and Vietnamese workers, the National Labor Relations Board's regional office in Buffalo prepared a multilingual ballot for the election.

Kraft, which had pressed the regional office for the multilanguage ballot, subsequently filed objections with the NLRB, asking that the election be set aside on the grounds that the workers were confused by the wording.

The regional director found that all the employer's complaints lacked merit. A three-member NLRB panel in Washington disagreed, however.

In a 2-to-1 decision, the NLRB refused to certify Local 34's election victory, and ordered a second election be held at the plant. This time, there was no question of the workers' choice. They backed Local 34 by a vote of 147-81.

In dissenting from the ruling on the earlier election signed by Chairman Donald Dotson and Member Robert Hunter, Member Patricia Diaz Dennis pointed out that the non-English translations —Spanish, Laotian and Vietnamese—actually affected only three members of the workforce.

Local 34 Business Agent and Vice President George Fromm said that just to be on the safe side, the union asked for and got four separate ballots in the second election, which was held this month, with the translations performed by the NLRB in Washington.

"It is just further evidence of the need for an overhaul of the labor laws," Fromm said. "The ballot was immaterial. It only affected those three people."

Fromm branded the flap over the ballot as just another employer stalling tactic, reinforced by Reagan appointees on the NLRB.

Now board-certified, the union is in the process of negotiating a new contract with the company.

U.S. takes another beating as foreign trade deficit soars

A sharp rise in auto imports from Japan fueled a new surge in the U.S. trade deficit in February, sending job-destroying tremors throughout the economy.

The gap between U.S. exports and imports rose to $11.4 billion, the highest monthly level since September. For Japan alone, the deficit jumped from $3.7 billion in January to $4.3 billion in February. But the imbalance with other major U.S. trading partners also continued to grow.

The worsening trade picture "demands immediate action by the Reagan Administration and Congress" to curb job-destroying imports, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

From the usually optimistic Commerce Dept. came the glum prediction that "further increases in imports and higher trade deficits lie ahead."

The Administration has insisted that the solution to the ever-rising trade deficit is increased American exports rather than restraints on imports. But the 8 percent drop in U.S. exports from January to February was worse than for any month since January 1978.

"U.S. exporters continue to struggle with the handicaps imposed by the strong dollar, slower growth abroad and by foreign import barriers," Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said.

In the job-sensitive manufacturing sector, U.S. exports of manufactured goods declined by $1.3 billion in February, while imports rose by $444 million. The worsening of the trade balance brought the manufacturing sector deficit to $9.3 billion in February.

In addition to Japan, the United States had trade deficits during February of $1.5 billion with the European Economic Community, $1.1 billion with Taiwan, $425 million with South Korea and $410 million with Mexico.

The deficit would have been higher if U.S. petroleum imports had not declined 11.8 percent over the month.

Imports of cars from Japan rose 47 percent in February, to a total of $1.56 billion. That figure was before any impact from Japan's announcement that it would increase auto imports to the United States by 25 percent.

CWA ads push operator-backed phone service

Undaunted by CBS's rejection of its television commercial promoting operator-backed long-distance telephone service, the Communications Workers kicked off a major national advertising campaign to persuade consumers to choose such service.

The $2-million campaign got off the ground with the airing of the CWA commercial on ABC's World News Tonight, a full page ad in USA Today, a rotation of TV commercials on Cable News Network, and radio spots on Mutual Broadcasting's Larry King radio show.

The union switched to ABC rather than change the commercial to suit CBS. The network had termed the commercial "advocacy advertising" and had asked CWA to remove or change the tag line "Don't give it up," a reference to operator service.

CWA President Glenn Watts's comment was, "They sure are advocacy (ads) —consumer advocacy. We think the consumer needs to understand the benefits of operator-backed long-distance service regardless of what CBS thinks."

Firms see tax reducing benefits

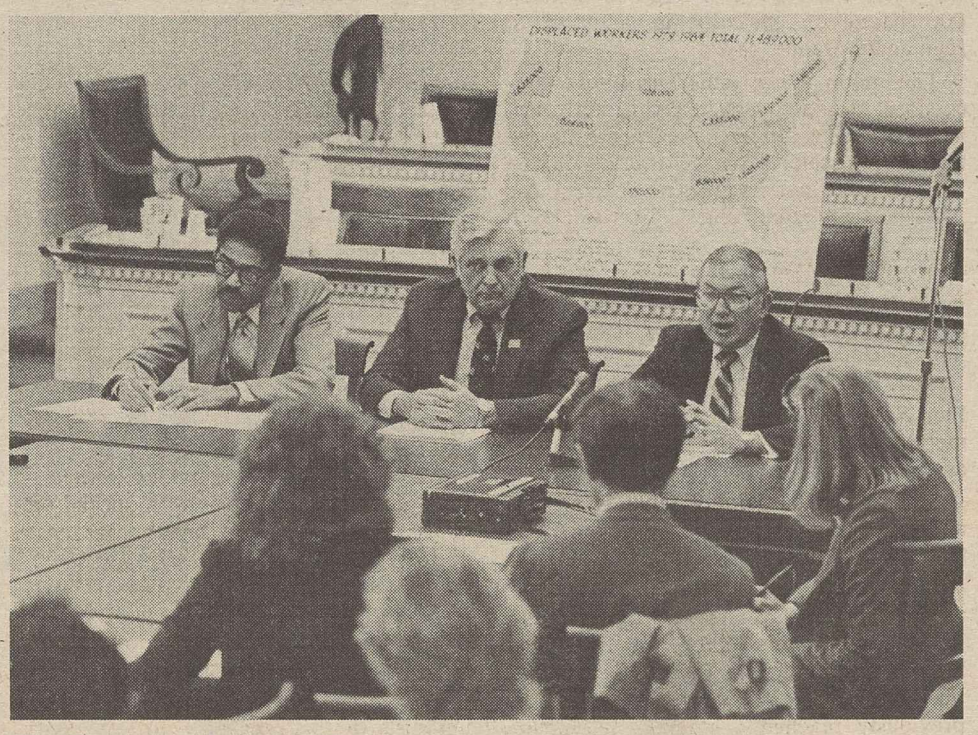
Taxation of job-related benefits to employees will mean fewer benefits, chief executives of corporations said in response to a survey.



Most said they will make "deep" or "moderate" cuts in worker benefits if the tax-exempt status is ended. Only 3 percent of the companies surveyed indicated they will raise wages in order to compensate for lower take-home pay resulting from taxation of benefits.

The survey of 150 corporation heads was made by the Roper Organization for the American Council of Life Insurance and the Health Insurance Association of America.

Corporation chief executives overwhelmingly opposed making job benefits taxable either to employees or to corporations and noted that any added tax would probably be met by pressures for pay raises to offset the increase.

A companion poll of the general public found 77 percent agreed that the cost of employee benefits should not be considered as taxable income to workers.

AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine, who took part in the news conference announcing the poll results, warned that taxation of negotiated benefits would "seriously jeopardize" the collective bargaining process. Those benefits are "earned benefits," he stressed, not a gift.

Job-saving alert

Sponsors of a bill requiring advance notice of plant closings tell Capitol Hill news conference that an early alert would give workers and communities time to explore alternatives to a shutdown. From left, Representatives William L. Clay (D-Mo.), Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.), and William D. Ford (D-Mich.).

Extension of project funds vital to hard-pressed areas

Legislation that would continue federal seed money for communities bypassed by the nation's economic recovery has the AFL-CIO's strong support, Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor testified at House hearings.

The National Development Investment bill he endorsed would keep alive two programs President Reagan's budget would shut down.

It authorizes funds for the Appalachian Regional Development Act to allow completion of highway construction and economic development projects before the program is phased out.

And it would retain with some modifications the framework of the Economic Development Administration, which channels federal grants into communities with high levels of unemployment and poverty. The intent is to generate the maximum amount of job-building public and private investment with the limited federal funds available.

Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.) and Rep. William F. Clinger (R-Pa.) are principal sponsors. Both are senior members of the Public Works & Transportation Committee, whose Economic Development subcommittee is considering the legislation. A similar bill passed the House in the last Congress but died in the Senate.

Cantor noted in his testimony for the AFL-CIO that the programs the bill seeks to continue were originally put in place to help out areas which historically have trailed other sections of the country when times are relatively good and suffered more than other communities in bad times.

Despite two years of economic recovery, overall employment remains "far too high," Cantor noted, and double-digit unemployment continues in eight states and in areas of many others.

Investment needed

An even greater level of public investment is needed to overcome "the nation's festering infrastructure problems," Cantor testified.

"One of the most pressing problems facing states and cities is the need to rebuild and repair the infrastructure," he stressed. Highways, bridges, rail systems, urban transit, ports, inland waterways, dams, water systems and waste treatment plants all are plagued with "serious deficiencies," Cantor testified.

The programs the legislation would continue "worked in the past," Cantor said, "are needed now," and provide "an adaptable framework" for dealing with future problems "of economic dislocation and deteriorating public facilities."

3-year accord ratified to end Pan Am strike

The Transport Workers ended a four-week strike against Pan American World Airways after agreeing on a three-year contract recouping past wage concessions and providing additional increases.

TWU represents more than 5,700 Pan Am mechanics, baggage handlers and food service workers through locals in New York, Miami and the West Coast. The combined tally ratifying the settlement was 2,965 to 1,743.

Union members will receive an average pay rise of 21 percent over the contract term, a figure which includes recouping 14 percent owed from a previous contract as a result of increases the workers agreed to postpone to help the airline become profitable.

The contract provides a 5-percent raise, retroactive to Jan. 1, and another 5 percent on Nov. 1, along with a cash bonus. Additional 5-percent raises will be paid in each of the next two years.

A shutdown of commissary operations will cost some 625 jobs. Workers affected will receive a buyout of $10,000 to $30,000 based on seniority in addition to regular severance pay.

The union made some work rule concessions the company sought, and new hires will take longer to reach the top of the wage scale. The contract included "things we're not happy with," TWU Air Transport Director John J. Kerrigan said.

Jobs elevated

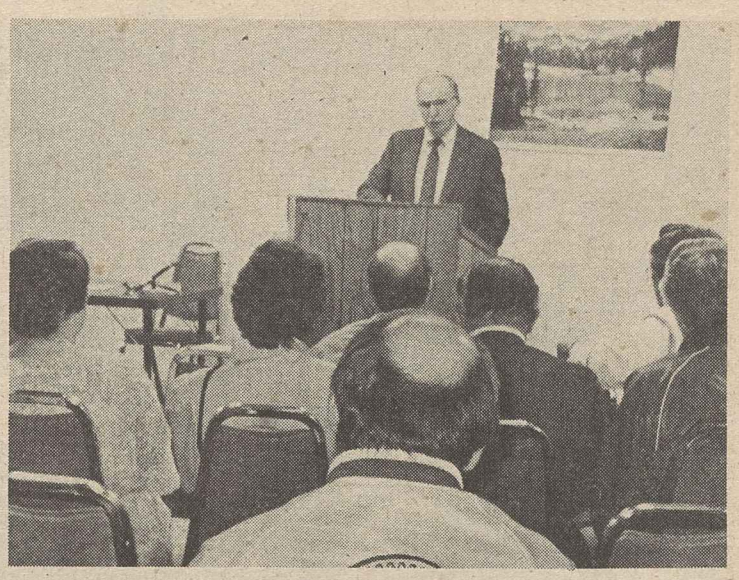
On the plus side, the union said, lower-paid cleaners were moved up to a higher job classification.



The strike had substantially curtailed Pan Am's domestic operations and union members will return in order of seniority as the company restores full service.

Still at the bargaining table is an unaffiliated union representing some 6,000 flight attendants whose contract expires Apr. 1.

The flight attendants had honored the TWU picket line until the company brought in hundreds of new hires to replace them. The Air Line Pilots, who had previously reached a contract settlement, stayed out in the first days of the TWU strike but then returned to work.

AFL-CIO President Kirkland fields questions in Seattle, while Sec.-Treas. Donahue briefs union members in North Bend, Ore., at two of five satellite meetings held with 1985's first regional conference.

AFL-CIO western region conference marked by give-and-take discussions

Portland, Ore.—The first of 1985's AFL-CIO regional conferences drew trade union activists from six states for a give-and-take exchange of views with the federation's national officers and headquarters staff.

The goal, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told them, is to make the trade union movement more effective "and to involve our members more actively in the trade union mission."

Nationally, he stressed, "we have a tough battle on our hands to persuade Congress not to go along with President Reagan's campaign to dismantle the federal government and devise new schemes to neglect the old, disinherit the young, and deprive the working middle class of the protection and government programs they pay for."

While the main conference settled in for a day of workshops—with special emphasis on the crisis in health care costs, budget issues and the battle over tax legislation—Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue took separate paths through Oregon and Washington to meet with union members in their communities.

"We want to listen to what the trade unionists of this area have to say," Kirkland stressed. "We want to talk with them, not at them."

The Portland regional conference was for the states of Alaska, California, Hawaii, Nevada, Oregon and Washington. The next, Apr. 28-29 in Providence, R.I., will cover six New England states and Pennsylvania.

At each of five workshop sessions in Portland, two AFL-CIO staff officials spoke to groups of local and state union leaders on various aspects of labor's program.

Legislative Director Ray Denison and COPE Director John Perkins joined to lead a workshop linking legislative goals and political action.

Education efforts

Education Director Dorothy Shields and Civil Rights Director William Pollard dealt with issues affecting minorities and women—and education programs to focus on them.

Bert Seidman, director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, teamed up with Associate Research Director Henry Schechter for discussions that ranged from health care issues to trade and budget deficits.

A communications workshop featured both Larry Kirkman, director of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, and Susan Dunlop, an assistant to the AFL-CIO president.

Organizing & Field Services Director Alan Kistler spoke of how labor concerns have become organizing issues, and Community Services Director Frank Emig talked of programs to help workers stranded by job losses and cutbacks.

On the road, Kirkland held question-and-answer meetings with union members in Seattle, Longview and Tacoma, Wash., covering issues ranging from pay equity to labor unity and efforts to tax job-related benefits.

Donahue spoke to the Portland regional conference on the challenging report of the Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work, which he headed, stressing innovative methods to build the labor movement.

His route in Oregon took him to mini-conference meetings with union members in Coos Bay, North Bend and Eugene. Many of the questions and comments dealt with job-destroying import policies and what workers and their unions can do to resist union-busting.

Unions with pension fund investments should be able to exert leverage to influence the anti-worker policies of corporations, Plumber Charles Morgan suggested at the North Bend meeting.

'Violence' hearings expose union-busters' role

"4. Improving work rules, thereby increasing productivity."

Hall's letter invited "a confidential discussion as to how we work" and claimed to be "the only firm I know of which offers this service to union-plagued industries."

Democratic members of the committee sought to have Hall testify as to his firm's activities in the strike. At their request, Hatch invited Hall to testify but the consulant "declined" the invitation.

The local union president, Dave Beck, told the Senate committee that the company attitude changed after it came under new ownership as a result of a corporate takeover. Previously, he said, relationships had been good and in a short strike 10 years ago, the company used no security personnel at the plant.

Although the union didn't know it at the time, he testified, when management presented the union with an unacceptable package of takeback demands early last year, it had already arranged with a private guard service to move in if the workers struck.

Management's demands, Beck said, included a $3.80-an-hour wage cut, reduced retirement benefits, and exclusion of union representatives in grievance procedures, among others.

Fortification

Before the contract expiration, Beck testified, the company "constructed a high chain link fence around the premises, topped by barbed wire. Forty-eight light poles were installed, each with four 1,000-watt bulbs."

The contract expired on May 1, 1984. But while the union continued bargaining for six weeks, "the company's position became even more adamant."

When the workers finally struck, five movie cameras were installed and manned. An army of 150 guards from Nuckles & Associates Security, an outfit with a long record of battling unions, was brought in—outnumbering the 115 strikers.

Last summer, the union made an unconditional offer to return to work, Beck told the committee. Management's response, a week later, was that there were no job vacancies because all of the jobs had been permanently filled by scabs.

Later, he testified, the company said it had hired over 100 "permanent" replacements on the day the union telegram offering to return to work was sent but before it was received.

"This company has spent millions and millions of dollars to break our union," Beck told the committee. "They want the public relations effect of union violence. If that violence from the union doesn't happen, then the pressure is on the company, its consultants, its guards and strikebreakers to create some violence, real or imagined."

Beck told the committee of repeated cautions at union meetings urging members not to be provoked into violence, and he acknowledged some individual episodes in which the advice was not followed—often following provocations by guards or strikebreakers.

There were a couple of broken windshields and a union supporter was fined $500 for pouring some harmless but smelly skunk oil used by deer hunters on a company truck.

There were also strikebreakers and guards arrested. And Beck added, the Missouri Portland Cement Co. is probably the only firm in the nation that is under a court injunction which prohibits it from "authorizing or encouraging" the action of persons "dressed in hooded Ku Klux Klan outfits and parading with burning crosses at or near the picket line."

Some of the pickets on the line when company guards put on their Ku Klux Klan display were black, Beck noted.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), responding to Sen. Hatch's statement at the start of the second day of the hearing, suggested that any consideration of the need for additional legislation to deal with strike violence should examine "the role of so-called labor-management consultants who profit from union-busting" and the effectiveness of federal labor law in protecting the right of workers.

False impression

Kennedy noted that "for several years now, a nationwide campaign by the National Right to Work Committee has sought to create the impression that a wave of union-sponsored violence is sweeping the nation and that state and local law enforcement officials are either unable or unwilling to prevent it."

But in fact, he stressed, repeated hearings have "failed to show that there is a pattern of unprosecuted violence or that a fair federal remedy can be fashioned without undermining both legitimate workers' rights and the collective bargaining process. Moreover, there are disturbing signs that at least some unsolved acts of violence may have, in fact, been perpetuated by the enemies of the collective bargaining process."

Reagan budget would drain state funds

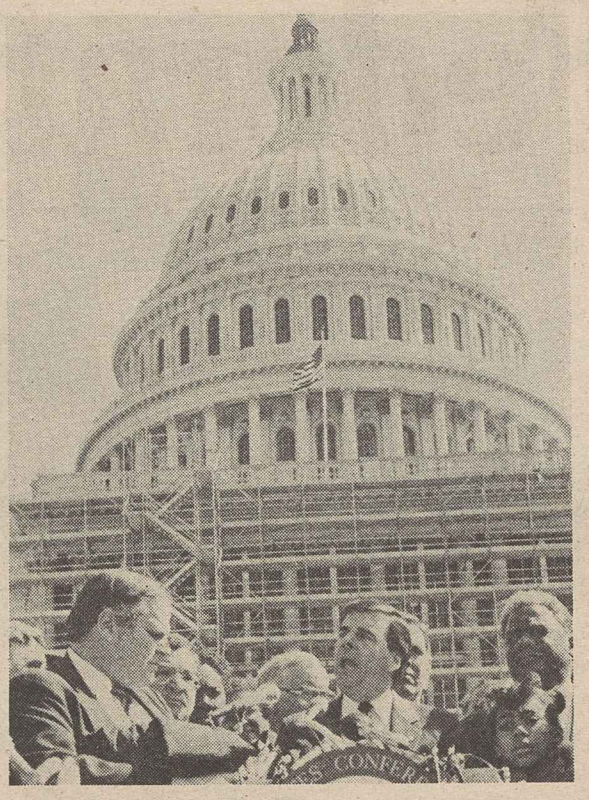
Most state fiscal surpluses would be turned into deficits by President Reagan's budget proposals, a union study showed.

A survey by the Teachers and its affiliated Federation of State Employees took a state-by-state look at the impact of the Administration's budget proposals. Besides seeking an end to the $4.5-billion revenue-sharing program, Reagan's budget would slash many federal program grants to states and cities.

Thirty-four states with budget surpluses would move into the deficit column, the union reported.

Teachers President Albert Shanker said the cuts would penalize states with fiscally responsible policies in order to deal with federal deficits caused by Reagan's "ill-conceived budget and tax policies."



The budget proposals would eliminate some $20.3 billion in direct federal grants plus the loss of revenue-sharing funds, the union said. It noted that federal grants offset 24 percent of state budgets.

Several thousand demonstrators express their concern at the U.S. Capitol over Reagan cutbacks in urban programs as President Gerald McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees calls for adoption of a fair federal budget.

Labor backs full-loaf bill on civil rights

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to repair all the damage to civil rights laws inflicted by last year's Supreme Court decision in the Grove City College case and reject a half-loaf remedy supported by the Reagan Administration.

Federal funds should never be used to subsidize discrimination, AFL-CIO General Counsel Laurence Gold insisted in testimony before two House committees.

The Supreme Court interpreted a law banning sex discrimination by any educational institution receiving federal funds as applying only to the specific program receiving government aid.

Both the civil rights coalition and the Administration agree that Congress intended all programs of an educational institution to be covered. But there the two sides part company.

As the labor-backed coalition sees it, the court's reasoning could weaken other civil rights laws. The labor-backed bill, like the measure the House passed last year, would amend portions of other civil rights laws to keep this from happening.

The Administration position, expressed in a bill introduced by Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.), is that the broader language should apply only to the education law which was the focus of the Supreme Court decision and remain "neutral" on other civil rights laws.

If Congress were to follow the Administration's lead and limit its remedy to educational institutions, Gold said, its action could be taken as approving a less comprehensive civil rights standard for other institutions helped by federal funds.

No basis

There is no "principled basis" for such a distinction, Gold stressed.

Labor's position, he urged, is that Congress should reiterate its commitment to the civil rights principle that President Kennedy expressed before his death:

"Simple justice requires that public funds to which all taxpayers of all races contribute not be spent in any fashion which encourages, subsidizes or results in racial discrimination."

Product liability bill faulted as shield for manufacturers

Product liability legislation should put the rights of injured workers and consumers above the interests of manufacturers of dangerous or defective products, the AFL-CIO urged.

A bill being considered by a Senate Commerce subcommittee moves "in precisely the wrong direction," AFL-CIO General Counsel Laurence Gold testified. He said it would replace a body of state laws and precedents that have helped victims obtain fair compensation with a weaker federal law tilting to the side of manufacturers.

Gold said the AFL-CIO would welcome a national product liability law that would assure adequate compensation for victims of unsafe products without costly damage suits. A "no-fault" compensation system would be one such possibility, he suggested.

But the legislation introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Bob Kasten (R-Wis.) doesn't deal with that issue, Gold noted. It accepts "the underlying premise of the tort law system—namely that litigation is the appropriate vehicle for providing compensation to victims of unsafe products." Thus, the Kasten bill does not address the high costs of litigation, the delay in obtaining compensation or "the uncertain and often inequitable results."

In most instances, Gold testified, the legal rule proposed for inclusion in federal law is more protective of manufacturers than rules adopted by "the states that have taken the obligation to protect consumers and workers most seriously."

As an example, Gold cited the Kasten bill's "complex and confusing" guidelines on the obligation of a product manufacturer to warn users of potential dangers.

Manufacturer's duty

Labor's view, Gold testified, is that the manufacturer should be required to warn users of any danger posed by "a foreseeable use of the product," at least if the manufacturer is or should be aware of the danger. The warning should be made in a way that comes to the attention of the ultimate user, whenever this is practicable. "A breach of this duty should result in liability being placed upon the manufacturer."

But the Kasten bill's provisions, Gold protested, "bear little resemblance to these common-sense principles."

Gold expressed labor's concern, also, that making it more difficult for victims to obtain redress from manufacturers would diminish the incentives on manufacturers to produce safer products.

enue sharing would cause serious problems for local fire departments.

"The training process for jobs and skills has been a complex system of public school training, apprenticeship programs and in recent years federally funded training programs," Gannon pointed out. Those programs are now in jeopardy as a result of Reagan's budget cuts, he stressed.

Chicago Mayor Harold Washington decried the labelling of cities as "special interest groups." He called the nation's cities "the repositories of civilization, culture, art and learning." While cities are the source of much of the nation's wealth, Washington noted, "the dollars that have come from you are only trickling down."

"Don't give up, don't get weak, don't get weary," he urged the protestors.

Among other mayors who addressed the rally, Ray Flynn of Boston suggested that if Congress held its budget votes in the nation's cities amid breadlines and soup kitchens, the results might be different.

"We represent the poor, the elderly, the needy, and we must continue to fight for them," Flynn said.

As an alternative to the Administration's program cutbacks, the AFL-CIO has proposed that Reagan's huge deficits be attacked by limits on defense spending, steps to reduce unemployment and thus improve federal tax revenues and reduce outlays, and the closing of tax loopholes for corporations and the wealthy.

New editor appointed for ILG's newspaper

Meyer Miller has retired as editor of Justice, the newspaper of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Dwight Burton has been appointed his successor.

Miller joined the staff of Justice in 1949 and has been its editor since 1978. Burton, who has been managing editor, joined the Justice staff in 1970. Mike McGuire, now an assistant editor, will move into the managing editor post.

LIPA releases 4 new TV shows, alters rental plan

The AFL-CIO's television production arm has released four new Labor Video Bulletins and revised its rental policy to bolster the use of its video cassette service.

Larry Kirkman, director of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, said the new episodes of the popular Bulletin series includes:

- Getting on TV and Radio—A step-by-step guide for local unions on how to get their message on radio and television, local newscasts and talk shows, and how to prepare editorial replies, public service announcements and advertising. It includes the results of the AFL-CIO "Campaign for America's Future."
- Making Legislators Accountable—A guide to union members on the federation's 1985 legislative agenda and how political action committees affect national legislation.
- Singing for the Union—A labor music workshop, taped at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, highlighting new songs, performers and issues in an examination of what makes a great labor song.
- CLUW: The First Decade—A progress report of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, including its 10th anniversary convention, and segments from America Works shows on child care and pay equity.

Kirkman said the Labor Video Bulletins are available in three formats—VHS, Beta and ¾-inch U-matic—for a rental fee of $5 or may be purchased for $25. LIPA distributes the cassettes without charge to federation affiliates, state federations and regional offices.

Communication works

Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts tells the more than 800 delegates to the union's week-long legislative conference that "one-to-one" communication with their congressional representatives works. The delegates visited more than 350 congressional offices. In his keynote speech, Watts blasted the Reagan budget. Among the many speakers were House Budget Committee Chairman Bill Gray and Don Zimmerman, former National Labor Relations Board member, who addressed the Reagan assault on labor law policies.

Bargaining Trends:

Gains in 1984

Prospects for 1985

By Neil Gladstein

Union members and their bargaining agents can expect 1985 to be similar to 1984. Unemployment will stay high, the overvalued dollar will continue to hurt export and import sensitive industries, the consequences of deregulation will still play havoc in transportation, and many employers will threaten workers with plant closings. However, unions showed in 1984 that despite these and other problems, economic and non-economic gains can be made. Worker solidarity and creativity turned 1984 into one of the more successful bargaining periods in the 1980s.

In 1985, about 3.5 million workers are covered by major collective bargaining agreements (defined as involving 1,000 or more workers) that are due to expire or to be reopened. Negotiations will cover about 2.4 million workers in private industry and 1.1 million state and local government employees. The sectors which will see some of the heaviest bargaining include rubber, electronic products, trucking, construction, clothing, and auto (Chrysler). There are also about 650,000 workers under contracts that expired or were reopened prior to Jan. 1, 1985, that need to be settled during this year. Three-fifths of these workers still under negotiations work in rail transportation.

In the federal government, where bargaining rights are severely limited, workers are awaiting the outcome of the budget proposals under which President Reagan has asked for a 5-percent wage cut for federal employees. This wage cut proposal contradicts the spirit of federal law which requires the government to pay salaries equivalent to those in private industry. Last spring, the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) reported that federal government workers earn 18 percent less than people working in the same kind of job in the private sector.

Collective bargaining agreements negotiated in 1984 contained a wide range of terms covering both economic and non-economic work related issues. Since many of these benefits do not have precise costs or values it is impossible to quantify them, and they are not reflected in most federal statistics.

BLS found that major private sector collective bargaining agreements reached in 1984 contained average wage increases of 2.4 percent for the first year. Included in this average are workers who had wage freezes and decreases. For the 77 percent of all workers covered by major contracts that did have wage improvements, the average first year increase was 3.8 percent. For major state and local government collective bargaining settlements in 1984 the average first year increase was 4.8. These figures do not include bonuses, profit sharing, stocks, lump-sum payments, cost of living adjustments (COLAs) or other financial payments.

Neil Gladstein is an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research and is the department's 1983-84 research assistant.

The average effective wage adjustment for all workers covered by major settlements from 1984 or from previous years was 3.7 percent in the private sector and 5.0 percent in state and local government.

These figures by BLS show that the wage changes were close to the inflation rate. The inflation rate in 1984 was 3.5 percent from December to December as measured by the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W).

In 1984, about 700,000 workers, or one-third of those covered by new agreements, settled for some form of lump-sum or bonus payment. These payments are not included in the increases reported above. Employers refused to grant the same amount of money as wage increases. Employers prefer these payments because they are not added into the wage rate base and therefore do not increase the benefit levels for those programs that are tied to the rate base. Also, by being excluded from the rate base these payments will not be included in future wage increases.

Employers facing economic difficulties found unions willing to make wage and work-rule concessions if the companies were able to show real need and a willingness to negotiate on other options. Profit sharing and stock ownership plans were one form of trade-off for which unions bargained. These plans give workers a share in any future recovery that their concessions help bring about. They appeared mostly in contracts with the airlines and in meatpacking. In negotiations with United Press International, the Newspaper Guild also got a seat on the board of directors in addition to 6.5 percent ownership of the company in exchange for a wage decrease.

Two-tier wage structures which pay new employees less are an unfortunate concession that many employers fought for. These two-tier structures were allowed with much reluctance on the part of union members and often over the objections of their leadership. These systems should be eliminated as companies recover from their economic problems. One union has already done this: The Machinists in negotiations with Hughes Aircraft eliminated the two-tier structure that was in the previous contract.

The issue of pay equity or comparable worth is being raised increasingly in collective bargaining. Unions are fighting for increases to close the discriminatory wage gap between female-dominated jobs and comparable male-dominated jobs. To eliminate wage discrimination Service Employees (SEIU) members who are school employees in Vacaville, Calif., will receive increases ranging from 2.5 to 25 percent over a five-year period in addition to regular pay raises. SEIU members who are clerical workers for the city of Berkeley, Calif., will be compensated over a two-and-a-half-year period for past discrimination. Employees of the state of California belonging to SEIU working in female-dominated jobs will receive up to an additional 5 percent pay "realignment" to narrow the wage gap. And the State, County & Municipal Employees (AFSCME) won an agreement from the state of Iowa to end sex-based pay discrimination and to upgrade the pay of employees who have been victims of that discrimination.

Studies to examine the problem of pay discrimination against female-dominated occupations were also won in some contracts. AFSCME negotiated for employer-financed pay equity studies in Los Angeles and from the state of Rhode Island. In New Jersey, AFSCME and the Communications Workers won legislation for a pay equity study which provides for union representatives on the committee and SEIU bargained for a study to be paid for by the city of Oakland, Calif.

Improvements in job security were an important part of collective bargaining in 1984. An innovation negotiated by the Auto Workers (UAW) was the creation of a Job Opportunity Bank-Security Program (JOB Security) which is financed by a company obligation of $1 billion at General Motors and $300 million at Ford for the life of the three-year contract and the succeeding agreement. The cornerstone of JOB Security is that it guarantees that workers with at least one year of service will not be permanently laid off as a result of the introduction of new technology, outsourcing, negotiated productivity improvements, shifting of work from one plant to another, or the consolidation of component production. Workers who would ordinarily be laid off under these conditions will be offered placement in an employee development bank. Participants will receive the pay rate of the last job they were assigned before being placed in the bank and will accrue pension credits and receive all benefits. Workers in the bank can be placed in retraining programs, temporary assignments, job openings in other plants, or in other agreed-upon options.

JOB Security will be administered by joint UAW-management committees at the local, area and national levels. Special programs can be set up when there are more employees in the bank at a plant than anticipated openings at the local and area level. To compensate workers for the lack of permanent job placement, these special programs would allow workers assigned to the bank who are age 55-61 and have 10 years of service to retire with full pensions and supplements. Members who do not meet the age and service requirements would receive lump-sum severence payments of $10,000 to $55,000 based on seniority.

Preventions against layoffs were in other settlements as well. At International Harvester, the Auto Workers won job security improvement in a new Job Content Preservation Program (JCPP) which preserves jobs by influencing management's decisions involving outsourcing, overtime usage, investment commitments, sales of operations, new technology, and anything else that affects job content. Under JCPP, International Harvester guarantees to maintain the ratio of straight-time hours per unit of production/sales for each major segment of the company. If the actual number of straight-time hours falls below the ratio, International Harvester will have to increase the number of hours worked through recalls, less overtime, paid training, additional benefits to those on layoff, or by reduced subcontracting and outsourcing. This is a six-year commitment with a $30 million limit on the company obligation.

At GM's Packard Electric Division, the Electronic Workers (IUE) won lifetime job and income security "forever" which does not end when the contract expires. Workers can be furloughed only for a maximum of six months. When workers exhaust unemployment insurance and SUB payments they must be recalled.

In New York, the Food & Commercial Workers (UFCW) in negotiations with the Associated Fur Manufacturers won a guaranteed 30 weeks of employment per year in exchange for the employers' right to subcontract during the three-month busy season.

Other job security guarantees include a no-layoff promise for the life of the contract for SEIU members at Equitable Life, a no-layoff due to subcontracting commitment to Newspaper Guild members at Consumers Union, and an income security program negotiated by the UAW with Mack Trucks that gives workers the same guarantees against layoffs as in the GM and Ford pacts and creates a job bank.

The ability of management unilaterally to make plant-closing or outsourcing decisions was limited in some contracts. For example, in Detroit, Kroger Co. guaranteed the UFCW that 40 of its 45 reopened food stores will stay open for at least three years. In six different states, the UFCW got a no-plant-closing commitment from the George A. Hormel Company. At Ford, the UAW won a three-year moratorium on plant closings. Both Ford and GM guaranteed the UAW 60 days' notice of any outsourcing decisions that affect 25 or more workers. At Mack Trucks, the UAW got a promise of a three-year moratorium on any new plant-closing decisions. In soft coal negotiations, the Mine Workers won job security clauses from the Bituminous Coal Operations Association which include advance notification of intention to sell a mine with proof that the buyer will honor the labor contract, no loss of bidding rights if a mine is subleased, and justification whenever mine owners subcontract repairs or maintenance work. The Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union will get a 45-day advance notification of plant closing from Del Monte. And the Sheet Metal Workers in negotiations with the Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning Contractors National Association won an employer guarantee not to open, operate, or become involved with a nonunion company. In exchange, the workers promised not to work for nonunion contractors or open competing businesses.

In auto negotiations, the UAW also created Business Venture Development Groups to work with JOB Security committees. Venture Development is aimed at helping communities hit by job losses to develop and attract new businesses with hiring preference given to displaced auto workers. The union also won commitments from GM and Ford to continue investing in American production facilities, including GM's new small car, "Saturn."

For auto workers being laid-off or transferred, GM and Ford both agreed to improve unemployment benefits and transfer payments. The auto companies increased funding of the Guaranteed Income Stream (GIS) and Supplemental Unemployment Benefits (SUB) programs. GIS, which was set up in 1982, pays laid-off employees who have 15 years of service once they have exhausted their SUBs. They will receive GIS payments until they return to work or reach retirement age or until the program runs out of funds. The relocation allowance for employees being transferred to another plant within the company was also increased. The allowance now ranges from a low of $580 for a single person moving 50-99 miles to $2,310 for married employees moving 1,000 miles or more.

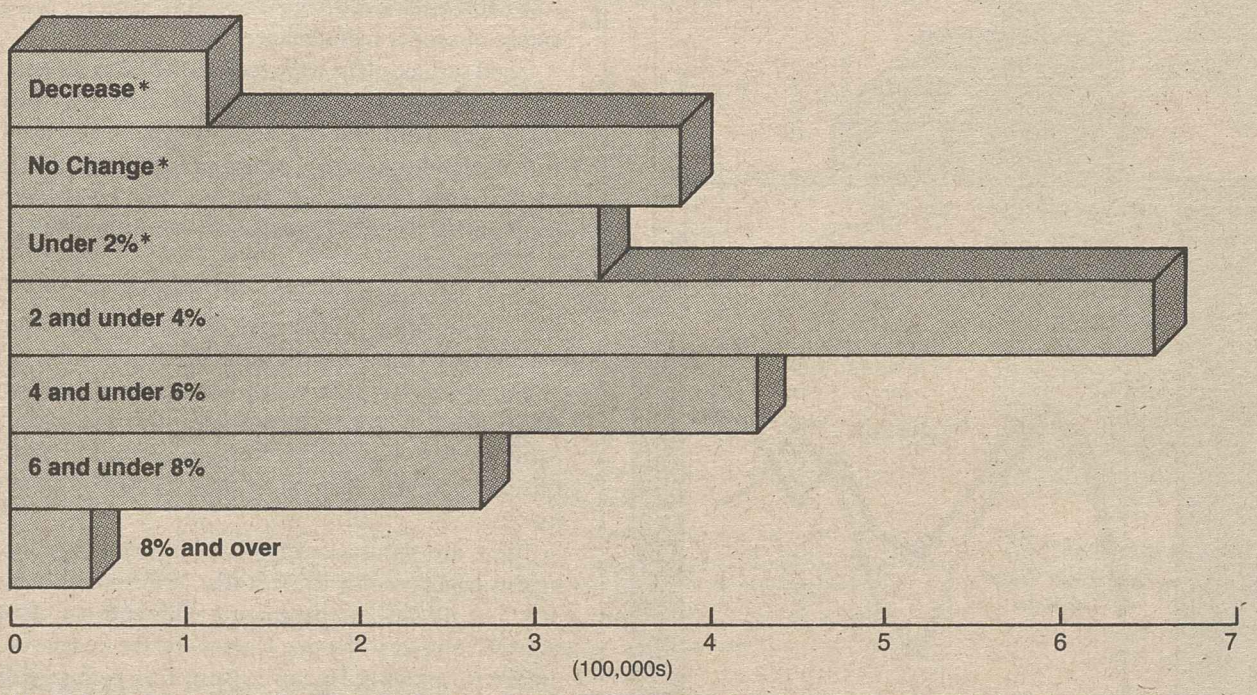
In a job-security related issue, the Steelworkers and Jones & Laughlin Steel's Aliquippa, Pa., mill agreed on a work-sharing plan. Under this program the 200 employees currently working will share their jobs with the 225 employees on layoff. Each of the 425 workers will work 60 percent of the time and be on layoff 40 percent of the time. The loss in wages will be made up through SUB payments.



To decrease overtime and spread available work among its members, the UAW won a requirement that the auto companies pay a 50¢-an-hour penalty to a Joint Skill Development & Training Fund for all overtime hours worked in excess of 5 percent of straight-time hours. The companies also promised to try to reduce overtime to two hours a week. The Skill Development & Training Fund also will receive a 10¢-an-hour contribution for all hours worked. This will help finance training for laid-off employees. Tuition assistance ranges from $1,500 for those with one year of service to $5,000 for those with four or more years. Active employees can receive payments of $1,500 for courses at a college or university and $1,000 a year for other job-related courses.

Tuition and retraining benefits also were negotiated in other contracts. For example, at Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Michigan, the UAW increased tuition reimbursement to $1,200 for its clerical and technical members; in Massachusetts, the State Police Association negotiated for 100 percent tuition reimbursement; the Electrical Workers (IBEW) at General Telephone of Ohio will receive full reimbursement for retraining if laid off due to the introduction of new technology, and Chemical Workers at Essex Chemical won a 100 percent tuition refund for job-related courses.

Confronting the challenge of escalating health care costs was another important area of collective bargaining in 1984. Unions and employers worked together to reduce the cost of health care without decreasing the quality of the care or shifting the cost to the workers. An example of this type of settlement in the Health Care Cost Containment Agreement reached between the Rubber Workers (URW) and Uniroyal. Features of this agreement for non-emergency medical needs included:

- Precertification review of hospital confinement.
- Second surgical opinion for certain procedures with employees receiving compensation for up to four hours for time spent getting a second opinion.
- A toll-free benefit hot line for employees and retirees who need help filing claims.
- Self-audit program that pays workers 50 percent of savings recovered from corrected hospital bills, up to $1,000.
- Health Maintenance Organizations (HMOs) will be considered.
- $50 bonus for certain outpatient surgical procedures.
- Laboratory tests and X-rays must be conducted before hospital admission.
- A continued investigation by the URW and Uniroyal to find alternatives to contain health care costs.

Many other agreements negotiated in 1984 contain cost containment features. Examples include:

The Metal Trades Council and Union Carbide (Texas) agreed on full coverage of outpatient minor surgery and home health care following hospitalization.

HMOs are a covered option for UAW members at Rockwell International and members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees with Philadelphia Hotel-Motor Inn Association.

IBEW members at Niagara Mohawk Power Company, Food & Commercial Workers members at John Hancock, and Clothing & Textile Workers members at Maremont receive a portion of all overcharges they discover.

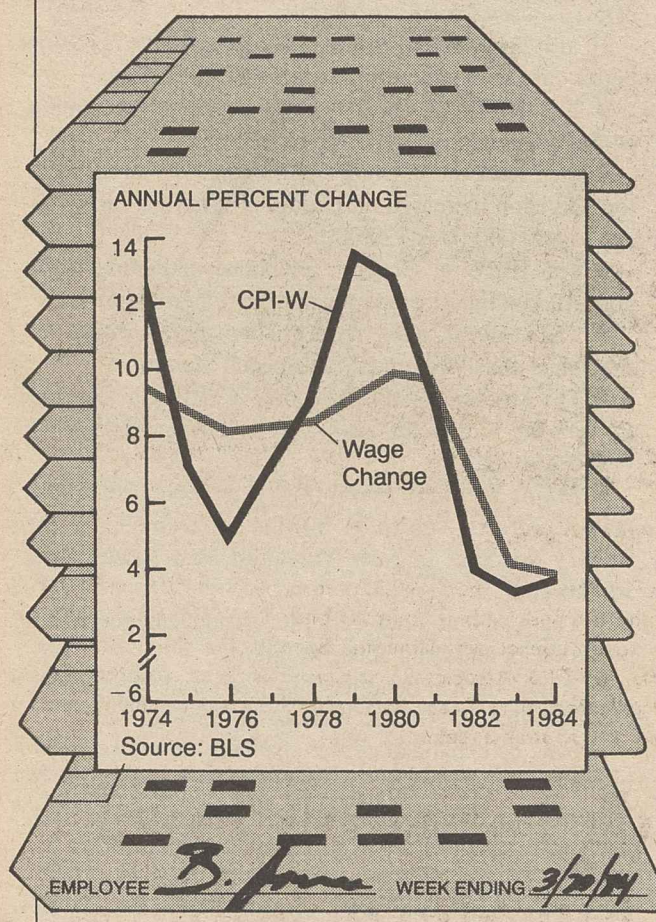
The UAW at Ford and GM agreed on preauthorization for all non-emergency and non-maternity hospital admissions, and educational programs to encourage cost-effective use of medical benefits.

Health programs also have been expanded to provide better care for many union members. For instance:

- The IBEW at Crouse-Hinds increased maximum dental coverage to $1,000, up from $600.
- Steelworkers at Outboard Marine's Evinrude Motors Division increased maximum hospitalization coverage to $50,000 (was $20,000).
- The IBEW at General Telephone of Pennsylvania got orthodontia coverage for their members' families.
- The UAW at Mack Trucks established coverage for substance abuse treatment and speech therapy.
- The Machinists at FMC Corp. (Calif.) got coverage for hearing aids, adult orthodontia, hospice and home visit health care.
- Major medical maximum was increased under many contracts—up to $1 million for members of the Bakery Workers in New York and New Jersey (was $250,000).
- The UAW at Rockwell International negotiated a new alcohol and drug abuse program.
- A new optical benefits plan was established by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at Penwalt.
- New or expanded dental coverage in contracts between the Paperworkers and James River Corporation of Virginia, the Newspaper Guild and the St. Louis Review, and Clothing & Textile Workers and Stillman Seal.
- At GM, the UAW expanded medical coverage to include procedures like laser surgery, organ transplants, tubal ligation, and vasectomies.

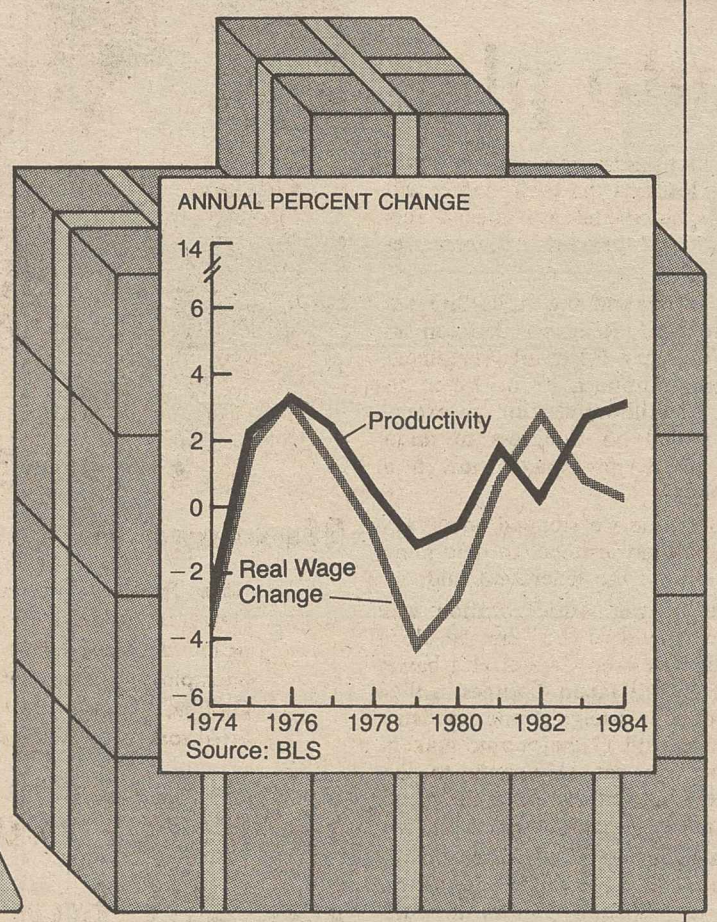
Programs to reward workers for unused deductibles and sick days were also negotiated. The Glass & Ceramic Workers at PPG Industries, for example, set up a $300 health care plan account to pay deductibles with the unused portion to go to the workers at the end of the year. The Teachers in Jacksonville, Fla., bargained for 90 percent of unused sick leave to be converted into cash at retirement, as against 80 percent in the previous agreement. Washington, D.C., employees in AFSCME now get three additional personal days if they use no more than two sick days, two extra personal days if they use no more than four sick days, and one extra day if they take no more than five sick days. IBEW members at Utah Power & Light Company will now receive 100 percent payment for unused sick leave.

In negotiations between the UAW and Lear-Siegler's Instrument Division, laid-off employees won coverage for six months under the hospital, medical, dental, and vision care plans.



Paid time off is another important feature of collective bargaining agreements. Eligibility requirements for paid vacations were decreased under many agreements. For example, IBEW members at Gulf State Utility Company now get three weeks after seven years of service (was eight), four weeks after 16 years (was seventeen) and five weeks after 25 years (was 26). Steelworkers at Boston Gas now get four weeks after 10 years. Paperworkers at Potlatch's Northwest Paper Division bargained for seven weeks after 25 years instead of 30. Longshoremen from North Carolina to Florida are eligible for five weeks after 15 years and six weeks after 20. Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees working for San Francisco restaurants in the Golden Gate Restaurant Association qualify for three weeks off after five years (was six). Bakery Workers at Keebler now get six weeks after 25 years instead of 30. Hospital & Health Care Employees at Norwalk, Conn., Hospital won five weeks after 11 years instead of 20.

One vacation clause that some unions bargained for allows workers to take a week of vacation one day at a time. Instead of taking a week all at once, workers can now use these days as personal days or to make long weekends. One settlement that included this was between IBEW and General Telephone of Ohio. The years of service needed for this vacation option were reduced to eight from 15.



Vacation rights of workers on layoff were given protection under the Chemical Workers' contract with American Cyanamid's Lederle Laboratories Division. Rehired workers will have layoff time counted toward their vacation eligibility.

Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday is a new paid holiday in many contracts including those between the Transit Union and Old Dominion Transit Management, Clothing & Textile Workers and Sterling Dye, Ladies' Garment Workers and Ken Stacy, Bakery Workers and Specialty Bakery Owners Association, Chemical Workers and Day & Zimmerman's Lone Star Division, Transit

Wages Have Kept Up With The Rise In Inflation

But Have Not Shared In the Gains of Rising Productivity

Note: Wage change includes new settlements, deferred increases, & COLAs

Inflation erodes the purchasing power of paychecks and rising productivity means that more is being produced for the same amount of work time. If inflation is 4 percent, workers need to increase their paychecks by 4 percent just to keep up their standard of living. If productivity increases by 3 percent, workers need an additional 3 percent raise to maintain their share of the income which is created. Thus, workers would need a 7 percent increase just to maintain their share and real buying power.

The graph on the left shows that the effective annual wage change for all private sector workers under a union contract has kept pace with inflation. However, as the graph on the right shows, workers have not been able to get their share of productivity increases as the combined increase of prices and productivity has outpaced their wage gains.

Union and the Transit Authority of River City, Utility Workers and Detroit Edison, and SEIU and the Chicago Building Managers Association.

Many unions won an additional paid day off for their members. For example, the Ladies' Garment Workers in negotiations with the makers of lingerie, negligees and underwear in New York and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union at Nestle in Fulton, N.Y., now get 12 paid days off, up from 11.

Floating paid days off are becoming more common. The SEIU and the Midtown Realty Owners Association, N.Y., switched four fixed holidays to floating holidays. Another example is in the Operating Engineers' agreement with the Realty Advisory Board of Labor Relations, N.Y., which switched two fixed days to floating days and added one new paid day off as a floating day.

Paid days off in case of death in the family are being expanded to cover more relatives and longer periods of time. Chemical Workers at Lederle Laboratories can now also take one day off for the death of a brother-in-law or sister-in-law. Paid bereavement leave for Dutchess County, N.Y., employees in AFSCME now also covers death of step-children and step-parents. Members of SEIU employed by Alameda County, Calif., can now take two of their sick days for a death in the family in addition to three previously negotiated bereavement days. And funeral leave for Chemical Workers at American Salt now applies for the death of grandparents.

One important and frequently overlooked type of paid time off is leave for military service. Machinists at United Technologies' Florida Research & Development Center now are eligible for up to 15 days paid military leave, up from 10.

Retirement and pension clauses were improved in many contracts. For example, the UAW at General Dynamics' Electric Boat Division negotiated for full benefits when age plus years of service equal 85. Retired Machinists at Rohr Industries will get benefit increases of up to 10 percent depending on how long they have been retired. Machinists at United Technologies (Florida) bargained for retirement benefits for the spouses of vested employees who died before age 55. Communications Workers at Rochester Telephone increased minimum monthly benefits by $100 for retirees with 20 or more years of service. And the IBEW at Hawaiian Electric won a decrease of five percent in the early retirement pension penalty.

Voluntary Political Action Committee checkoffs of contributions are being negotiated by many unions. Examples include the Painters with the Painting & Decorating Contractors Association (Mass.), Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at Gulf Oil, Teachers in Chicago, AFSCME at Shelby County, Tenn., Hospital Authority, and Machinists at Allied Corporation's Bendix Electronic Central Division.

The rights of part-time employees are getting increasing attention under collective bargaining. For instance, SEIU members employed by Health Employers, Inc. (Minn.) are now paid double-time for any of seven holidays on which they work. UFCW members got a guarantee of at least 16 hours of work per week from the Food Employers Council which represents 1,334 stores in 12 grocery chains in California. The SEIU negotiated with six commercial cleaning companies in Hartford, Conn., to raise part-time wage rates to the level for full-time workers. And AFSCME members who work part-time for Little Rock, Ark., now get vacation and sick leave benefits.

New settlements also improved commission rates for many workers in retail trade and insurance. For example:

- UFCW and Frederick's Department Stores in the state of Washington increased clothing sales commissions to 7 percent and shoe sales commissions to 10 percent.
- At Metropolitan Life Insurance, the UFCW won an increase to 15 percent for first-year commissions on home owners' policies, up from 10 percent.
- UFCW members working for John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance now get a 55-percent first-year commission on policies, up from 52.5 percent.

Safety and health is another critical area of collective bargaining. For instance, in negotiations with Ford and General Motors the UAW made gains that include the establishment of joint management-union committees to review new plant layouts, changes in manufacturing equipment and major processes where worker health and safety may be affected, review of job design to decrease stress, review and access to management's information on the chemical hazards, and worker training on safety and health.

The use of video display terminals (VDTs) is being regulated under many contracts. The SEIU at Equitable Life for example, bargained for VDT safeguards including rest breaks, glare reduction, detachable keyboards, adjustable chairs, redesigning of work stations, and guarantees of proper maintenance.

Legal service plans were established in many new contracts. Among them are agreements negotiated by the UAW with Ford and International Harvester, by SEIU with the Realty Advisory Board and the Apartment Owners Advisory Council in New York, and by HERE with the Bellevue Stratford Hotel and the Franklin Plaza Hotel in Philadelphia.

Child care for the children of employees is getting increasing attention in collective bargaining. For example, the SEIU and the state of California negotiated a $1 million fund which will be jointly administered by a worker-management day care committee. And the New York State Nurses Association won an agreement from St. Luke's Roosevelt Hospital to build a new day care facility.

There are thousands of other important clauses that unions negotiated in 1984. A few of them are:

- The RWDSU in bargaining with both the Association Of Voluntary Nursing Homes and the League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes in New York won guarantees of every other weekend off.
- Clerical workers in the SEIU at Equitable Life won the right to see their personnel files and appeal anything they do not agree with.
- UAW members at General Motors and Ford get attendance bonuses for not missing any work days, $50 for the first and second quarters of perfect attendance and $200 for the third and fourth quarter for a total of $500 for a perfect year.
- Actors' Equity got a commitment from the League of Off-Broadway Theaters & Producers to cast more minorities including blacks, Hispanics, and the handicapped.

Unfortunately there are still many problem areas in collective bargaining. In postal negotiations President Reagan's anti-union feelings manifested themself in unreasonable concessionary demands and an unwillingness to conduct serious negotiations. Congress had to stop Reagan's unilateral imposition of a two-tier wage structure under which new hires would be permanently paid less. After a lengthy fact-finding and arbitration process, the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers succeeded in winning pay and benefit improvements, a retroactive raise, Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday as a paid holiday, and retention of the COLA clauses, night-shift differential and sick leave. The lower starting rate for new hires was awarded, but they will follow the same general wage schedule and will eventually be brought up to the more senior workers' salary levels.

Unrealistic concessions were fought off by many unions. For example, workers in various unions in Las Vegas, were able to band together to fight back wage cuts and even succeeded in gaining wage increases.

The use of Chapter 11 bankruptcy to escape from collective bargaining agreements was severely restricted by the bankruptcy reform legislation passed in 1984. Employers now must bargain with unions when they file for bankruptcy protection and wish to change the contracts. Steelworkers at Phoenix Steel's Pennsylvania facility not only resisted concessions when the company filed for bankruptcy, they even negotiated pay increases.

Unfair labor practices, union-busting consultants, anti-worker National Labor Relations Board rulings, and the anti-union attitude in the Reagan Administration were problems which many unions faced in 1984 and will continue to face in 1985. Two of the largest and still ongoing battles against anti-union employers are the Phelps Dodge strike by 13 unions representing copper workers and at Louisiana-Pacific lumber mills by the Carpenters.

This discussion of collective bargaining in 1984 does not tell the whole story. Giving examples of individual contract terms cannot adequately present them as part of a larger package reached through negotiations. Also, collective bargaining is a continuing process that involves the day-to-day relations between employers and workers. Across the nation grievances were being resolved and safety and health issues discussed; joint labor-management committees were working on issues of mutual interest, and medical cost problems were being addressed.

In addition to the bargaining trends mentioned in this report, thousands of other improvements were achieved in contract settlements throughout the United States. In 1985, union members will continue to pursue the strategies that best serve their needs and those of their fellow workers.

25-percent expansion

90,000 U.S. jobs cost of Japanese auto plan

A Japanese plan to expand automobile exports to the United States by 450,000 cars this year was denounced by the AFL-CIO as "a harsh blow" that will cost 90,000 more American jobs.

In Detroit, Auto Workers President Owen Bieber said that reports from Japan merely confirm the UAW's warning that Japanese auto manufacturers are preparing to flood the American market with additional exports. He warned that the proposed 25-percent increase in Japanese auto shipments to the United States would also add at least $5 billion to the "already intolerable" U.S. trade deficit with Japan, which is running at a $37 billion annual rate.

"Tens of thousands more jobs will undoubtedly be lost and the trade deficit will worsen as the floodgates are opened further in 1986 and beyond," Bieber predicted.

Both the UAW and the AFL-CIO denounced President Reagan's decision to allow the Voluntary Restraint Agreement (VRA) on auto imports from Japan to expire Mar. 31 without seeking an extension. They called on Congress to undo the damage and act promptly to initiate a fair trade policy.

"It is about time we stopped encouraging the Japanese government to determine U.S. trade policy," the federation said.

While the Reagan Administration was seemingly unperturbed by the developments, outrage grew on Capitol Hill based on the reports from Japan. Sources in that country said the foreign trade ministry was negotiating with 11 major auto makers for a ceiling on car shipments to the United States this year of 2.3 million, up from 1.85 million a year under the VRA.

The Senate Finance Committee unanimously approved a resolution calling on Reagan to use existing powers to curb imports of at least Japanese automobiles and telecommunications and electronic products. Sen. John Danforth (R-Mo.), sponsor of the resolution, said he would also introduce the proposal as a law. Danforth charged that Reagan had decided "no matter what the Japanese do, we're just going to be punching bags in this country."

Warning sounded

Committee Chairman Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) warned that the Japanese plan could provoke an "eye-for-an-eye" trade war, but said "that may be the only language that is understood."

Japanese trade ministry officials sought to portray the plan as a restraint, contending that auto producers in that country could sell as many as 2.7 million a year in the United States.

One Reagan Administration official told reporters, however, that "quotas" totaling 2.3 million cars would represent the "virtual capacity" of the Japanese auto industry to produce cars for export.

But, he said, even though the plan represents "no restraint at all . . . we don't have any problem" with the higher export figure.

Message to Congress

Hiring tax credit termed ineffective for creating jobs

A tax credit for employers has proved an ineffective means of helping targeted groups of disadvantaged workers and shouldn't be renewed, the AFL-CIO said.

The federation's statement to a House Ways & Means subcommittee said the Targeted Jobs Tax Credit has not generated any new jobs "and has benefited a handful of employers at the expense of the Treasury and American workers."

Last year, Congress extended the program until Dec. 31, 1985. It shouldn't be continued beyond that date, the AFL-CIO urged.

The federation's statement listed these chief concerns:

- A windfall tax gain to employers who would have hired the same persons without a credit.
- The displacement in the job market of non-targeted but no less needy workers.
- Loss of $500 million a year in tax revenue "in a time of soaring deficits and savage budget cuts in domestic programs."

There are more effective ways to provide jobs and training for disadvantaged workers and they should be pursued, the AFL-CIO urged. The tax credit program, while started "with the best of intentions," hasn't worked, the AFL-CIO contended.

House heads for showdown on aid for long-term jobless

by the President, the changes would not take effect until Oct. 1, 1986.

As the cutoff date neared, delegations of jobless union members descended on Capitol Hill to send a message that the recession isn't over for large groups of Americans. And for those who have exhausted state unemployment compensation, the last lifeline has been the FSC program which provided up to eight weeks of additional payments in most states and up to 14 in states with the highest unemployment.

At a Mar. 21 news conference, Reagan appeared to close the door the last crack by his response to a question about continuing the program.

There's no need for it, the President insisted, now that "the emergency of the recession is over." The place for people having trouble finding new jobs is training and relocation, Reagan said.

Ironically, Reagan had earlier asked Congress to rescind more than half the money it appropriated to retrain dislocated workers this year.

A Minnesota congressman with double-digit unemployment in his district—James L. Oberstar—brought the issue to a head the day after Reagan's news conference by quickly collecting the signatures of House Democrats needed to compel the convening of a party caucus. He proposed to put the caucus on record for immediate action on an extension bill.

The afternoon before the caucus, House and committee leaders agreed on the timetable for a House vote and it was confirmed at the caucus. The decision shows that the Democratic Party will not let itself be "Reaganized," Oberstar said.

New mood

With the House pressing for action, senators from states with persistent unemployment were showing their unhappiness with the White House position, and labor's campaign for the jobless was no longer being dismissed out of hand as hopeless.

Under the House bill, during the three-month extension of FSC, most states would have four rather than the present eight weeks of federally funded benefits. About eight states, those with insured jobless rates over 5 percent, would get eight weeks.

The proposed permanent change in the extended benefit law would relate the number of weeks of federal-state benefits to the severity of unemployment. The present 13-week extended benefit duration would range from a low of 10 to a high of 30 weeks under the plan.

In another development, the President sent Congress his proposal for a subminimum summer youth wage and urged quick action, before the summer job season gets under way. It differs from the Administration's bill in the last Congress by making the change in the Fair Labor Standards Act applicable for only two years, presumably to test its impact. It would reduce the minimum wage from $3.35 to $2.50 an hour for persons under 20 from May 1 to Sept. 30.

Real earnings down for 2nd month

Workers lost more ground in buying power as "real" weekly earnings fell four-tenths of 1 percent in February, the second monthly decline in a row, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Last month's drop followed an even steeper slide of seven-tenths of 1 percent in January.

The February falloff was attributed to a decrease in the workweek while retail prices rose four-tenths of 1 percent as measured by the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W).

Over the year, workers' real earnings were down a full percentage point.

The February CPI increase reflected a greater than usual volatility in its major components.

Apparel prices, for instance, rose nine-tenths of 1 percent after declining by one-tenth of a percent the previous month. Transportation costs rose one-tenth of 1 percent after rising three-tenths of 1 percent the month before. Housing was up four-tenths of 1 percent after increasing only one-tenth of 1 percent in January.

BLS's other consumer price index, the CPI for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U), went up three-tenths of 1 percent in February after rising two-tenths of 1 percent in January. CPI-W, which covers half the population of the All-Urban index, is used for adjusting social security and other retirement benefits and in calculating cost-of-living adjustments under many union contracts.

In CPI-W, food prices went up four-tenths of 1 percent in February. The rise was led by a 2.2-percent jump in prices for fruits and vegetables, which was partially offset by a drop of two-tenths of 1 percent in the index for meats, poultry, fish and eggs.

Heating oil prices continued to fall—down 1.7 percent last month—and were down 9.5 percent from last February, BLS reported. Gasoline prices fell even more sharply, down 2.3 percent. Gas and electricity, on the other hand, rose one-tenth of 1 percent and were 3.4 percent ahead of a year ago.

Prices rose eight-tenths of 1 percent for new cars and 2 percent for used cars. Public transportation charges were unchanged.

Among other goods and services, house furnishings rose eight-tenths of 1 percent.

Oscar carved in stone

Los Angeles—The Stonecarvers, a documentary on the work and lives of Italian-American craftsmen, won an Oscar award for best documentary short subject at the annual Academy Awards gala.

The film features four union stonecarvers—members of Laborers Local 571—who have spent the last two decades working on the Washington Cathedral in the nation's capital.

Thus far, the film has been aired only in Washington. But the National Italian American Foundation is raising funds to broadcast it nationally on public television later this year. The foundation is just $5,000 short of its $15,000 goal to finance the broadcast. The largest contribution, for $7,500, came from the Laborers.

The Stonecarvers was produced by Majorie Hunt of the Smithsonian Institution and Paul Wagner, who won an Emmy award for a film on the Sleeping Car Porters. Hunt and Wagner said they hope the film will bring the union stonecarvers the recognition they deserve. "They've given so much to the city," Hunt said.

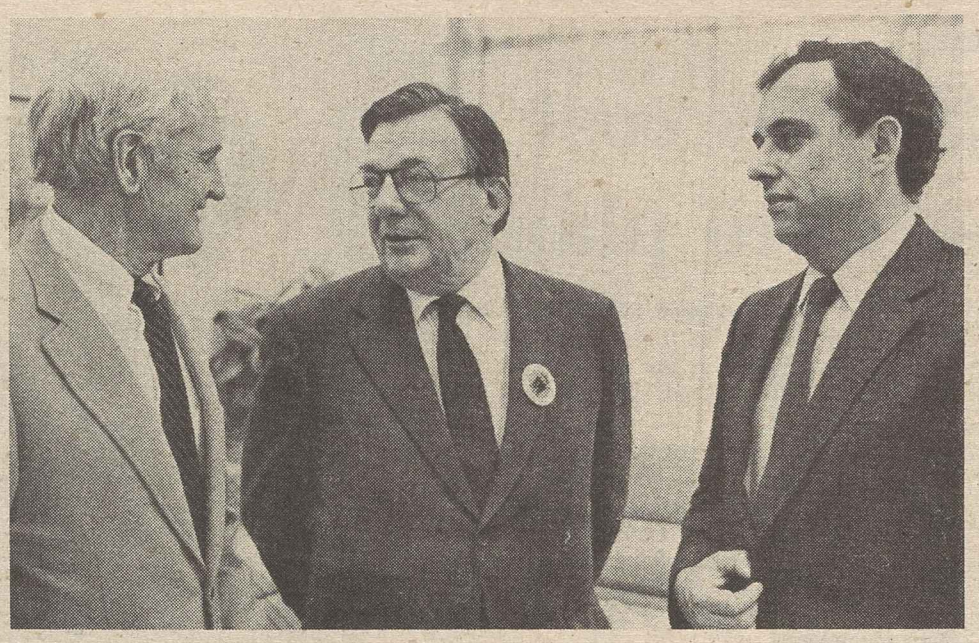
Five unionists appointed to safety advisory group

Joseph L. Durst, Jr., job safety director for the Carpenters, has been appointed to the Advisory Committee on Construction Safety & Health by the Labor Dept.

The committee advises the Occupational Safety & Health Administration on construction matters. Durst, whose term expires June 30, 1986, joins four reappointed worker representative members — Plumbers Safety Director Joe A. Adam, Iron Workers Vice President Robert E. P. Cooney, Electrical Workers Safety Director George E. Smith, and Safety Director Jim E. Lapping of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Pleasure set for top post at studies center

Robert J. Pleasure has been appointed executive director of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.



Pleasure, 41, will assume the post Apr. 1 upon retirement of Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., who has been executive director since the center opened in 1969. Pleasure, who was named assistant director of the center last December, had served as associate general counsel of the Carpenters since 1979.

A 1964 graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, Pleasure has a master's degree from the London School of Economics and a law degree from the University of Michigan. He worked for the National Labor Relations Board and the State, County & Municipal Employees before joining the Carpenters.

Hoehler was a professor of economics at Michigan State University before he came to the center, directing it through its start in a downtown basement office. In 1971, the center was moved to its current home, a 47-acre campus in Silver Spring, Md., which was purchased from the Xaverian Brothers.

"Fred Hoehler's work has been instrumental in adding a new dimension to organized labor's educational capabilities," Kirkland said in noting Hoehler's retirement. "Future generations of better-equipped trade unionists will continue to provide a living testimonial to Fred's dedication."

Hoehler was an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and education director of the Steelworkers before going to Michigan State where he also served as associate director of the School of Industrial & Labor Relations.

Retiring Labor Studies Center Director Fred K. Koehler, Jr., with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and the new director, Robert J. Pleasure.

U.S. cement workers backed in battle against union-busters

Geneva — American cement workers won the solid support of trade unions representing other cement workers in the free world in their battle against union-busting campaigns at U.S. cement plants owned by foreign corporations.

Delegates to a conference organized by the International Federation of Chemical, Energy & General Workers Unions (ICEF) unanimously pledged to exert pressure on their European employers to call off their attack on U.S. cement workers. In some cases, European unions hold seats on the boards of companies whose workers they represent.

In the past five years, about one-third of the U.S. cement industry has been bought up by foreign corporations. A delegation of American labor leaders attending the ICEF conference said that labor relations in the industry are at their lowest ebb in 40 years.

Richard A. Northrip, cement division director of the Boilermakers, charged that the U.S. Cement Employers Association has embarked on "a clear program to break our unions."

Northrip, a vice president of the union, said the foreign-based multinationals have joined forces with their U.S. firms "to capitalize on the climate created by the Reagan Administration."

Among the largest multinational companies are Heidelberger Zement of Germany, which controls the Lehigh Portland Cement Co.; France's LaFarge, which bought up General Portland Cement, and Holderbank of Switzerland, which controls several U.S. companies.

Bargaining run-around

"The cement industry in the United States refuses to bargain toward a fair and equitable agreement," said Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., a member of the U.S. delegation.

The ICEF delegates initiated a call for a world conference of cement workers. In preparation for the meeting, the ICEF secretariat will coordinate the exchange of information on cement workers' working conditions, benefits, and organization.

Sec. Peter Evans of Britain's Transport & General Workers Union, who cochaired the conference with Northrip, said that "an attack on American cement workers is an attack on the 6 million workers affiliated with the ICEF."

The U.S. delegation also went to Germany to meet with Peter Schuhmacher, chairman and chief executive officer of Heidelberger Zement, to present the problems facing workers at the firm's American subsidiary.

OSHA blind to toxic waste site hazards

toxic waste problem," Turner emphasized.

He urged that the Superfund law be made as strong as possible by including mandatory clean-up schedules, public participation, effective clean-up standards, coverage of federal facilities, mandatory worker training and protection provisions, and compensation for victims of toxic disease.

"One of the many failures of OSHA under the Reagan Administration has been an almost complete disregard for workers engaged in toxic-waste clean-up efforts," Turner asserted. He called on the agency to set up a standards advisory committee to develop standards for immediate adoption.

Seminario accused OSHA, EPA, the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, and the Coast Guard of failing to develop needed regulations.

She asked that the subcommittee assist in "seeking strong OSHA standards" on toxic waste clean-up, pointing out that from the agency track record over the past four years, it is "likely to do nothing in the absence of congressional action or litigation."

Risk to workers

Richard M. Duffy, safety director of the Fire Fighters, told the panel chaired by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) fire fighters are called to toxic sites for emergencies, often lacking proper training and adequate protective equipment.

Duffy charged that the "continual inaction to protect workers is criminal."

He cited several instances where IAFF members suffered a variety of reactions from exposure to chemical wastes. At a massive chemical dump in Elizabeth, N.J., fire fighters fought the blaze for 11 hours, and remained on the scene for a number of days, "mostly without respiratory protective equipment because none was available."

Rep. Major R. Owens (D-N.Y.) said immediate action is essential to provide needed safeguards. "We ought not to sit back and allow OSHA to flout the law and not enforce it."

CORRECTIONS

A picture caption in the Mar. 23 issue of the AFL-CIO News misidentified one of the persons in the presentation of a drawing of the late Joseph D. Keenan. Shown with Mrs. Keenan and artist William A. Schroeder was Francis X. Gannon, author of the biography entitled "Joseph D. Keenan, Labor's Ambassador in War and Peace." He was incorrectly identified as IBEW Sec. Ralph A. Leigon.

The proposed merger of the Paperworkers and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers would result in a new union with a membership of 385,000—not 285,000 as had been reported in an earlier issue of the AFL-CIO News.

New Cleveland law requires disclosure of chemical data

Cleveland—The city council unanimously adopted an ordinance giving workers the right to information on the toxic substances they are exposed to in the workplace. The state legislature is working on similar legislation that has strong bipartisan support.

Enactment of the city statute capped a 20-month effort by labor groups and the bill's sponsor. The new law, which takes effect in March 1986, will require the city's employers to comply, at least partially, with its various requirements.

Ola Hinsley, president of State, County & Municipal Employees Local 100 and vice president of AFSCME Ohio Council 8, testified each time the measure was before the city council, reaffirming labor's support for strong right-to-know legislation. She pointed out that public employees are not covered by the federal hazard communication standard and it is up to local and state legislative bodies to provide this crucial workplace protection.

Employers will be required to label containers with the name of the chemical and to train workers in the handling of toxic chemicals.

The Cleveland law is stronger than the federal hazard communication standard, which is currently being reviewed by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The state bill is also stronger than the federal law. The proposal has a strong worker rights section that protects workers from being discharged, disciplined, discriminated against or denied any pay, seniority or other benefits for exercising their rights under the law.

Labeling would be required on containers of hazardous chemicals over one gallon. It would include the common and chemical names, a code identifying the manufacturer's Material Safety Data Sheet, a hazard warning and a color and number code indicating the category and degree of hazardousness of the chemical.

Employers would be required annually to file a list of the hazardous chemicals with the state Dept. of Industrial Relations and provide training to workers annually, to new workers when assigned to hazardous work areas, and whenever a new chemical is introduced to the workplace.

In Tennessee, a compromise right-to-know measure passed the House on Mar. 18. Senate approval is expected as 35 senators are cosponsoring the bill and Gov. Lamar Alexander (R) will probably sign it into law because of its widespread support, according to the labor-backed Tennessee Right-to-Know Campaign.

The proposed law provides for annual training and right to refuse to work in an area where hazard information is not provided, allows communities access to workplace chemical lists, sets procedures for verifying manufacturers' trade secret exemptions, and requires employers to provide fire departments with the location and identification of hazardous substances in workplaces.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies is offering nine institutes and workshops during April and May. The schedule:

TV: The Cool Medium, Apr. 8-11—A three-day workshop to coach union leaders on working with television reporters and facing video cameras.

Bargaining Issues for Union Women, Apr. 14-19—A course on contract language addressing issues vital to women workers.

Advanced Organizing, Apr. 15-25—A two-week workshop cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing & Field Services. Enrollees must be approved by the department.

Computers for Local Unions, Apr. 21-25—A briefing on the use of computers for local union officers before buying equipment.

Effective Union Action for Civil Rights, Apr. 21-25—The annual conference of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights for union civil rights and women's rights designees.

The Changing Workplace, Apr. 28-May 1—A study on workplace changes and management strategies affecting workers.

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, May 12-17—An institute concentrating on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. The exercises are videotaped for self criticism.

Organizing Techniques I, May 12-17—A program for full-time organizers on the essentials of an organizing campaign: targeting, interviewing workers, picking winning issues, selecting plant committees and countering employer hostilities.

Advanced Editing Skills, May 19-24—A workshop for experienced editors focusing on makeup, photo editing and headline writing, cosponsored by the International Labor Communications Association.

AFL-CIO affiliates using the George Meany Center campus during April for their own staff training programs are: Washington Building Trades Council, Apr. 4; AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, Apr. 9-10; Service Employees, Apr. 14-19; Railway & Airline Clerks, Apr. 28-May 1, and Flight Attendants, Apr. 29-May 3.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will conduct classes beginning Apr. 28 for 20 trade unionists from Caribbean countries and 20 labor leaders from Brazil. AIFLD's five-week class for 38 union officers from 17 Latin American countries will end Apr. 12.

The George Meany Memorial Archives is sponsoring a two-day meeting of archivists and trade union representatives Apr. 1-2.

More information about these and other labor studies is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. Telephone: 301/431-6400.

The Smell of Union-Busting

THERE ARE some days, as the chairman of the Senate Labor Committee discovered, when nothing seems to go right.

The committee's hearings on "union violence" in the course of an Illinois cement strike were supposed to show a breakdown of law and order because local and state police were unwilling to crack down on misdeeds by strikers.

That, of course, is the myth served up to make a case for amending the Hobbs Act so that the stiff criminal penalties Congress decreed for racketeering could be used against strikers.

What emerged from the hearings was a somewhat different picture—of a company brought under new ownership that set out cold-bloodedly and sparing no expense to get rid of a union.

It employed a professional union-buster—oops, a "human resources consultant" according to his letterhead—who was so proud of his success that he boasted about it in a letter offering his services to other "union-plagued industries." He bragged that he had lined up strike "replacements" in such a "discreet" way that the union never realized what was being planned.

While the union was trying to keep negotiations going, the company had already retained a "security firm" notorious for its provocative role in other labor disputes to furnish a private army that actually outnumbered the regular workforce. And this for a company that insisted its workers take a big pay cut because it couldn't afford to pay more.

AGAINST THIS type of provocation, the union conceded, its warning to members not to play into the company's hands by engaging in conduct that would reflect against the union cause occasionally was disregarded.

But in contrast to the claim that misdeeds were not punished, there were indeed jail sentences and fines imposed on both strikers and strikebreakers. But there is no penalty, unfortunately, for the violence to the spirit of collective bargaining inflicted by such a management.

In the case that so occupied the Senate Labor Committee, there was mention of a union supporter who was fined $500 for throwing some foul-smelling skunk oil at a company truck.

That was wasteful as well as hot-headed. Surely no skunk's odor could be stronger than the smell of such a firm's labor relations policies.

No Bargain

POLITICAL LEADERS who argue for free trade have a stock reply to the trade union movement's warning that a fast-rising tide of imports is washing away American jobs.

Think how much better off consumers are with the lower prices of imported goods, the argument goes, as if workers and their families were not themselves the biggest bloc of consumers.

Are consumers really the beneficiaries? Unions have argued before congressional committees that retail stores prefer imported goods over comparable American-made products because they can pocket the savings in the form of a bigger price markup.

In the business pages of newspapers, there have been some refreshingly honest comments bearing out this trend.

A Washington Post article suggests to consumers: "don't hold your breath waiting for big bargains" as a result of the strength of the American dollar against other currencies.

A strong dollar is supposed to make imported goods cheaper and exports from America more costly to buyers in other countries.

Well, the American exports are obviously having a hard time because of the unbalanced exchange rate. But as for cheaper prices on imported goods sold in U.S. stores, think again.

"Retailers here don't go to all the trouble to buy overseas to pass on the reduced price to the consumer," the retail analyst for a stockbroker firm is quoted.

"They go overseas to make money—to maximize their profits," he explains. "If they don't have to drop the prices of their imported goods, why should they?"

Why, indeed.

Employers undercut bill for plant-closing victims

By Press Associates, Inc.

The federal government often is maligned by right-wing ideologues as trying "to fix things that ain't broke." Congress is portrayed as a place where eager legislators push through laws with the greatest of ease.

This fallacy is perpetuated by organized business, which extols free enterprise in its advertising, grabs all the tax breaks it can get, and usually opposes legislation which is in the broad public interest.

It usually takes years to enact legislation designed to meet serious national problems. For example, it took 14 years to pass federal aid to needy public schools. It took 10 years to enact a federal job safety and health law.

The displaced worker problem has been the subject of legislative hearings for more than a decade, and soon may move into the spotlight on Capitol Hill.

What is new about it today is that a problem which was concentrated in the older industries of the Midwest and Northeast—called the Rustbelt by some—has finally hit the Sunbelt and the West. The problem has been nationalized, so to speak, so it may gain serious attention on the Hill.

Displaced workers

A special study recently released by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics showed that 11.5 million workers 20 years of age and older lost their jobs between January 1979 and January 1984. They were displaced because of the closing down or moving of a plant or company, slack work or shutdown of a position or shift.

Of the 5 million with long-term job attachment, 60 percent found new jobs by 1984, though many at lower pay; about 25 percent (1.3 million) were looking for work; and the remaining 700,000 dropped out of the labor force.

There are many reasons for the epidemic of shutdowns which has hit every region. Low-wage imports into the U.S. "open market" undermines even well-run companies. Cheap steel imports have devastated Alabama. A wave of shutdowns has swept the Carolinas because of low-wage apparel imports from the Caribbean. Merger mania and changing technology also play a role in today's destructive competition.

The latest effort to cushion the impact of sudden plant shutdowns on workers and their communities is the Labor-Management Notification and Consultation Act of 1985. It is a bipartisan bill, sponsored by Chairman William L. Clay (D-Mo.) of the House Labor-Management Relations subcommittee and Congressmen William D. Ford (D-Mich.) and Silvio Conte (R-Mass.).

Advance notice

The bill would require businesses to give a 90-day notice before permanently laying off 50 or more employees. It would require the employer to consult with the union or, in the absence of a union, with employees. And it would call in the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to assist.

The heart of the bill is in the creation of a bipartisan 15-member National Commission on Plant Closings and Worker Dislocation. The panel would study underlying economic and social causes, examine consequences and report to Congress with an eye on long-term solutions.

The bill has been watered-down and simplified to try to ease its way out of committee and to the House floor for debate in an effort to gain broad support.

But organized business is adamantly opposed. An official of the National Association of Manufacturers said the legislation "interferes with the operation of the free enterprise system" and represents "government intrusion into business decisionmaking." She said the NAM, U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Business Roundtable, a group of corporate chief executive officers, are united in opposition to the bill.

The business lobby's opposition is not surprising. Employers also opposed the 10-hour day a century ago and the eight-hour day after that.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Benefits Tax Campaign In Full Gear

The AFL-CIO's campaign to stop proposals to tax the life-support benefits of middle class Americans has gone into full gear. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified before the full House Education and Labor Committee on March 21 and termed the attack on employee benefits as "patently unfair" and threatens to rip apart a life support system on which millions of American families rely. Grass roots lobbying is putting pressure on Congress back home with the electorate. Several key components of this multi-faceted lobbying strategy are already in place. To bring you up to date:

* AFL-CIO and international union lobbyists are already making the rounds on Capitol Hill to lobby members of Congress.

* The AFL-CIO and International unions, have made the employee tax benefits tax issue a major priority for their officials lobbying Capitol Hill.

* The field apparatus of the AFL-CIO has been activated. State federations and central labor councils have scheduled Easter-recess meetings with key members of Congress in their district between April 5 and 15th. Join them if you can. The network of Legislative Action Committees in 35 Congressional districts has also been instructed to do the same.

* The AFL-CIO is cooperating with industry groups on lobbying, public relations, direct-mail and grass-roots strategies.

* Materials have been developed for use in the lobbying and press relations campaign. These include: a three-part direct mail package for individuals; fact sheets for both back home and Capitol Hill lobbying; sample press releases and letters to the editor for use with local press.

What you can do:

Write now -- mail makes the difference: The Honorable _____, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515; The Honorable _____, United States Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.

It's Time For U.S. To Make A U-Turn On Trade

It's time for the U.S. to make a U-turn on trade and stop clinging to inefficient policies that increase our trade deficit, leaving more Americans unemployed each year. The trade deficit could reach $250 billion by the end of the 1980's if predictions are right, which could spell increased unemployment because jobs are related to foreign trade. When a country exports goods, it guarantees jobs for its workers. But when it imports billions of dollars in goods it used to make at home, it throws workers into the streets. Three million American jobs have already been lost, mostly in manufacturing.

To cut the trade deficit and preserve American jobs:

* Enact the Trade Law Modernization Act, which would bring U.S. trade laws into line with today's world realities. It would strengthen existing U.S. trade law to deal with foreign nations that subsidize their products and those that dump their goods here at below-market price at home.

* Reinstitute the auto quota agreement which expired on March 31. Failure to do so will push our trade deficit with Japan even higher. It is now $37 billion a year. Imports would rise to over 40% of the U.S. market, costing 200,000 jobs.

* Loosen the Federal Reserve Board's tight grip on money and credit, thereby getting the over-valued dollar in line with other world currencies so that our trading partners will be able to buy more of what we make and our industries won't be easily lured overseas.

* Enact the Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act of 1985 (H.R. 1562, S.680), which would establish import levels for textile/textile products and reduce the textile/apparel trade deficit, which was $16.2 billion in 1984 or 13% of the nation's total merchandise trade deficit.

* Adopt a rational industrial policy to rebuild American industry and attain sustained and balanced economic growth.

Grain Gets Diverted, But Cars Keep Coming

Recently, Cargill, Inc., the country's biggest grain trader, attempted to bring a ship containing 25,000 tons of Argentine wheat into the United States. Cargill planned to sell the wheat at $6.00 to $10.00 less per ton than comparable wheat produced here. But when a coalition of politicians and farm groups raised an outcry, Cargill diverted the ship at sea and sold the grain elsewhere.

Ironically, imported automobiles, appliances and apparel continue to flood U.S. markets, threatening the jobs of American workers. When U.S. workers protest that their jobs are being lost they are told that U.S. consumers must have the benefit of a free market and the lower priced imports.

The AFL-CIO is in sympathy with American farmers and applauds their success in blocking Cargill's move, as a step to retaining the U.S. farming industry, which uses the products American workers build. But we see a double standard here, one that allows grain to be diverted because it undermines American farmers while the voluntary restraint agreement with Japan's auto makers has been allowed to expire and cost 200,000 Americans their jobs.

On with the show

Snip of the ribbon opens the six-day run of the 40th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show in Milwaukee. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and UFCW President William Wynn do the honors, with help from President James E. Hatfield of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., right, and Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara.

Congress demands trade concessions or import controls

Congress is talking tough but thus far has wielded a small stick in a campaign to open up the Japanese market to more U.S. goods in order to reduce the nation's huge and fast-growing trade deficit.

Congressional indignation was spurred by Japan's announcement of a 25-percent increase in its auto shipments to the United States, following President Reagan's decision not to seek renewal of the Voluntary Rstraint Agreement with Japan on auto exports.

The AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers termed the action a "harsh blow" that threatens to wipe out 90,000 more U.S. jobs.

At the same time, Japanese negotiators appeared to be foot-dragging on efforts to get Japanese firms to buy more U.S. goods, including telecommunications equipment and wood products.

The Senate acted first, passing by a 92-0 vote a non-binding resolution urging Reagan to invoke duties, quotas and other barriers against Japanese goods unless Japan increased its U.S. purchases enough to offset the rise in auto shipments.

Pressure for congressional action was spurred also by news that the U.S. trade deficit with Japan had doubled in the last year to $37 billion.

The House followed through a few days later with a similar but somewhat milder-worded resolution. It passed on a 394-19 vote.

In reserve

In the wings—and viewed primarily as a bargaining chip—was a bill approved by the Senate Finance Committee which would give force of law to some of the wishful thinking of the resolutions.

Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) voted for the bill in committee but said he does not plan to bring it to the Senate floor "for a while" and hopes that other senators "won't press it."

The Japanese government reacted angrily, terming the congressional pressure "a threat to the entire free trade system" and protesting the singling out of Japan. The White House apparently was trying to soothe ruffled Japanese feelings by reporting progress in telecommunications trade talks.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright said legislative action beyond a "sense of Congress" resolution would depend on the action of America's trading partners. "The ball is in their court," he said.

Wright stressed, however, that the nation's trade problems exist with countries in every part of the world.

In the midst of all this, Reagan announced the nomination of Clayton Yeutter as the new U.S. trade representative. If confirmed by the Senate, he will succeed William E. Brock, now the Secretary of Labor.

Yeutter, who served in the Nixon and Ford Administrations, is president of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, which provides a trading market for foreign currency. He owns a large farm and cattle ranch in Nebraska and is chairman of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's European-U.S. Agribusiness Council.

"My basic philosophy on trade would be 100 percent in line with that of President Reagan," Yeutter said.

Veto threat kills effort to continue jobless aid

Bowing to President Reagan's veto threat, Congress voted to phase out rather than extend a recession-born program of federal benefits of eight to 14 weeks for workers who are still unemployed after exhausting state benefits.

The phaseout will, however, protect the remaining weeks of eligibility of some 325,000 persons on the Federal Supplemental Compensation rolls when the program expired at the end of March. Under the White House budget scenario, their benefits would have been immediately ended.

Two efforts were made in the Senate to go beyond the phaseout bill in helping workers whose jobs have been permanently wiped out.

No extensions

An amendment by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to extend the FSC program an additional six months was beaten on a 58-34 vote. A proposal by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) that would have eased eligibility for the permanent program of 13 weeks of extended benefits in high unemployment states was defeated 62-32. Although the program is on the books, only two states now qualify and the stringent requirements exclude states that still are racked by double-digit unemployment.

Both amendments had labor's support.

The House took up the phaseout bill under a procedure that barred amendments after a majority of the Ways & Means Committee buckled under to presidential disapproval.

A subcommittee had approved a modest temporary extension of the FSC program, limiting benefits for new enrollees to four or eight weeks depending on the state's jobless rate, with a final phaseout of the entire program after three months.

It also recommended legislation to make the permanent extended benefit program less restrictive. But bowing to budget concerns, the subcommittee would not have those changes put into place until next year.

But even this small step met with frowns from the White House and the extension was rejected by a 20-16 vote in favor of the immediate phaseout. Eight Democrats, including Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, voted with all but one of the Republicans

Football players roll up gains in first USFL accord

The U.S. Football League players rolled up long gains in scoring their first contract, and the four-year agreement won overwhelming approval from the 700-member Players Association.

USFLPA Executive Director Doug Allen termed it "a responsible agreement" for the fledgling football league. "The owners got what they wanted—continuity—and we got the players basic protections."

The contract sets minimum annual salaries at $22,500 for rookies and $25,000 for veterans for the 1985 season. By the 1988 season, the minimums will increase to $30,000 for rookies, $40,000 for second-year players, $45,000 for third-year players and $50,000 for players with four or more years' experience. ## Nomination stalls

Civil service chief's politicking hit

By David L. Perlman

The Senate's Governmental Affairs Committee put off a vote on the confirmation for Donald J. Devine for a second four-year term as director of the Office of Personnel Management after hearings that focused on his openly partisan administration of the federal civil service.

Unions representing federal and postal workers strongly opposed reconfirmation. So did nearly all the other witnesses in three days of confirmation hearings. Only Devine, himself, and Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) testified in favor of confirmation.

The Helms endorsement may not be altogether a plus. It turned out that Devine made at least two campaign speeches in North Carolina last fall on behalf of Helms and was reimbursed for his expenses by a Helms campaign committee.

The Senate left Devine dangling when it began its Easter recess. Devine's first four-year term ran out on Mar. 26, but Committee Chairman William V. Roth (R-Del.) cancelled a scheduled confirmation vote when it appeared that Devine's nomination might be rejected.

Devine's politically appointed deputy, Loretta Cornelius, then became acting director when his term ran out. Her first move was to hire Devine as her executive assistant in a new $72,300-a-year job.

Integrity tarnished

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock accused Devine of having "demeaned the integrity of his office by using his position for political ends."

Blaylock, representing the largest union of federal workers, described Devine as a foe of collective bargaining who has sought to replace career employees with political appointees. He has misled and defied Congress in pursuit of "ideological goals," Blaylock told the subcommittee members.

Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto said Devine has tried to make "scapegoats" of postal and federal workers, attacking their retirement benefits as "overgenerous" and choosing "confrontation" over good-faith bargaining in dealing with employees. "He is making the government into an employer of last resort," Sombrotto protested.

Ironically, both Blaylock and Sombrotto, along with Postal Workers President Moe Biller, have been charged with violation of the Hatch Act prohibitions against political action by government employees—even though they have been on leave with out pay for years while serving in union posts.

Kirkland discusses issues facing labor

Following are excerpts from a Mar. 19 interview of Lane Kirkland by 10 reporters who cover labor nationally.

REPORTER: What are the next steps in response to the report on the evolution of work?

KIRKLAND: We have a task of putting flesh on the bones of those proposals, of studying alternative ways to carry them out, and of encouraging and helping, where necessary, our affiliates to pursue these approaches. There are a number of areas. The question of organizing committees is one that we'll be pursuing.

REPORTER: And also mergers?

KIRKLAND: Mergers will continue to be on a voluntary basis. We'll do our very best to be helpful to the parties and to cajole and to persuade and to give technical assistance as they pursue their mergers. And we'll be working with our affiliates, because the responsibility for carrying them out will rest with our affiliates. I believe a number of them will be very interested in developing at least trial or experimental approaches to methods of affording membership to those who have not been able to get a collective agreement, but who supported the union during the efforts to get a collective agreement.

You know, I sometimes have a feeling that casual observers of the labor movement, when they look at these membership figures, look at the task of organizing and recruiting members as though it was like going out and signing up members for some social organization—that all you have to do is persuade a person to join and you've got a member. If that were the case, we'd have far less difficulties in maintaining and expanding our membership, but we have to go through this arduous process of getting pledge cards, winning an election and getting a contract before they become a member.

"The full employment goal is blandly ignored. . . . I think it's a horrible waste, both economically and socially—the most foolish, wasteful economic situation that could possibly be practiced."

And the people we've persuaded in the meanwhile—if they're not a majority—because of this tradition that's developed of making membership dependent on the bargaining rights, we walk away from people, people who not only voted for a union but who have been enthusiastic about a union, who've sacrificed for it, who've exposed themselves to risks for it, who are committed. Because, let's say, we only got 48 percent in an election, we abandon them. So we've got to find some way of holding them and getting them into membership, keeping their membership, even without that collective agreement.

We have to do something of value for them without that collective agreement, and that opens up some very large questions.

REPORTER: Recently a merger you were working on—ITU and GCIU—fell through. What is your reaction to that?

KIRKLAND: I regret it because I think the objective of creating a single union in the graphic communications field is a good one, and it's unfortunate that that process was interrupted. I still have high hopes of maintaining the ITU within the AFL-CIO, and we'll be doing everything we possibly can to see that that works out.

REPORTER: Are you opposed to the ITU going with the Teamsters?

KIRKLAND: Absolutely, because the Teamsters are not affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

REPORTER: Is that the only reason?

KIRKLAND: That's a sufficient reason. I would like very much to have the Teamsters affiliated with the AFL-CIO. I see no early likelihood of that happening.

REPORTER: Lane, on the national economy: after each recession we've come out with a higher level of unemployment. It keeps going up. Does this bother you?

KIRKLAND: It bothers me very much, and it's an acute problem. We're at the peak of a recovery with levels of unemployment that characterized recessions in the past. Each time we go into a new recession, we do seem to go into it from a higher base of unemployment than before. I don't think we've repealed the business cycle, and I'm deeply concerned about the impact on working people of the next one.

And, as you point out, there is a growth of this sort of indifference and/or a greater degree of tolerance for unemployment and its consequences in this country. I think it's an awful thing. It wasn't too many years ago that the Congress passed the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act and defined the target as 4 percent, and it's blandly ignored. I think it's a horrible waste, both economically and socially—the most foolish, wasteful economic situation that could possibly be practiced and at great cost to the country.

REPORTER: In his report to your evolution of work committee, Prof. Jim Medoff mentions the perception of people about corruption in the labor movement and says labor can't improve its image until it's perceived as moving forcefully against corruption. What do you do about that perception?

KIRKLAND: Well, there is no recognition, apparently, of the fact that, unlike any other elements of our society, we are governed by a law that says that when you are convicted of any one of a long list of felonies or offenses, you are barred from union office for up to ten years—not only barred from union office but barred from employment by a union in any capacity. That is the law. And I supported that law. I supported the amendment that toughened it, the Nunn bill. Prior to last year, that debarment did not apply until appeals were exhausted. Now it is applied upon conviction by a jury.

Do you suggest that we proceed against someone who has not been convicted by a jury? Then I have to set up a kangaroo court. Where do I get the evidence?

I believe that we are entitled to the protection of the law from malefactors. And it is the law's responsibility. They have the tools. They have the methods. They have the duty. I don't have the tools. I don't have the methods. I don't have the means of proving guilt or innocence. And anyone who says I should act against somebody and deprive him and ruin him publicly on the basis of what's generally described as common perceptions ought to be compelled to a sequential viewing of The Oxbow Incident every few days.

"It surprises trade unionists, and even management, in other countries to see the degree of jungle venom that lurks under the veneer of employers in the United States."

Crooks hurt us if they get into the trade union movement.

The problem that concerns me is not any lack of diligence in moving against the trade union movement, against individuals, but a tendency to invent theories of offenses to bring charges and pursue people —theories that are fairly abstruse—to bring criminal charges.

For example, we've had cases where the task force has gone in and said, "Well, this action involving the expenditure of funds was taken by the executive board when it should have been voted by the general membership; therefore, those on the executive board or the officers are guilty of embezzlement." That's coldly technical and a bizzare and unique and original interpretation. It got to the court; the court threw it out. But we have that problem.

In fact, many of the things that businessmen routinely get away with would be felonies if you're a trade unionist.

I can imagine what the outcry would be if golden parachutes were voted by the executive board of a union. What would you fellows say? It would be a good story, wouldn't it?

I'd rather make the philosophical point that corruption is inherently individual and not institutional; that in any line of an endeavor, including journalism, if sufficiently attractive bait is trolled across the waters, there will always be a few fish who rise for it.

REPORTER: Do you want to add any specific comments on the funding of Dept. of Labor investigations?

KIRKLAND: I don't quarrel about vigorous law enforcement if it's fair and is not a "gotcha" game or an effort to create contrived theories of the kind that go against even what's popularly understood as wrongful. What I object to is the relative allocation of resources, that they give equal attention to the enforcement of the wage-hour laws or job safety and health laws—all of the other laws that that department is responsible for administering.

I believe that all laws are created equal and deserve equal enforcement, and I would like to see the same attention, the same resources, put to the pursuit of people who deprive poor people of their just wage or the minimum wage or who abuse workers and subject them to danger to their life, limb and health. I believe those are heinous crimes and offenses against morality and justice and ought to be pursued with equal vigor. But in the enforcement, some laws apparently are more equal than others to this crowd. They pick and choose what they enforce. And I think that's malfeasance.

REPORTER: Is the antagonism between management and labor growing?

KIRKLAND: I believe it's clearly acute in this country. It always kind of surprises trade unionists, even management people, that I talk to in other countries, to see the degree of jungle venom that lurks very close under the veneer of employers in the United States. So I think it's a pure matter of their being presented with an opportunity to stomp, and when they are given such an opportunity and such an advantage, they stomp.

REPORTER: Do you support U.S. aid to the contras in Nicaragua?

KIRKLAND: No. If I had been asked, which I was not, at the time the question of the contras was under consideration by this Administration, I would have counseled against any such adventure. And it's not because I hold any brief for the government of Nicaragua. I don't. I think it's an oppressive regime. I think it's the source now, and will be even more so in the future, of a great many problems in Central America. I think there is a serious problem of Soviet/Cuban involvement that's going to plague us for a long time. And I also believe that if a regime or an alliance of that kind is in the business of spreading fleas throughout an area, it's not unseemly that they should be made to scratch themselves with a dose of their own medicine.

No, I would have argued against it because we have a long history of leading people, various groups, up the hill and abandoning them. With the Montagnards, with the Kurds, UNITA in Angola, the Tibetans—the world is littered with the debris of our operations of that kind which we have abandoned. And I foresee the same thing happening, in Nicaragua. I don't think we should make commitments which we are ill-equipped psychologically and politically and otherwise to pursue. I am opposed to overt/covert operations—and we don't seem capable of carrying out anything but an overt/covert operation—just on grounds of pure common sense.

And finally, if we have a real threat down there to the security of the United States, I'm opposed to contracting out the defense of our own security. If the threat is not sufficient to warrant our own defense of it, then it's not that persuasive to me. I'm not for contracting it out to others to do for us.

I believe one other thing—that those who argue that the civil war in El Salvador should be resolved by negotiations leading to the full participation of the rebel forces in the country should accept the logic that the same principle applies in Nicaragua. So I would favor a negotiated resolution of the termination of the civil war in Nicaragua, based upon the full participation of those elements in the electoral process and in the country.

REPORTER: Are you in support of the bill by Congressman Gray on South Africa? It seems stronger than what the AFL-CIO says.

KIRKLAND: Oh, I think our position is stiffer than the bill that's been put up. I believe that bill needs strengthening. That bill does not mention what I think is the key problem, and that is the detention laws. I don't know why they overlook that. I think it's the crux of the problem.

The bill doesn't mention freedom of association and the promotion of the full recognition of the rights of the working people of South Africa to organize themselves and have full trade union rights. I would want to strengthen it in those regards.

I think it's a little weak in that it gives all these options on the basis of any one of which the Administration could say there's been progress and therefore it ought to be waived, including things that have nothing to do with apartheid, such as Namibia. It's an issue in itself.

I want a resolution of the problem, but that's listed in there with all these apartheid practices, and I think it should be dealt with separately. I don't think you should give them the opportunity for the Administration to come in and say, "Look, we've got a deal on Namibia, so everything is hunky-dory down there and we can waive," while apartheid continues to flourish or even gets worse. So that needs a little more careful thinking. I'm in agreement with the intent of it.

"The object of the regional conferences is to get a free exchange of views. . . . I want to listen and to have a conversation back and forth; I want to get as close to the rank-and-file as is feasible."

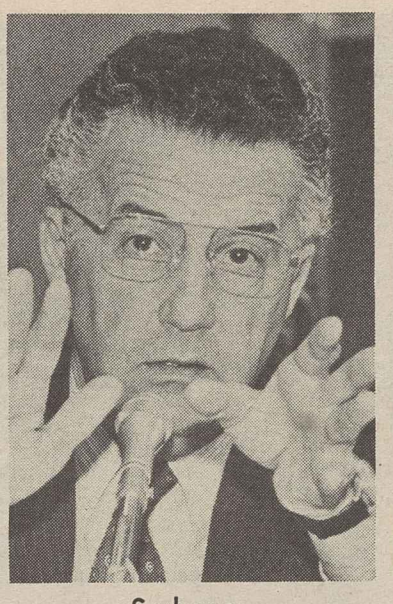
We have been in close consultation with our friends in South Africa in the trade union movement, black unions, a number of them. They were up here. We had a conference with them. I had extensive direct conversations with them in which we explored all of these things, including the question of disinvestment, and we have taken the position that we are prepared to engage vigorously in a selective, targeted disinvestment campaign—not a scattergun, but one focused on particular offending firms and companies. And we particularly singled out the detention laws as something that we should use every kind of pressure to persuade the South African government to abolish.

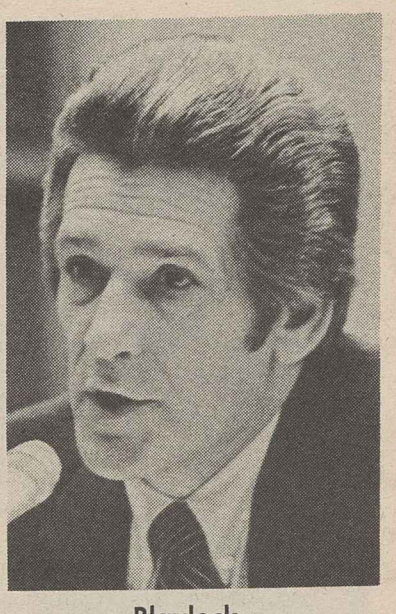
We're having a meeting of the Executive Board of the ICFTU here in Washington in April, and we'll have a special session on the issue of South Africa and measures that the free trade union movement of the world ought to agree on and coordinate.

REPORTER: This is the time you go out on the regional conferences. What are your objectives this year?

KIRKLAND: The chief object of these meetings is to get a free exchange of views. We have structured them so that it's not just an exercise of my making some speech to the assembled brothers and sisters, but to exchange views so that I can hear from them what's on their minds and any criticisms or views that they might have as to things we ought to be doing that we're not doing or that we're not doing well enough. That's the primary purpose, and that will be the driving purpose on the round.



We will, of course, take up a few specific issues and develop a broader understanding and some activism on some issues that are timely. For example, the taxation of fringe benefits will be something we'll talk about. We'll be discussing other issues that have plagued us for a time—trade problems and the destruction of jobs.



But mainly I want to listen and I want to have a conversation back and forth; I want to get as close to the rank-and-file as is feasible.

Unions want rejection of Devine nomination

Devine saw nothing wrong with his taking an active part in political campaigning while drawing pay as administrator of a supposedly scrupulously non-partisan civil service. It's OK, he told the Senate Civil Service subcommittee, because presidential employees aren't subject to the Hatch Act.

Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) suggested that the Office of Personnel Management skated mighty close to violation of a ban on government employees moving on and off the payroll to work on political campaigns.

An OPM associate director left government to direct the campaign of a Republican who ran unsuccessfully against Sarbanes in the 1982 election and was back in his old job the Monday after the election.

Devine's explanation: "I did not leave his job open, but I did not fill it."

Campaign speeches

Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) noted that in appearances on behalf of at least 12 Republican candidates for Congress last fall, Devine was usually accompanied by OPM aides who were also former Reagan campaign officials.

Devine said his campaigning didn't detract from his official duties because "I work 12 to 13 hours a day." Earlier, he had explained that "a presidential appointee works 24 hours a day, 365 days a year."

As for the entourage of politically chosen aides traveling at government expense, Devine said he needed them along to help keep in touch with the agency while he traveled.

Other Democratic senators were equally skeptical of Devine's mixing official and partisan duties.

Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.), who heads the House Civil Service subcommittee, told the Senate panel that Devine has repeatedly bordered on disregard of law on issues that included forcing changes in the federal employee health benefit program, resulting in "a substantial increase in cost to employees and substantial reduction in benefits."

He has provided "inaccurate and misleading information to Congress on the retirement system," Schroeder charged.

Blaylock and other witnesses recalled the "dirty tricks" memo that an aide to Devine prepared. It advocated manipulating a study of pay equity in the federal service in such a way that it "would immediately divide white-collar and blue-collar unions," create "disorder" among Democrats, "pitting union against union and both against radical feminist groups."

Unions expect to have disagreements with the Administration and "to engage in vigorous debate" over differences, Blaylock said. But "what we do not expect is lies and intentional distortions of the issues."

Representatives of non-affiliated unions and an association of federal executives expressed comparably strong opposition to Devine's confirmation for a second term.

Steelworkers, Upholsterers shape proposal for merger

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers and the Upholsterers moved closer to a merger as the UIU executive board approved a plan for consolidation.

USWA President Lynn Williams announced at a meeting of the Steelworkers executive board that merger negotiations are continuing between ad hoc panels representing officials of both unions.

Williams said that under the merger plan approved by the UIU board, the Upholsterers would become a division of the Steelworkers operating out of UIU's current headquarters in Philadelphia.

"The autonomy of local unions will be assured and all contractual rights will be protected," Williams said.

Williams said that all local presidents and business agents, recording secretaries and field staff members of the UIU were advised of the merger discussions in a letter from UIU President John Serembus.

"We have had several months of rewarding conversations with President Serembus and his officers and we believe that we are now in a position to recommend final steps to put together a merger under both the UIU constitution and that of the Steelworkers," Williams said.

Under the merger plan approved by the UIU, a special convention of the Upholsterers would be held to consider all aspects of the proposed merger once the two unions' executive boards reached final agreement. The convention would be followed by a membership referendum.

Under the USWA constitution, the union's executive board has final authority to approve a merger agreement.

The UIU has about 35,000 members, most of them in the furniture industry, and the USWA has about 700,000 members.

Labor asks strong toxic dump law

An extension of the Superfund toxic waste dump law should include authorization of at least $13.5 billion in cleanup funds over the next five years, union witnesses testified at a House hearing.

Stressing the need for strong legislation, a panel of labor representatives urged the Public Works & Transportation subcommittee to reject the Reagan Administration proposal. The Reagan bill shows "a complete lack of concern for the people whose lives and property are threatened by toxic substances," they charged.

The Environmental Protection Agency, in the five years since enactment of the Superfund law in 1980, has cleaned up only a handful of sites—thousands of others remain unaddressed, Legislative Director Brian Turner of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told the subcommittee. The law expires Sept. 30.

Turner said that besides the $13.5 billion in funding, the reauthorization measure should include mandatory cleanup schedules, effective cleanup standards, coverage of federal properties and compensation for victims of toxic substances. He also called for comprehensive worker protections and training, public participation, increased health studies and taxes on imported chemicals.

The Reagan bill proposes only $4.5 billion in cleanup funds, while shifting 60 percent of the funding burden to an untried waste end tax scheme, Turner noted. He charged that the already lackluster pace of cleanup will be further slowed by increasing the amount of funds that states must contribute.

Current funding for the cleanup program is $1.6 billion, an amount that would cover cleanup of only about 10 percent of the 2,200 sites on the EPA's national priority list, Legislative Director John J. Brown of the Operating Engineers pointed out. EPA estimates the total cleanup costs at between $23-$33 billion, while other estimates range as high as $100 billion.

Tax imports, too

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Jay Power told the subcommittee that the Superfund tax that is imposed on domestic producers should be "equally and effectively applied to imports of chemicals and petroleum."

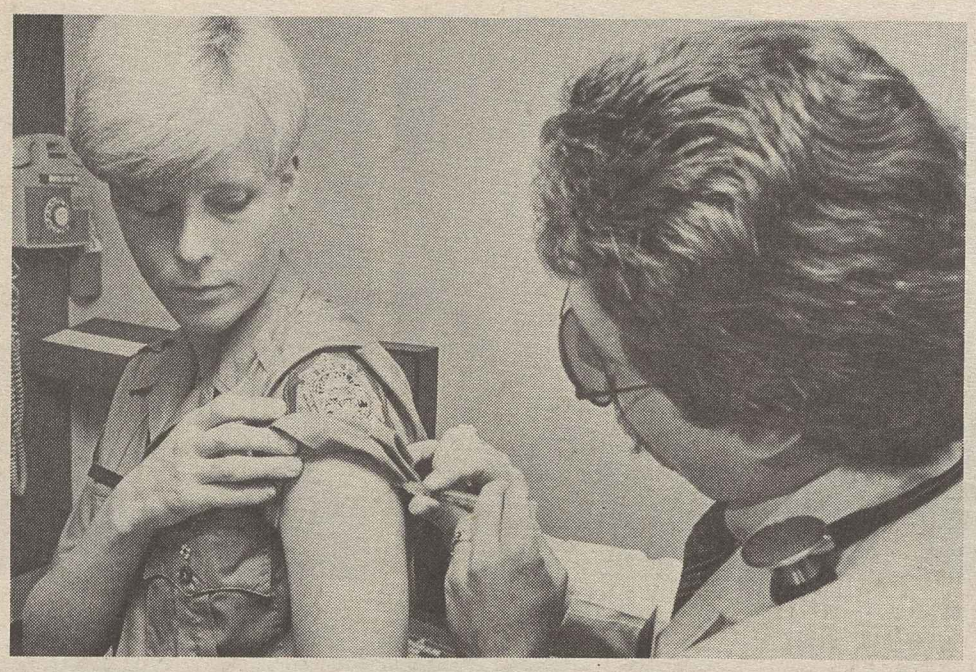
Citing the decline of the U.S. petrochemical industry over the past five years, Power stressed that "it is critical that Superfund not place the domestic industry and its workers at a competitive disadvantage with foreign producers." He said it is imperative that Superfund taxes be levied on all imported chemicals on a "dollar for dollar basis with domestically taxed products."

Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden said toxic waste sites in communities such as Love Canal, N.Y., Times Beach, Mo., and Woburn, Mass., are little more than "large chemical soup mixtures" that have resulted in abnormally high cancer rates, childhood leukemia, birth defects, sterility and other afflictions.

The Superfund bill also should include provisions for victims' compensation. At a minimum, Warden said, Congress should create a federal cause of action making it possible for victims to bring suit in the federal courts with the "presumptions of proof favoring the victims."

The union witnesses said victims should also be able to file claims with the Superfund for lost wages, medical costs, relocation expenses and other out-of-pocket expenses related to toxic waste exposure.

Steelworkers Legislative Director Jack Sheehan told the panel that the key to reducing the number of future victims may be the inclusion of a community right-to-know measure. He urged provisions similar to the requirements in a bill introduced by Rep. James Florio (D-N.J.).



Sheehan called for a community right-to-know provision to regulate manufacturers, transporters and users of hazardous chemicals. It should include adequate reporting requirements and emergency plans and cover all chemicals regulated by government agencies, he said.

Providence next

The second 1985 AFL-CIO regional conference will be held in Providence, R.I., Apr. 28-29 with five satellite meetings planned to expand on the "exchange of ideas" between federation officers and union members.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will be at satellite meetings on Apr. 29 in Manchester, N.H., at noon and in Portsmouth, N.H., at 7 p.m., and in Augusta, Me., at noon on Apr. 30. Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue will be in Lowell, Mass., on Apr. 29 at noon and in Springfield, Mass., at 7 p.m. that same day.

The regional conference is for the states of Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

Job rights of handicapped viewed as bargaining issue

Leesburg, Va. — Collective bargaining offers one of the best means of providing job protections for disabled workers, AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller told a symposium of labor, management, government and academic leaders here.

In addition, collective bargaining is a prime area for creative collaboration between labor and management on ways to assist the disabled, Miller said.

Miller, who is a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, suggested that union contracts could serve as vehicles to protect the disabled against discrimination just as such agreements now restrain discrimination against women and minority groups.

She also stressed the need to negotiate ample health benefits, rehabilitation services and training programs for the disabled.

The symposium focused on a review of current cooperative activities for the handicapped worker, identified obstacles to widening the scope of such activities, and recommended ways to overcome them.

Cosponsors of the program were the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor-Management Relations & Cooperative Programs, the National Institute of Handicapped Research, the Dept. of Education, and the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. The AFL-CIO assisted in organizing the symposium.

The most important concern of the worker who becomes disabled is job transfer, Miller observed, adding that collective bargaining agreements should guarantee the right of newly disabled workers to transfer to a job which they can perform if their old job is beyond their physical capabilities.

"These transfer rights should be in accord with the rights and privileges of seniority within the company," she said. "Salary levels commensurate with those wages previously earned should be guaranteed."

Both labor and management also need to be flexible enough to offer solutions to workers in the pre-retirement age bracket who are especially vulnerable to hypertension, stroke, heart attack, depression, and other age-related conditions, she said.

Solutions to individuals in this situation could include job restructuring, shorter work hours, assistance in getting to and from work, and transfer to work sites more convenient to the employee.

had been under contracts paying only $7,500 a season.

Allen said that although the average salary and benefit levels are lower in the USFL, the overall package matches most of the protective benefits and security clauses in the National Football League.

The agreement came after nine months of negotiations between USFL management representatives and the union. This contract "is a positive sign for the future of the league," said Allen, who is also secretary-treasurer of the Federation of Professional Athletes—the parent union of the NFL Players Association.

The new agreement provides $30,000 in life insurance for rookies and $50,000 for players in their third year and beyond.

The health care package is fully employer-paid and covers players' families. Major medical coverage ranges up to $1 million and hospitalization, surgery, maternity and dental coverage is provided, along with disability and injury protection benefits.

Limits were placed on the training camp and squad rosters. The teams are limited to four pre-season games, 18 season games and three playoff games.

ICFTU board agenda focuses on South Africa

The executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions will hold a special meeting on the problems of black unionists in South Africa when it convenes in Washington Apr. 11-13.

Leaders of the Brussels-based confederation, to which the AFL-CIO belongs, will discuss strategies that would pressure the South African government to end its racial policy of apartheid.

The three-day meeting will hear reports on violations of trade union rights in other countries, with special attention on Latin America, Poland and the Pacific basin.

Board members will also review policies of the International Monetary Fund.

Union-busting tactic

NLRB complaint hits Marval Poultry payoff

Harrisonburg, Va.—The struck Marval Poultry Co. has been accused in a National Labor Relations Board complaint of making illegal payoffs to workers to persuade them to oust their union bargaining representative.

The complaint was issued by the NLRB's regional office in Baltimore following several months of investigations of charges filed by Local 400 of the Food & Commercial Workers against the huge turkey processor.

In the complaint, NLRB Regional Director Louis J. D'Amico alleged that Marval personnel director Robert A. Wolfe violated the federal labor law last summer when he "telephoned employees and solicited their assistance in a campaign to decertify the union, and promised to compensate employees for such assistance."

Marval has been the object of an AFL-CIO consumer boycott since last October. Local 400 members have been on strike against the company, the biggest turkey processor in the country, since last June when it rejected major concessions demanded by the company for a new contract to cover the 800 production line workers.

Local President Thomas McNutt said he was pleased with the NLRB complaint, but added that the company could tie up the case for years through legal appeals. He said the union intends to continue the boycott and strike against Marval until a new contract is reached.

"We've represented Marval employees for more than 20 years," he said. "We're not going to abandon them now."

The NLRB's five-month investigation of the union's charges included on-site visits and interviews with management and employees. The unfair practice complaint will be considered by an NLRB administrative law judge at a May 21 hearing in Harrisonburg. The Marval processing plant is in nearby Dayton, Va.

Local 400 Executive Vice President William Sellars said the union has documented evidence that bribes and other illegal forms of inducement were used to get employees to sign a petition against the union.

"The law just won't allow them to use that kind of tactic," McNutt said. "Marval's effort to remove the union by unilateral edict reflects their general approach toward labor relations. They don't want to bargain seriously. They want everything their way.

"Because we wouldn't agree to a contract that stripped their employees of all rights and left them helpless, Marval tried to destroy the union."

Even while on strike, the union has been representing Marval's employees, involving itself in seven arbitration cases over the last nine months. In six of the seven cases, impartial arbitrators sided with the union and found that the company had violated the rights of its employees. The seventh case is pending.

The NLRB complaint did not specify the amount of alleged payments by the company to workers, but Local 400 attorney Robert Paul said the union has affidavits from employees describing company offers to pay $15 for workers to come to the plant early to solicit anti-union petitions, and $15 to stay late for the same purpose.

Paul said the company earlier had hired Atlanta labor attorney James Wimberly as a consultant in the contract negotiations.

If the charge is upheld, the NLRB could order Marval to recognize the union again as the workers' bargaining agent. After the administrative law judge's hearing, either side has the right to appeal his decision to the full NLRB.

"The NLRB complaint is a vindication of our position," McNutt said. "It is a clear signal to Marval and others that they can't violate the law without fear of reprisal."

Eastern Airlines, 3 unions wind up wage bargaining

Miami—The three major unions representing employees at Eastern Airlines—the Air Line Pilots, Transport Workers and Machinists—neared the end of their current negotiations with the carrier on pay concessions aimed at cutting the airline's losses.

The Pilots ratified a revised package of wage reductions and productivity increases by a 2-to-1 margin. Meanwhile, the Machinists reached a tentative agreement, and the Transport Workers are voting on a separate settlement.

ALPA, which represents about 4,000 Eastern pilots, approved a pay agreement reducing salaries 13 percent below 1981 pay rates, retroactive to Feb. 1.

The ALPA pact will run concurrently with the union's existing collective bargaining agreement, which becomes amendable at the end of this year. Negotiations for a new contract are scheduled to begin in May.

The TWU's two-year agreement covers the airline's 6,500 flight attendants. Ballots are expected to be counted on Apr. 12.

The IAM accord, covering 12,000 mechanics and ground workers, is patterned after an interim agreement reached in February that keys productivity increases to the restoration of full wages. A membership vote on the contract is expected in mid-April, the IAM said.

National farm-labor alliance mapped

St. Louis—Labor and farm leaders from 17 states pledged to form closer ties to create a new national political alliance with roots in state coalitions.

A conference of more than 100 representatives of farm groups and unions, including the AFL-CIO, Auto Workers, Government Employees, the unaffiliated Teamsters, National Farmers Union and American Agricultural Movement, unanimously endorsed a call for the farm-labor alliance.

In adopting a series of goals and principles for the state coalitions, farm leaders pledged to seek their members' backing for legislation to cut the U.S. trade deficit while union representatives endorsed proposals for farm price supports and other agricultural goals.

UAW President Owen Bieber termed the meeting "one more step in our continuing efforts to form stronger coalitions and alliances with other workers and groups, such as farmers with whom we can make common cause for a strong American economy and for American jobs."

Other trade unionists taking part included state AFL-CIO Presidents Daniel J. McVey of Missouri and James J. Wengert of Iowa, and L. D. Porter, AFL-CIO Region II Director.

The union and farm representatives said Reagan's economic policies are "a central cause of the farm crisis." They cited the punitive interest rates and shrinking export markets for farm goods that the Administration's huge budget deficits have brought. Real farm prices have fallen below the depression levels of the 1930s and nearly 300,000 family farms have been liquidated in the last four years, they pointed out.

"America's misguided economic policies have caused farmers to go bankrupt, but they have also cost more than 60,000 workers who build farm machinery to lose their jobs over the last four years," the statement observed.

Organizers of the new alliance said many of the groups had cooperated in the past, but the current effort is the most comprehensive yet.

"When the auctioneers and the sheriffs look out before them and see union members and farmers arm-in-arm, they will know we have decided not just to mourn, but to organize and to fight back," the conference statement conc. .ded.

Veto warning stops bill on aid to jobless

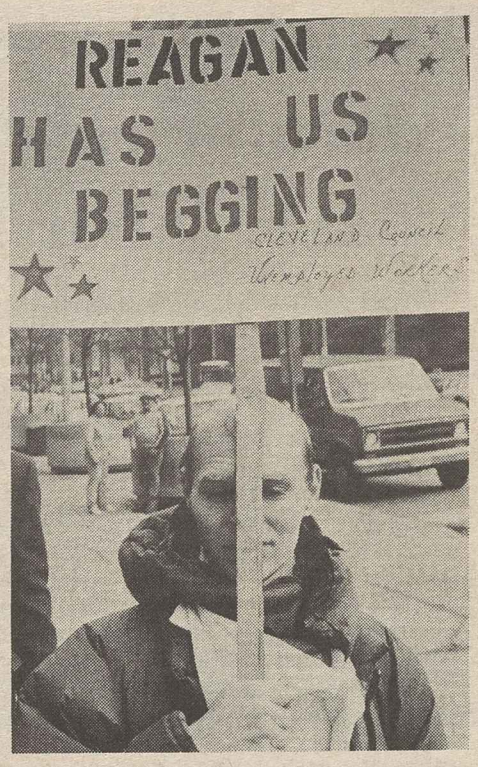
on the issue. Rep. Richard T. Schulze (R-Pa.) provided the lone GOP vote for an extension.

The committee also sidetracked the permanent extended benefits bill.

The AFL-CIO had urged in testimony and letters that the FSC program be extended, noting an increase in the percentage of long-term jobless workers and the plight of communities where workers have been hit by plant closings and large-scale permanent layoffs.

Unemployed union members came to Washington to carry their case to Congress and a House Democratic caucus prodded the Ways & Means Committee to act.



But with a one-week Easter recess approaching, the judgment of the House leadership was that a phaseout was the most that could become law and any further effort would be tilting at windmills.

It was, Rostenkowski conceded in presenting the phaseout bill on the House floor, a "very small gesture to the nation's long-term unemployed."

Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.), who had convened the House Democratic caucus by petition when it appeared that nothing would be done, welcomed the fact that the persons on the rolls would not be cut off.

That's "the least we can do," he said, but it's not enough. "This is not the House's finest hour. We ought to be offering at least a three-month extension."

A message from Cleveland—and the nation

Cleveland—The demonstration in front of City Hall was for a continuation of federal supplemental compensation for the long-term unemployed.

The chant of the demonstrators—union and religious leaders as well as jobless workers from the Cleveland area—was, "We want jobs." Signs carried in a march from City Hall to Republican headquarters read, "Reagan Has Us Begging."

Speakers at the rally, organized by the Cleveland Council of Unemployed Workers, were equally blunt.

"Reagan has stolen the workers' lunch," Steelworkers District Director Frank J. Valenta said. He blamed the Administration's economic and trade policies for the shrinkage of 47,000 USWA jobs in the district to 26,000 over four years.

Wallace Kaufman, executive director of Painters Council 6, said building trades workers as well as industrial workers have felt the brunt of high unemployment.

The Rev. Jeremiah B. Pryce of Antioch Baptist Church took Congress to task for its neglect of the unemployed and the needy.

The rally, and others like it across the country, sought to awaken Congress and the White House to the plight of millions bypassed by economic recovery. The message was heard, but largely ignored.

Poland's repression persists despite 'amnesty'

By James M. Shevis

New York—Nine months after Poland enacted amnesty legislation that was supposed to have eased repression, "gross and massive" violations of human rights persist in that country, the Committee in Support of Solidarity charged in a document outlining the abuses.

"In fact, there's been an increase in violence since the Amnesty Act," said Eric Chenoweth, the committee's director.

The 82-page report covers the period from January 1984 to January 1985 and describes repeated violations of the human rights provisions in international covenants ratified by the communist regime.

During the period, at least 17 persons were killed under mysterious circumstances by unknown assailants connected to the police organs. Their deaths followed the killings of 68 others since the imposition of martial law in Poland on Dec. 13, 1981.

Chenoweth said even that number has grown since the beginning of this year. As of late March, new killings have come to light that put the total at 130, he said.

Besides the killings and beatings, there is the widespread use of detention and political imprisonment of Solidarity members and leaders, excessive force by police to repress peaceful assembly, inhumane and degrading treatment of political prisoners, and the pervasive use of arbitrary dismissals and denial of employment to Solidarity members and former political prisoners, the committee's report said.

Documented violations

The document has been submitted to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the International Labor Organization, and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. It is not intended as an exhaustive account of the full range of human rights violations in Poland.

Rather, it is intended to supplement the documentation provided by the Helsinki Committee in Poland in its "Third Report on Human and Civil Rights in the Polish People's Republic: January-September 1984."

The information for the report was gathered from independent underground publications of the outlawed Solidarity trade union, official government sources and the Helsinki Committee in Poland.

Chenoweth said the killings by "unknown assailants" introduce a new tactic of repression designed to instill fear and terror into the populace.

"As a practice, the state authorities do not investigate such killings or, if they are investigated, do not apprehend the perpetrators," the report observed.

"In only one case of political murder have the immediate perpetrators of the crime been apprehended and tried, that of the murder of Father Jerzy Popieluszko.

"Even in this case, no higher officials of the Ministry of Internal Affairs were implicated in the official investigation, despite a three-year campaign by the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the government press against Father Popieluszko for his defense of human rights."

Since the murder of Father Popieluszko, eight other killings have been reported. In all cases, police functionaries were implicated in the deaths, yet no formal proceedings have been instituted against them.

In 1984, when investigations were undertaken into unexplained deaths or deaths resulting from the use of force or beatings by police, the prosecutor's office either ended them "for lack of evidence" or falsely labeled the deaths self-inflicted, the report charged.

"Often police functionaries will force alcohol down the throat of the victim in order to make it appear that the victim had an accident while drunk," the report observed.

Crackdown on assembly

Another pervasive form of repression described in the report is the use of force to deny freedom of assembly. Although there were fewer Solidarity-sponsored demonstrations last year, there were a large number of peaceful assemblies during the period. Police used excessive force to disperse such assemblies on numerous occasions and were especially brutal in certain cities, the report charged.

It said state authorities also violated workers' rights of freedom of association, thus denying their right to form independent associations.

In addition, it said one of the most pervasive instruments of state power used to deny freedom of association has been the government's exercise of its monopoly over jobs "to arbitrarily dismiss, demote, or transfer Solidarity members and leaders and to refuse employment whatsoever to such individuals."

Georgine warns benefits tax would lift government costs

Shortsighted proposals to tax employee benefits threaten a system of family protection on which America's workers have come to rely, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. charged at House hearings.

Employer-provided health insurance and other job-based benefits should be encouraged by the tax code as a cost-effective way of meeting essential social needs, Georgine urged. Without them, he said, a greater burden would fall on government.

Georgine testified as chairman of the National Coordinating Committee on Multiemployer Plans, a federation of some 140 union-negotiated health, welfare and pension funds. The hearings were called by the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations to examine the impact of various "tax simplification" proposals that would make workers pay income tax on employer payments into their benefit plans.

"In our view, this nation cannot justify an attempt to balance the budget on the backs of working men and women," Georgine told the committee.

"Our workers and their families depend on the retirement, health care, disability, life and unemployment insurance benefits provided by these plans.

"Even if curtailing or eliminating benefits were practical, which they certainly are not in view of the other financial pressures they would create, more equitable and humane ways of raising revenues certainly must exist."

Calling the idea that taxes on health insurance might lead to lower health costs a "pure pipe dream," Georgine pointed to studies that show the actual result would be higher taxes for many low- and middle-income workers. He also noted that collectively bargained plans have been leaders in delivering health care at a low cost.

Georgine said tax reform measures must be directed at areas of actual abuse, not to restrictions of plans that even Congress has said assure meaningful levels of employee benefits.

Donahue sees educator role vital to labor

Los Angeles—A major challenge facing labor educators is to demonstrate that union representation is the best available means for workers to express their individuality on the job and to control their working lives, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the federation's 1985 education conference.

Donahue said the AFL-CIO's recent report, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," makes it apparent that the labor movement has not been sufficiently successful in bringing that point home to working Americans.

Yet, Donahue stressed, the 2½-year study that led to the report by the Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work found no cause for "doom and despair." Instead, it said the data it studied suggest that "a period of resurgence—of sustained growth—is within our grasp."

Donahue's remarks were the highlight of the three-day educational conference, held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the University & College Labor Educators Association. The conference brought together about 160 labor education specialists from campuses and union staffs.

AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields opened the conference. Workshops focused on polling techniques, labor's historic role, culture and arts for workers, and changing labor's image.

The overall theme, Helping Unions Meet Future Challenges, was the focal point of panel discussions and workshops.

New impetus

Donahue said the federation's report on the changing work situation, issued at the February meeting of the Executive Council, offers "new impetus" for innovative labor education programs at the local union and community levels. He and other speakers focused on the types of things labor educators can do to build on the report's findings and pursue its recommendations.

Among the specific challenges to labor educators dealt with at the conference were how to reverse the decline in union membership, getting labor's message into the schools, new approaches to media use, and educating the community to the concept of comparable worth among men and women workers.

Other workshops dealt with labor law, organizing campaigns, occupational safety, and corporate strategy techniques.

Workshop panelists also explored ways of enriching labor's public image, and discussed new approaches in teaching with the use of computers and videotape.

The conference closed with a panel discussion on union-university labor education relationships. The conferees also toured Starkist Tuna's unionized factory in San Pedro for a firsthand look at its educational training facility.

The conferees also took note of the 10th anniversary of labor education programs for women trade union leaders, held each year at different campuses in four regions of the country. Cosponsored by unions and universities, the programs provide training for women in such areas as collective bargaining and labor legislation.

NLRB sees no evil

Employers can now tell workers that they're in for a rough time if a union wins a representation election—and maybe they'll find themselves out of a job.

That's not a threat. It's not even coercive. It's just campaign rhetoric, the National Labor Relations Board says.

The NLRB rejected the Molders' objections to an election-day letter distributed to workers at Tri-Cast, Inc., in Spring Lake, Mich., in September 1981. The Molders lost the election 14 to 11.

The Reagan-appointed board overturned the regional director's finding that the letter was a misrepresentation of federal labor law. The letter had said the firm would have to "run things by the book" and would not "be able to handle personal requests as we have been doing." The board felt this was a straightforward presentation of a fact. Nor did it find any threat in the claim that "union restrictions" would mean lost business and jobs.

But even if the letter were read as misrepresenting the workers' rights, the NLRB said, it would not overturn the election.

"The employer's first comment is couched in terms of what might happen 'if' certain events occur. We construe this comment as nothing more than the employer's permissible mention of the effects of unionization," the board said.

Louisiana labor seeks more for jobs, benefits, education

Baton Rouge, La.—Delegates to the Louisiana AFL-CIO convention called for improvements in all levels of public education, pay raises for state workers and teachers, and restoration of funds for jobless benefits and workers' compensation.

Gov. Edwin Edwards told the more than 500 delegates he will convene a special legislative session this summer to raise money for salary increases for state workers and teachers.

State workers haven't received any pay increases in the past three years, while teachers got a 7-percent pay raise last September.

Following the convention, state Reps. Dennis Hebert and John Travis pre-filed a bill for the upcoming legislative session to boost state employee salaries 10 percent.

With Louisiana's jobless rate now at 11.6 percent, the convention gave special attention to jobs, unemployment benefits and workers' compensation.

Slashed benefits

Under former Republican Gov. Dave Treen, jobless benefits and workers' compensation were slashed and the employer contributions eased, resulting in severe deficits for both the state funds. The delegates urged the legislature and the governor to restore both funds' health and to improve benefits.

Other resolutions called for more community service jobs, aid for displaced workers, a national industrial policy and reform of the state's labor laws, including prevailing wages for state construction.

State AFL-CIO President Victor Bussie was re-elected to his 30th one-year term. Sec.-Treas. K. Gordon Flory, who has held office in the federation since 1957, was also reelected. Four new district vice presidents are Gene Davis and Onzie Jones of the Teachers, Julius Mines of the Bricklayers and Raymond Baptiste of the Food & Commercial Workers.

Delegates voted support for health and safety standards for public employees, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Coalition of Labor Union Women, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, postcard voter registration, and for the boycott against Coors beer.

The convention endorsed the Louisiana Teachers' program of reforms, which includes pay raises, improvements in health and retirement benefits, and funding for teacher education in critical areas.

Delegates also called for full funding of state colleges and universities as well as the implementation of labor studies programs.

Allen Copping, the new president of Louisiana State University, told the delegates that a top quality educational system generates economic development and jobs. He said a reordering of the state's spending priorities, rather than a new tax, would be sufficient to upgrade the state's education system.

State School Superintendent Tom Clausen called for smaller class sizes, higher teacher pay and mandatory kindergarten for five-year-olds.

Among the other guest speakers, Sen. Russell B. Long accused the Reagan Administration of making the United States a "debtor nation," and Lt. Gov. Robert F. Freeman endorsed a state agency shop law, stressing "it's fair, it's right and it's equitable."

Job training study faults youth policy

A new study of the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) finds a majority of local training programs are not providing training and job services to young people to the degree the law requires.

The study, prepared for the National Commission for Employment Policy, looked at job training programs operated by 25 service delivery areas and 15 states during JTPA's first nine months.

JTPA replaced the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA) program as the federal government's primary job training program in 1983.

Despite claims to the contrary, the study found that the separate state-operated JTPA programs are providing substantially fewer work and training opportunities than were available in the CETA era.

Especially in youth programs, the study found, "JTPA is tilting toward the provision of low-cost, short-term, minimum support activity for those eligible applicants best equipped to enter immediate employment."

Program weakness

Mike Arnold, executive director of the Human Resources Development Institute, the AFL-CIO's employment and training arm, agreed that failure to do a better job of helping disadvantaged youngsters is a major weakness of JTPA.

The report notes that 43 percent of youths who participated in JTPA programs had high school diplomas or higher education, 31 percent were still in school and only 26 percent were school dropouts.

Lack of any payment to youths in training is one of the problems cited in the report. The study found that the average training period for young people in JTPA programs was nearly 10 weeks less than originally planned.

The report examined other areas of JTPA's operations and offered a mixed review. The surveyed programs did exceed their goals for enrolling welfare recipients. Training costs were lower than anticipated, due to emphasis on quick low-cost placement. The average wage for JTPA graduates was $4.61 an hour, falling short of the federal government's standard of $4.90.

Conference on jobless youth sees need for added funding

Organizations concerned with employment and training called for increased resources to deal with jobless youth.

At a conference held at AFL-CIO headquarters, staff experts from across the country spoke of the unmet needs for effective assistance to school dropouts and other low-skilled youth under existing Job Training Partnership Act programs. Cosponsors of the conference included the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, National Alliance of Business, National Commission for Employment Policy and associations of states, counties and cities.

Staffs administering JTPA programs repeatedly stressed the need for more technical services to help local planners develop effective youth programs. The Labor Dept. should be a positive support—not an adversary—in these efforts, participants said, and they called for additional technical assistance such as that provided by HRDI, the National Alliance of Business, and other national organizations.

The group agreed that effective assistance for the youth who most need employment and training programs must start with remedial education to equip them with the basic skills required for job training and jobs.

Yet the high cost of effective remedial programs is a formidable barrier in most states and localities, the conferees reported.

A related consideration, they noted, is the drive to serve as many youths as possible by devoting most JTPA money to inexpensive, short-term services aimed at early job placements. The group called for more research on the long-range effectiveness of such short-term services.

A principal barrier to youth employment is the general shortage of the types of jobs youth have traditionally held, especially in the public sector, participants said. To link youth with jobs, they suggested such strategies as greater involvement of employers and unions in job development efforts, more work experience to prepare youth for regular employment, and vocational exploration, which was an activity provided by HRDI and others until such national program initiatives were ended by the Reagan Administration.

Education Director Dorothy Shields welcomes delegates to the department's annual conference.

The Problem Persists

PROBLEMS DON'T go away if they are ignored. Problems don't go away if they are ignored. Problems don't go away if they are ignored.

They don't.

That's a lesson that apparently must be relearned by every Congress and by every Administration.

Congress and the White House may hope that the phaseout of FSC, the federal benefit program for the long-term unemployed, will sweep the plight of the jobless under the table. But the governors of states with double-digit unemployment and the mayors of cities where unemployment remains at recession levels know better. They have to deal with it.

The elimination of the federal program would have been less calamitous if the permanent program of 13 weeks of extended state-federal benefits were still intact.

Earlier congresses, unfortunately, so emasculated it that levels of joblessness that should set off loud alarms are not sufficient to "trigger-on" the program.

THERE IS a clear and present need, conceded even by many of the members of Congress who acquiesced in the abandonment of FSC, for a more realistic and sensitive trigger.

In testimony earlier this year, the AFL-CIO outlined the type of protection that is needed, including a third tier of federal compensation in addition to a strengthened extended benefits program.

These changes are still needed, and it shouldn't be necessary to wait until recession again verges on a cataclysmic depression to do something about it.

At the very least, Congress can and should make a start toward minimizing the hardships it has mandated by making emergency repairs to the permanent extended benefits program.

Perhaps a few field trips to communities still ravaged by plant closings and permanent job losses would instill the needed sense of urgency.

Smokestack America isn't the grazing ground of Yuppies.

Trade Tokenism

THERE IS CAUSE for real concern at the fast growth of our country's trade deficit with Japan, and the certainty that the shipment of an additional 450,000 cars to the U.S. market will tilt it even more grotesquely out of balance.

So the expressions of concern from Congress are certainly welcome, even if the impact of a non-binding resolution leaves something to be desired.

To the extent that some additional American products may be accepted in the Japanese home market, that is all to the good. But knowledgeable people are already discounting the magnitude of any likely increase in U.S. exports.

Without downplaying the impact of year-after-year of ever-growing trade deficits, there is an even greater threat to the American economy.

THE LOSS of an estimated 90,000 jobs, just from the increase in auto shipments above last year's total, represents a loss of 90,000 productive workers who buy goods, use health care services, pay mortgages and try to give their kids a good education.

The addition of 90,000 people to the unemployment rolls represents a dollar drain that must be added to the nearly $5 billion increase in the trade deficit.

The human balance scale is even more tilted than the dollar-yen relationship.

This is the trade union movement's special concern.

Congressional concern is welcome and overdue. But it will be wasted if the White House is allowed to declare victory on the basis of some token concessions.

Struggle to end apartheid continues in South Africa

By Bayard Rustin

For the last 25 years, predictions of an imminent race war in South Africa have abounded. Most of these warnings have come after sporadic outbursts of violence such as the shootings at Sharpeville in 1960 and the 1976 Soweto student demonstrations.

Recent events have again drawn our attention to South Africa and there are renewed warnings of a bloody race war if the government does not act quickly to end apartheid and establish majority rule. But if we have learned anything about South Africa during the last quarter century, it is that the random acts of violence there are just that, and that an organized, violent opposition which has the strength to topple the military might of the South African government is not a likely prospect.

While the world has waited for what seemed to be inevitable, the South African regime has continued on much the same course that was set in 1948. Apartheid has been entrenched by the recently adopted Constitution and the homelands policy continues, making the majority of South Africans foreigners in the land of their birth. All this is bolstered by a military force more powerful than the combined forces of sub-Saharan Africa.

Lengthy process

To be sure, apartheid will end someday and there will be black rule in South Africa. However, to continue to assert that violent revolution is imminent is to ignore both the extraordinary military capabilities of the South African regime and its ability to employ extreme forms of violent oppression to maintain the status quo. Change in South Africa will come about through an evolutionary process which will include continued spontaneous violent outbursts on the one hand, and the resistance of individuals and groups dedicated to nonviolent, peaceful change within that country, on the other.

It is the ongoing violence of the government of South Africa and the occasional acts of sabotage by its opponents which attract the fleeting attention of the news media.

Consequently, most Americans are not aware that there are hundreds of groups within South Africa working for peaceful change. They include churches, trade unions, civil and human rights groups, women's groups, and social welfare and humanitarian agencies. People of all races who are committed to seeking democratic change in South Africa are struggling, as individuals or in groups, under the harshest of circumstances.

Deep commitment

The degree to which peaceful change is possible in South Africa depends largely on the ability of its nonviolent groups to continue the fight. These groups face incredible odds but are committed to the struggle to democratize South Africa.

The South African government responds to both violent and nonviolent resistance with more and more oppression. Its opponents who employ violence face a death sentence or exile at the infamous Robben Island prison. Those who resist nonviolently face detention without trial, jail, and the peculiarly South African invention known as banning which, briefly, relegates one to the status of a "non-person." Some who resist are forced to seek refuge in neighboring states or in Europe.

To date most Americans who abhor apartheid have expressed their opposition in three ways:

- They have urged the American government to abandon "constructive engagement" and to adopt a policy which clearly opposes apartheid.
- They have called for disinvestment on the part of multinational corporations doing business in South Africa.
- They have supported the sports and cultural boycotts of South Africa conducted by much of the world community.

While these efforts have not brought about the end of apartheid, they have let the people of South Africa know that they do have foreign allies in the struggle for freedom.

MEMO FROM COPE

High Court to Rule on Gerrymander

How come California Democrats are cuddling up to Indiana Republicans?

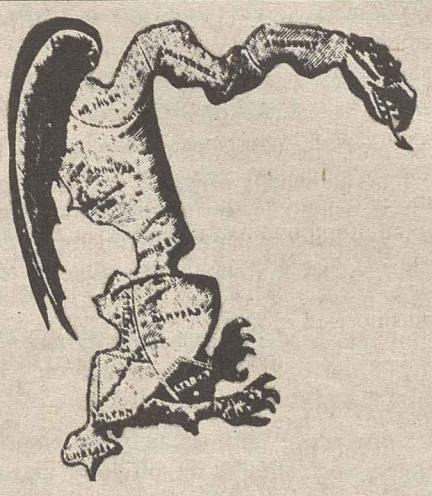
For that matter, what interest is it that unites Indiana Democrats with California Republicans?

What's responsible for these improbable—as well as temporary, unofficial and reluctant—alliances is a case the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to hear later this year.

The case concerns one of the country's oldest political practices, the gerrymander.

The gerrymander has been with us since 1812, when Massachusetts Gov. Eldridge Gerry and his party carved up the state's election districts into bizarre and geographically preposterous shapes to keep power away from the opposition party.



The outline of one district resembled a salamander. Hence, the word "gerrymander," used ever since to describe the practice of redrawing district lines to the advantage of the "in" party and the disadvantage of the "outs."

Both political parties have done it scores of times since Gov. Gerry and his cohorts came up with the notion. After all, the opportunity comes every decade, following the National Census.

And every time one party does it, the other party —which is simultaneously doing it in a state or states where it holds the reins—acts like such dastardly behavior is unheard of and flat-out un-American.

Naturally, this kind of good, clean, political fun couldn't go on forever, and now the Supreme Court will decide on the constitutionality of the gerrymander.

The case that will be argued before the court was brought originally by Indiana Democrats against the state GOP's reapportionment plan. Democrats charge under the plan they won only 43 percent of state legislative seats even though they got 52 percent of the popular vote.

Endangered species—Original gerrymandered district dates from 1812 in Massachusetts. High Court has agreed to rule on constitutionality of the practice.

A three-judge federal panel already has ruled in favor of the Democrats' challenge.

The irony is California Republicans are making precisely the same charge against California Democrats, using similar figures that show their share of seats under a Democratic gerrymander are far below their percentage of popular vote.

This has led California Democrats to file a "friend-of-the-court" brief in the case before the Supreme Court in support of Indiana Republicans—one of the strangest twists in the history of the old and unique American political game of gerrymander.

Women Legislators Up 80% in Decade

The number of women elected to state legislatures has increased by more than 80 percent in the past 10 years. Women now constitute 14.7 percent of state senators and representatives. It was 8 percent a decade ago. In numbers, 1,097 of the 7,461 legislators are women, compared to 604 in 1975.

The figures were compiled and released by the Center for the American Woman & Politics at Rutgers University.

Other findings: 54.1 percent of the women legislators are Democrats, 45.2 Republicans. (Eight women serve in the nation's only non-partisan legislature, Nebraska.)

New Hampshire has the highest percentage of women legislators, 33 percent, and the highest GOP representation among women, 66 percent in the house and 100 percent GOP in the senate. The state with the lowest percentage of women in the legislature is Mississippi with 2.3 percent—four women out of 174 members.

Odds 'n Ends

IN SPECIAL ELECTION for Michigan state senate, Republican wins to retain 20-18 GOP edge. GOP took control of state senate last year through successful recall movements against two Democratic incumbents who had supported state tax increase. Democrats control state lower body, and the governor is a Democrat.

FUSSING OVER MONEY are a couple of right-wing political committees and master-mailer Richard Viguerie. The PACs—National Conservative PAC and Ruff-PAC—are holding back on payment of some $4 million to Viguerie's direct mail firm. Ruff-PAC charges it lost hundreds of thousands of dollars in potential contributions when 750,000 of its letters were "delivered" to a Chicago dump last year.

NCPAC is holding up on $3.2 million charging the mailing cost far more than it produced in contributions. Five other rightist PACs are sitting on much smaller sums owed to Viguerie for his mailing services. These are Committee for Survival of a Free Congress, National Congressional Club (Sen. Jesse Helms' PAC), Tax Limitation Committee, Fund for a Conservative Majority, Gun Owners of America.

NCPAC raised more than $14 million in 1984 but claims in its latest report to the Federal Election Commission to be $4.1 million in debt. Three quarters of that is what it owes Viguerie. The disputed billing involves a mailing of more than 10 million letters in support of the Reagan campaign for re-election.

Curb Consultants?

California is moving toward possible regulation of political consultants. The state's Fair Political Practices Commission recently voted to draft, and find sponsors for, a proposal to be introduced in the state legislature.

Nothing is firm yet, but reportedly any plan would require political consultants to register and to reveal with what candidates or what interests promoting ballot initiatives they have a contractual relationship.

It might also require that all materials prepared for a candidate by a consultant at least be seen by the candidate before they get distribution.

A tougher proposal was first put together, but the FPPC reconsidered after consultants raised protests based on the First Amendment.

ARE YOU ONE OF THOSE who starts keeping track of candidates for the next presidential election the second this one ends? Do you read all the speculation you can, and all the polls, and handicapping? Here's some grist for you. Five recent polls taken among GOP voters and activists show Vice President Bush the solid preference for the 1988 party nomination, with support averaging 42 percent against eight other potential candidates. Closest to him is Rep. Jack Kemp (N.Y.) with a 19 percent support average. Third is former Sen. Howard Baker (Tenn.) with a little less than 10 percent.

IF YOU NEED MORE, a couple of the polls took the full public pulse pitting Bush against Sens. Gary Hart and Ted Kennedy. Here's how they matched up in percentages: Poll 1—Hart 45, Bush 42; Kennedy 40, Bush 47. Poll 2—Hart 49, Bush 34; Kennedy 46, Bush 40. Using Kemp in a poll of the public at-large, it came out Hart 51, Kemp 25; Kennedy 44, Kemp 32.

IT'S REAL INSIDE STUFF, reading all those figures, but at this stage, realistically, meaningless. The 1988 presidential election is 3½ years off. A major national election occurs first, the congressional run in 1986. And, so many things could happen between now and next week—let alone between now and years from now—that no figures can be taken seriously at this point. Enjoy them, though—there'll be more coming. Like baseball fans, political junkies are stat-happy.

IN CASE YOU MISSED IT, more on the wonderful future of high tech: To escape paying American wages, some U.S. firms send keypunching and other computer work off-shore. In one instance, workers in Barbados now are getting $2.50 an hour doing work for which U.S. workers had been paid $6.50. It's not too many years since similar events occurred in electronics, typewriters, sewing machines and all kinds of other industries once big—but now barely evident—in the U.S.

PROPOSED REAGAN CUTS in aid to state and local governments, if enacted, would cost District of Columbia $128 per citzien; Wyoming $105 per capita; Oregon $97; New York $71; Mississippi $55; New Mexico $64; Alaska $93. Most other states in the $25-$60 range. Figures from study funded by nation's governors, state legislatures.

STOP PUBLIC FUNDING of presidential campaigns? Sounds like a rotten idea, but it would happen under Treasury Department's proposed tax simplification plan. Plan omits from tax form box for taxpayer checkoff of a dollar for presidential campaign fund—a fund from which Ronald Reagan, incidentally, has drawn more than $90 million in three runs for the presidency. Treasury officials claim checkoff complicates tax form and confuses taxpayers. In truth, it's about the only part of tax form that's understandable.

MAYORAL, GUBERNATORIAL contests are the major elections in 1985 apart from any special congressional tests that may arise like last week's vote to fill House seat in Louisiana. Citizens in New Jersey, Virginia elect chief executive, while mayoral races are going on in seven of the nation's 10 biggest cities—Houston, Dallas, San Antonio, New York, Detroit, Los Angeles, Phoenix. Among those seeking re-election, Houston's first woman mayor, Kathy Whitmire; Los Angeles' first black mayor, Tom Bradley, going for a fourth term; San Antonio's first Hispanic mayor, Henry Cisneros.

CATHY LONG avoids runoff in Louisiana 8th District special election to complete term of her late husband Rep. Gillis Long, who died in January. She gets 51.8 percent of vote in five-candidate field. She's second widow of House member to win in Louisiana. Lindy Boggs has represented the 2nd District since her husband Hale died in a plane crash in 1972.

SLASHES REAGAN WANTS in new medical research grants could undermine the fight against a wide range of diseases and "freeze scientific progress in its tracks," according to Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of a House subcommittee on health. Administration demands 25 percent slash in grants. Several health-field spokespersons point out investment in medical research saves money in long run. One, Dr. Thomas Ryan of the Heart Association, claims $1 spent on biomedical research "returns $10 to $16 in reduced illness and medical costs."

Budget slams workers, retirees

ICFTU board meeting

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland welcomes delegates to the semi-annual meeting of the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Meeting in Washington for the first time, the board topped its agenda with a special session on the plight of black trade unionists in South Africa. The Brussels-based ICFTU is made up of 141 labor organizations representing 82 million workers in 98 countries.

Seniors blast betrayal on social security cut

Organizations of older Americans expressed outrage at President Reagan's endorsement of a plan to reduce the social security cost-of-living adjustment and mobilized to block its enactment.

A three-year cutback in COLA payments—the equivalent of a 6 percent benefit cut—was part of the budget agreement the President reached with the Senate's Republican leadership.

At a hastily called Capitol Hill news conference, senior citizen organizations denounced the benefit cutback plan as a breach of Reagan's campaign pledge and an abandonment of a commitment Congress gave to America's workers.

Arthur Flemming, who served in President Eisenhower's Cabinet and now heads the Save Our Security coalition, told reporters: "We are dealing with broken promises. Social security is a compact between the government and the people. When that compact is broken, it undermines confidence in the social security system and in the government itself."

William R. Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, noted that Reagan himself had earlier made the point that the social security system is separately financed through the payroll tax and hasn't contributed to the budget deficit that is the excuse for the attempt to cut benefits.

"Senior citizens around the country are outraged by the President's action," Hutton said. It comes on top of other budget cuts that would force the elderly to spend more for health care, transportation and housing, he noted.

Former Social Security Commissioner Robert Ball said at the news conference that the system's retirement trust fund is projected to show a $100 billion surplus over the next five years and thus already is contributing to deficit reduction.

Presidential word

A half-dozen other senior citizen leaders took part in the news conference, and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), who has championed the cause of older Americans, promised that Congress would insist that Reagan "keep his word."

The AFL-CIO is on record as strongly opposed to any attempt to tamper with social security benefits. Bert Seidman, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said labor is strongly allied with the efforts of the senior citizen organizations in the budget battle.

Initially, the Republican majority of the Senate Budget Committee had endorsed a one-year suspension of the COLA, which would have deprived beneficiaries of an increase of about 4 percent next year.

Under the package worked out with the White House, the COLA for each of the next three years would be held to 2 percent, plus any increase in living costs over 4 percent. Thus the "compromise" under which Reagan dropped his much-publicized opposition to a reduction in social security benefits turned out to be even worse for the elderly than the original GOP plan.

As several speakers at the news conference noted, the move to raid benefit checks comes in a year when the social security system is celebrating its 50th anniversary.

Senate committee revives attack on Davis-Bacon Act

Republicans on the Senate Armed Services Committee launched a new attack on the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires payment of local prevailing wages and benefits to workers employed on federally funded contracts.

The committee's 10-9 party-line vote amended a multi-billion dollar funding authorization bill for the Defense Dept. so as to exempt all military construction from Davis-Bacon requirements. The amendment also would exempt both procurement and construction contracts from the eight-hour workday provisions of two other long-standing labor standards laws.

The Davis-Bacon Act, which dates from 1931, has already been seriously weakened by regulatory changes imposed by the Labor Dept. during President Reagan's first term. But the committee vote showed that open-shop contractors and their political allies haven't abandoned their effort to wipe it off the statute books entirely. Its elimination from military construction contracts would be a big step toward outright repeal.

The same Senate committee tried the

Reagan plan denounced as irresponsible

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan's new budget—the result of weeks of negotiations between the White House and Senate Republican leaders—combines a slash in cost-of-living adjustments for elderly and disabled persons living on social security benefits with a multi-billion dollar after-inflation rise in military spending.

It's "at least as socially and fiscally irresponsible" as the version Reagan sent to Congress in February, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

The new budget also "shortchanges the nation's needs," Oswald stressed, while allowing the deficit to grow almost unchecked as a result of tax changes enacted in 1981 that substantially reduced payments from corporations and the wealthy. The $175 billion deficit projected for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1 is only $5 billion less than the earlier version.

Reagan refused to budge from his insistence that any deficit reduction be achieved through cuts in non-military spending rather than new tax revenue. But he agreed to—and by some accounts actually instigated—a scheme to reduce the social security inflation adjustment in each of the next three years. That would actually add up to a bigger cut than the one-year freeze proposed by the Republicans on the Senate Budget Committee.

Bound to a pledge

The White House initially tried to fudge the issue of Reagan's campaign pledge, insisting that it didn't preclude reducing the amount of the COLA adjustment. But the National Council of Senior Citizens quickly came up with a direct published quote in which Reagan last December acknowledged that he had made such a pledge "and so, therefore, I feel bound by it."

The Senate Republican plan had called for elimination of the social security COLA for one year in order to hold down the deficit. The version the White House advanced as a substitute—cutting next year's COLA approximately in half with comparable further reductions for two more years—would actually cost social security beneficiaries more money.

A projection by the Center on Budget & Policy priorities shows the average social security beneficiary losing $1,667 in cash payments over the next five years and paying an additional $410 in Medicare prem-

Idaho signs for R-T-W fight

Boise, Ida.—Idaho union members have gathered 61,335 signatures—nearly twice the necessary number—calling for a referendum on the recently enacted "right-to-work" law.

State AFL-CIO President Jim Kerns said more than 1,000 union volunteers pounded pavements to collect the signatures in half the time allotted.

The petition drive was organized by United Labor of Idaho, a coalition of all unions in Idaho led by the state federation.

The signatures were certified by the deputy secretary of state, and the referendum question will be placed on the November 1986 ballot. An additional 5,000 signatures were received too late to be included.

The new law was enacted earlier this year when the Republican-controlled legislature overrode a veto by Gov. John Evans (D) to make Idaho the 21st "right-to-work" state. Enforcement of the law remains blocked while the state federation pursues court challenges.

Union label in the spotlight

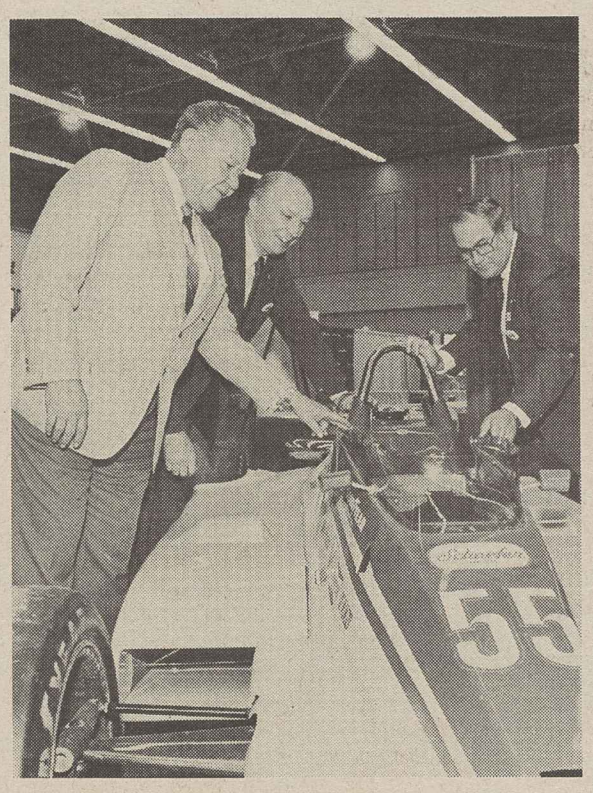
Union labels were everywhere in Milwaukee's Mecca convention center for the 40th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show. Some 300,000 persons passed through the turnstiles during the six-day run.



At times, the display area of the expansive convention hall was wall-to-wall with people who came for a closer look at union-made products and the skills of union workers in the 300 exhibits.

Show-goers didn't walk away empty-handed. More than $100,000 worth of free samples and valuable products were given away by exhibitors.

Record crowds

Milwaukee welcomes Union-Industries show

Milwaukee—Visitors combing the busy aisles of the 40th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show at the Milwaukee Mecca agreed on one point: there were more union-made goods on the market than they had thought. They also learned there were some non-union products as well.

"I learned what is union-made and what is not," said Tom Fronsee of Milwaukee, a member of Steelworkers Local 1302 who is employed at Evinrude. "And I also learned that the cigarette I smoked is not union."

More than 300 exhibits, offered under the labels of some 70 international unions filled the 135,000 square foot Milwaukee convention center, drawing perhaps the largest crowds in the show's history. Jack Lutz of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., the show's director, estimated that nearly 300,000 persons visited the show during its six-day run to promote the goods and services of union workers in the United States.

"I didn't know there were union barbers in town," observed Dan Iverson, president of Local 150 of the Service Employees, after having his hair trimmed at the hair styling exhibit of the Food & Commercial Workers.

Union-made computers

Iverson said he was pleased to learn that he could find union-made computers for his office and that he could order union-made phones as well.

Fronsee and his companion, Glen Schemenauer of Racine, also a member of Steelworkers Local 1302, said they learned the invasion of foreign-made goods is real. To the general public, they said, the threat to American industries and workers posed by imports has been a "well-kept secret." A number of unions distributed material at the show outlining the loss of jobs due to unfair foreign competition.

Beth McMahon of Office Employees Local 9 of Milwaukee said she was struck by the number of union-made goods and services and by the wide choice among them she has when shopping.

When asked what she learned at the show, Barbara Wenzlaff, of Milwaukee, a member of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 122, replied: "Buy union, buy American."

Benefits of cooperation

One purpose of the show, Lutz stressed, is to demonstrate that union-management cooperation can pay off for workers, companies and the public. Both the unions and the companies that participate obviously are pleased with the results, he said, because of the heavy level of participation in the show.

"Our unions are putting their money on the line to participate," he said. And the list of companies reads like a "Who's Who" of American business, and they don't take part in such efforts frivolously, Lutz observed.

At the show's opening luncheon Mar. 29, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue struck a similar theme: "The goods and services bearing the union label at this show are proof of what can be accomplished through collective bargaining and the mutual acceptance, mutual respect and give and take that it engenders."

The show indicated that "given half a chance, the American worker can compete quite effectively with products made elsewhere in the world," Donahue observed. He charged, however, that American workers have their "hands tied" by government trade policies that permit a flood of imports, by tax plans that encourage overseas investment and by lack of an industrial policy.

The 1985 show marked the third time the exhibition has been held in Milwaukee. Earlier shows were held here in 1948 and 1975.

Despite the still lingering economic recession and the loss of more than 70,000 manufacturing jobs in the last five years, Milwaukee is still heavily unionized, a fact made apparent by the number of show visitors wearing jackets with union insignia and the strong pro-union sentiment of the crowds.

Tom Parker, president of the Milwaukee County AFL-CIO, said the Union-Industries Show helped boost the enthusiasm of the area's labor movement. "The show helped to show that Milwaukee is a 'class' city and that unions can put on a 'class' show," he said.

Prize 'hog'

Milwaukee—Among the thousands of gifts and prizes given to visitors at the 1985 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show, nothing was more prized than the Harley-Davidson motorcycle.

The full-sized Harley, the only union-made and American-made motorcycle, was presented as a gift of the Harley-Davidson Motor Co. of Milwaukee and of Allied Industrial Workers Local 209.

The winner was Larry Miller, 23, of Milwaukee, who had been unemployed for the last four months. His name was drawn from a huge box of ticket stubs as several hundred show visitors who gathered around the Harley-Davidson exhibit watched.

The cycle, a 1985 Electra Glide, retails for nearly $9,000, according to Local 209 President Gerald Knackert.

Satellite press briefing

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions field questions from Paris on the U.S. Information Agency's WORLDNET program, a live press conference beamed by satellite around the globe. Vanderveken, who was in Washington for the ICFTU executive board meeting, joined Kirkland in responding to questions from reporters in Brussels, Geneva, Dusseldorf, Madrid, London and Paris.

Council backs new boycotts of Armour Food, paper firms

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has endorsed consumer boycotts initiated by the Paperworkers against the Fort Howard Paper Co. and Holiday Cups and by the Food & Commercial Workers against Armour Food Co.

In backing the boycott against Fort Howard Paper Co., the council urged federation affiliates and their members not to buy the nationally marketed products of the Green Bay, Wis., firm.

The paper products to be boycotted include Dolly Madison tissue, Pom-etts tissues, Edon tissues, Antique towels, and Mardi Gras, Page and Sof-Knit tissues, napkins, and household wipes.

The Paperworkers have been thwarted by the "vicious anti-union methods" of the company that has prevented the workers from organizing at Fort Howard Paper mills in Green Bay and Muskogee, Okla.

Wholly non-union

The UPIU executive board initiated the boycott in February 1985, noting in a resolution that the firm has become the "only major completely non-union producer of paper products in the United States."

In the boycott against Holiday Cups, the UPIU board charged that the firm is trying to destroy the union by refusing to agree to a decent contract for its workers at the Menomonee Falls, Wis., plant.

When the previous contract with members of UPIU Local 200 expired last August, the company implemented its last offer which the workers had rejected.

The company drastically cut wages, reduced health insurance coverage, eliminated some holiday benefits, ended seniority and refused to check off union dues.

The Paperworkers had to initiate a boycott in 1981 to get the contract that expired last August and to get striking workers rehired.

Drinking cups

The only product produced by the company is drinking cups under the label Holiday Cups. They are widely used in soft drink vending machines. Union members are urged to check vending machines and request that Holiday Cups be replaced with union-made cups.

The UPIU noted that the Holiday Cups brand was bought by Imperial Cup Co. in January 1985. Local 200 members have been working without a contract. Holiday Cups are also made at the firm's non-union plant in Anaheim, Calif.

The UFCW boycott against Armour Food Co., a subsidiary of ConAgra, Inc., centers on the buyout of the firm in 1983 and the firing of some 2,400 UFCW members.

Armour was sold by Greyhound to ConAgra, which said it would consider a "stock buyout" of the firm meaning that it would keep the current workforce, recognize the union and the contract.

But ConAgra demanded that the union agreement be altered. Its contract-gutting proposals would have slashed wages from $10.69 per hour to $8, reduced premium pay, altered vacations and health insurance coverage among other proposals. The membership overwhelmingly rejected these management demands, and ConAgra implemented an "asset buyout" instead, voiding the contract and leaving 2,400 UFCW members without jobs. ConAgra reopened with a new workforce earning only $6 per hour.

Comprehensive plan

The UFCW executive committee initiated the boycott as part of a planned, comprehensive campaign aimed at encouraging Armour to "compete with other pork packing companies on the basis of product quality and efficiency, and not on the basis of which company can pay the least to its workers," UFCW President William H. Wynn said.

The National Labor Relations Board is investigating unfair labor practice charges filed against the firm.

Among the Armour products being boycotted are Star bacon, Spam, Vienna Sausage, chili and beans, beef franks, pepperoni, potted meat, canned ham and several kinds of salami and baloney.

Jobless rate stalled at 7.3 percent

Civilian unemployment remained stuck at 7.3 percent of the workforce in March despite a sharp rise in the number of people with jobs, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Officially there were 8.4-million jobless workers last month, but if involuntary part-time workers and discouraged workers were factored into the count, the total would have been 12.5 million and the jobless rate 10.7 percent, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research said. BLS does not count these groups of workers as unemployed.

An estimated 5.4 million Americans held part-time jobs because they could not find full-time employment last month, a rise of 330,000 from the February level. Meanwhile, the number of discouraged workers —those who said they want work but did not look for jobs because they thought they couldn't find any—remained unchanged in the first quarter of this year at 1.3 million.

Unemployment has been at about the same rate now for the past 11 months, a historically high plateau.

On the employment side, the number of people holding jobs in March swelled by 430,000 to 107.1 million. Large employment gains were reported in service, retail, and construction industries which are not heavily affected by international competition. But factory employment remained sluggish.

No growth

Manufacturing industries, which have been hard hit by imports, employed 19.7 million Americans in March. There has been essentially no growth in manufacturing employment since last August.

Analysts in and out of government have expressed concern over how long the economy can grow without some pickup in factory output.

BLS Commissioner Janet Norwood, testifying on the March jobs report before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, noted that four industries—steel, textiles, petroleum, and leather—have continued to lose jobs even during the fragile recovery. And auto employment has declined in the past two months.

Most of last month's growth in jobs benefited women, continuing the trend of the past year. In the 12 months ended in March, the number of employed persons rose by 3 million, with adult women accounting for 56 percent of the expansion, adult men 36 percent, and teenagers the remaining 8 percent.

Nonfarm payroll employment, based on a survey of 200,000 firms employing a total of more than 35 million workers, rose by 381,000 in March to 96.5 million. Goods-producing establishments accounted for 100,000 jobs while services and retail trade accounted for 281,000.

Construction employment rose by 130,000 to a record 4.6 million as weather in most parts of the country generally improved.

Expanding opportunities

Housing Investment Trust board of trustees adopted plans to expand investment opportunities for AFL-CIO affiliates and pension programs. Addressing trustees is HIT Chairman Floyd Hyde. HIT was established in 1983 as a vehicle for unions to invest pension funds in programs that provide union jobs in housing construction.

URW selects Goodyear as pattern setter

Columbus, Ohio — The Rubber Workers, continuing a tradition of picking a pattern setter in contract talks with the Big Four tire producers, selected Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. as the firm it will try to reach a settlement with first in the current bargaining round.

The decision was reached at an Apr. 9 meeting of the URW's 15-member advisory committee here. The panel includes the union's three top officers and representatives of members at each of the four companies — Goodyear, B.F. Goodrich, Uniroyal, and Firestone Tire & Rubber.

Bargaining is currently under way with all four companies. Three-year agreements covering about 36,000 URW members at those firms expire on Apr. 20.

16,000 workers

Goodyear, the industry's largest producer, employs about 16,000 workers. The last time the union selected Goodyear as the pattern setter was in 1973.

Once an agreement is reached with the pattern setter, its terms serve as a model for talks with the other three companies. The Big Four master contracts subsequently set the pattern for agreements with smaller tire companies.

While Firestone announced earlier this year that it does not intend to submit to pattern bargaining in the current round of talks, URW President Milan Stone said he expects the company to follow the pattern once it is set.

The union's general goals in the negotiations call for a substantial wage increase, maintenance of the current cost-of-living adjustment provision, and pension improvements.

Uniroyal and Goodrich have already reached accord with the union on the issue of health care, usually one of the tougher issues in the negotiations.

The parties agreed to a review approach to health care that requires a second opinion for non-emergency surgery and makes other efforts to limit health care costs.

13-union coalition prepares for GE, Westinghouse talks

A coalition of 13 unions will open contract talks with the General Electric Co. next month with the goal of expanding job security provisions and pension improvements won in the last round of GE bargaining.

Three years ago, the unions anticipated impending job losses and negotiated a job security package that included six months' notice of plant shutdowns, 60 days' notice of the installation of robots or the introduction of new technology, education and retraining assistance for displaced workers, and improved severance and layoff benefits.

In the negotiations set to begin in New York May 14, the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE-Westinghouse Unions will seek to widen those protections, Committee Chairman William H. Bywater said.

Bywater, who is president of the Electronic Workers, the union which represents the greatest number of workers at the two companies, said GE and Westinghouse should give more than six months' notice of plant shutdowns so that the unions will have enough time to bargain over the decision and arrange for training and transfers.

Contracts running out

The union coalition will negotiate for new contracts covering about 80,000 GE workers which are due to expire on June 30. Negotiations on behalf of 34,300 Westinghouse employees, whose contracts run out July 21, will open in Pittsburgh June 4.

The number of union-represented employees is down sharply from the level three years ago when the coalition bargained for 100,000 workers at GE and 41,500 employees at Westinghouse. Since then, Westinghouse has sold its lamp and lighting division and is now completely out of the consumer products market. GE also has closed its lamp plants, and there is only one big GE consumer appliance plant—in Louisville—covered by a union contract.

Wage demands

Without specifying the figures, Bywater said the unions will ask for a percentage wage increase with a minimum cents-per-hour raise and an improvement in the COLA formula.

Hourly pay now averages about $10.75 at GE and $11 at Westinghouse.

The job security goals of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee include a guarantee of training with pay for all workers faced with layoff.

Ending employee contributions toward pensions also will be an issue in the talks, Bywater indicated. In the past, pensions were contributory at GE and noncontributory at Westinghouse. After a strike in 1979, however, the unions accepted a contributory plan at Westinghouse. The goal continues to be elimination of all employee contributions.

The IUE represents some 47,300 workers at GE and 5,200 at Westinghouse. Other unions represented on the CBC are the Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Technical Engineers, Firemen & Oilers, Sheet Metal Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Steelworkers, Flint Glass Workers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters and United Electrical Workers.

Coors? Never

Louisville, Ky. — Artificial heart recipient William Schroeder, a retired member of Government Employees Local 1415, did want to toast his successful operation, but he never would have picked a non-union beer like Coors.

News wire photos circulated around the world showed Schroeder holding a can of the Coors brew, target of an AFL-CIO boycott.

Schroeder's surgeon, Dr. William C. DeVries, took responsibility for the mishap and said Schroeder was deeply upset by the incident.

Schroeder was an active AFGE member throughout his quarter century of federal service, serving as an officer and chief negotiator for his local union, at the Crane, Ind., Ammunition Depot.

Opposition mounting in ITU to Teamsters merger plan

Colorado Springs, Colo.—A majority of the Typographical Union executive council will be urging the union's membership to vote "no" in a July referendum on a proposal to merge with the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The referendum, which will be by mail with the ballots sent from the ITU headquarters here on July 8, was approved by the executive council. The procedural details are still being developed.

ITU President Robert S. McMichen said in a statement that a majority of the council "and I believe an overwhelming majority of the membership believes the Teamsters deal is a nightmare that would destroy our union." But in the ITU's democratic tradition, the question should be put to the members "to decide the ITU's future by secret ballot," he said.

The ITU/Teamster merger document was negotiated by former ITU President Joe Bingel after he was defeated in a re-election bid.

The decision to allow a referendum vote comes on the heels of a failed merger effort that would have united the ITU with the Graphic Communications Union, an AFL-CIO affiliate. A merger document had been approved and a joint referendum date set for voting on the ITU/GCIU merger. The GCIU General Board, however, voted not to proceed with merger.

Segments of the ITU membership have favored merging with the Teamsters under a plan whereby the ITU would become a division of that union. In announcing the referendum, McMichen pointed out that the union is not required by either federal or ITU law to put the merger question before the membership. The ITU officers decided to do so "to get the issue off the table and put an end to this sordid chapter" in ITU history, McMichen said. "Some of our members want a chance to vote on the Teamster deal—many just to knock it down," he added.

The effort to combine the ITU with the Teamsters began in August 1983 with the bid by Teamsters President Jackie Presser to the ITU convention delegates, who were then ready to vote on merging with the Newspaper Guild. That Guild merger was voted down and Bingel and other officers began working toward merger with the Teamsters.

Health plan deductibles on the rise

Many workers covered by major medical plans had to pay higher deductibles last year, although employers typically paid the full premium cost of coverage, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

A BLS survey of employee benefits in medium and large firms found that 21 percent of the employees with medical coverage last year had to pay the first $150 or more of expenses before reimbursement under the insurance plan. This compared with 7 percent in 1982.

Deductibles of $100 remained the most common in 1984, applying to nearly half of all plan participants, BLS said.

The percent of health plan participants required to pay both an initial deductible and a percentage of subsequent hospital room charges rose from 19 percent in 1983 to 28 percent last year. Another 5 percent paid only a deductible for each hospital admission.

The BLS survey found that more workers were protected against extraordinary expenses resulting from catastrophic illness or injury last year.

The percent of participants having major medical plans that limit employees' annual payouts for covered expenses—usually $1,000 or less—grew to 75 percent last year, up from 63 percent in 1982.

Increased limits

BLS said that maximum payments from major medical plans were increased in 1984. The percent of participants who could receive unlimited benefits or lifetime maximums of $1 million or more increased to 37 percent, up from 30 percent in 1983 and 26 percent in 1982.

The survey is the bureau's sixth annual study, and provides representative data for 21 million full-time employees in private industries.

Some other highlights of the report:

Paid time off. The number of paid holidays averaged 9.8 days. Vacations, which typically varied by length of service, averaged 8.6 days after a year's service, 15.6 days after 10 years, and 20.5 days after 20 years. Paid rest periods or lunch breaks averaged 26 minutes a day.

Insurance. Ninety-four percent of the workers covered by the survey had income protection against short-term disabilities. Coverage for treatment in extended care facilities rose from 58 percent of plan participants in 1983 to 62 percent in 1984. The percent of health plan participants covered for alcoholism treatment rose from 53 to 61 percent between 1983 and 1984 and for drug abuse treatment, from 43 to 52 percent.

Pension plans. Eighty-two percent of the workers were covered by private pension plans last year. Sixty-three percent of all pension plan participants could retire with full benefits before age 65, virtually the same percentage as in 1983.

Corporate loopholes hit

Grassroots campaign pushes fair-share tax

A grassroots campaign to get corporations to pay a fair share of taxes has the labor movement's "strong and solid support," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

The campaign was launched by more than 30 public interest groups, unions and other community-based organizations that are seeking more than a million signatures on petitions intended to send a message of tax fairness to Congress and the Administration.

It gets under way in 40 cities across the country on Apr. 15, the day that federal income tax returns are due.

The petitions, from Citizens Organized to Restore an Effective Corporate Tax, call on Congress to repeal "special interest loopholes" and restore the corporate tax as a major source of revenue.

"We pay our fair share of taxes and more," the signers of the petition affirm. "It's time for our largest and most profitable corporations to pay their fair share, too."

State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee, whose union is taking a major role in the effort, told a news conference that corporate tax loopholes have more than doubled since 1980 and now cost the government more than $90 billion a year in lost revenue.

That's more than the total cost of all low-income assistance programs, he noted. If corporations had paid taxes last year at the same rate as in the 1960s, McEntee said, the federal deficit would have been cut in half.

Central post offices will be the focus of the Apr. 15 start of the petition drive. Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto said NALC members will be helping to circulate petitions among taxpayers "making a mad dash to meet the midnight deadline" for returns.

It's time to end the "legal larceny" of corporate tax avoidance, Sombrotto insisted.

'Mad as hell'

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney told the news conference that "working Americans get mad as hell when they hear that a corporate giant like General Electric pays no taxes."

Washington Teachers Union President William H. Simons and other participants noted the irony of the fact that W. R. Grace & Co. pays no taxes while the head of the firm campaigns for cutbacks in government as a means of reducing the federal deficit.

Faith Evans, an official of the United Church of Christ, said at the start of the news conference that the coalition affiliates differed in a number of areas but were in full agreement on the need for tax reform and a campaign carried out by local counterparts of the national coalition.

Leaders of the Public Citizen and Citizen Action organizations were among those making statements and responding to questions from reporters. Other groups participating in the news conference included Citizens for Tax Justice, Acorn, Environmental Action and the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.

Corporate taxes represented about one-fourth of all federal revenues in the 1950s and 1960s, but had shrunk to only 6.2 percent by 1983 as loophole after loophole weakened the tax structure.

Kirkland's statement on the launching of the petition drive stressed that the decline of the corporate income tax has shifted tax burdens to working Americans and is "a major factor in the huge and growing federal deficits."

He termed restoration of an effective corporate income tax essential to fairness and economic progress.

The amount of tax revenue escaping through corporate loopholes "has ballooned from $8 billion in 1970 to $90 billion today," Kirkland said. That fact, he said, is "conveniently ignored by those who would solve the nation's budget problems through destroying social programs and taxing workers' health benefits, life insurance and other protections."

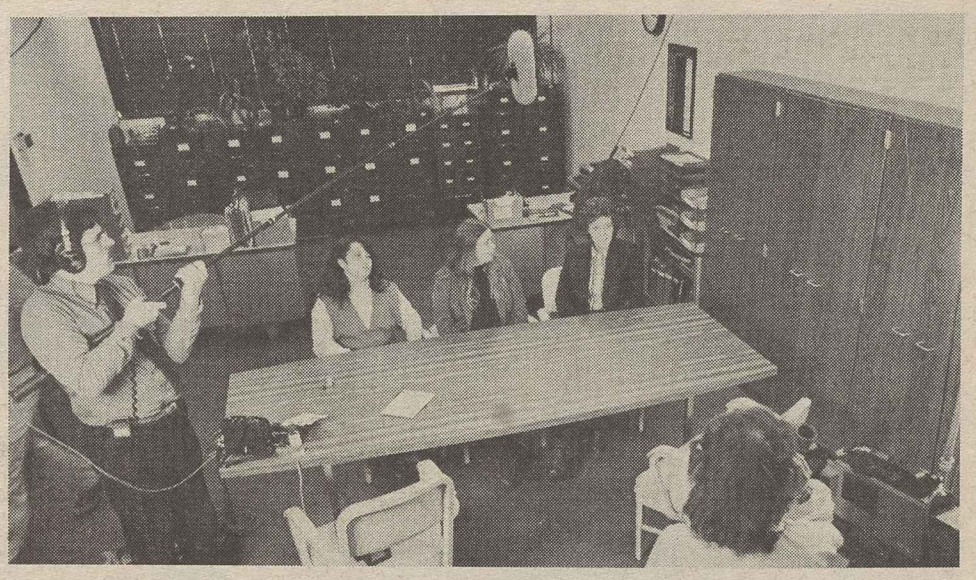
A recent study by Citizens for Tax Justice identified 128 corporations that paid no taxes on earnings totaling $57 billion.

Campaign to close corporate tax loopholes is backed by Presidents John J. Sweeney of Service Employees, Gerald W. McEntee of State, County & Municipal Employees, and Vincent R. Sombrotto of Letter Carriers.

Textile, apparel imports termed 'out of control'

The American textile and apparel industry and its workers "face a crisis as they never have before" from imports that have grown "completely out of control," compounded by the unwillingness of the Reagan Administration to enforce existing trade laws, the Clothing & Textile Workers testified at a House hearing.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley said Administration inaction caused a loss of 200,000 textile and apparel jobs since 1981. Thirteen percent of the nation's record $123 billion trade deficit last year was from textiles and apparels.



Finley told the House Ways & Means Subcommittee on Trade that the Multifiber Arrangement hasn't been effective. As it was renegotiated in 1981, the MFA would have allowed an annual growth rate of 6 percent for most exporting countries. But the imports have doubled since 1980, averaging an annual growth rate of 19 percent, Finley explained in urging support for a new enforcement bill that is cosponsored by nearly a third of the House and Senate. Finley termed the proposal "a rational and thoughtful approach to orderly trade in textiles.

Unfair trade

The textile and apparel industries are also bothered by the impact of foreign government subsidies, dumping, targeting and counter-trade arrangements, Finley testified. As an example, he cited the Commerce Dept.'s preliminary findings on countervailing duty petitions filed by ACTWU, that there were at least 34 separate programs in 11 countries "which were believed to confer subsidies on textile mill and apparel products."

The Commerce Dept.'s final rulings, however, were "profoundly disappointing," Finley said. In cases where duties were imposed, "they were unbelievably low."

Finley stressed that the United States has "the most modern, technologically advanced and productive textile/apparel industry in the world today." But he warned that the Administration's willingness to let imports grow at rates such as a 32 percent increase in 1984 could cause U.S. manufacturers to choose not to modernize further in this unstable and uncertain industry.

For pay equity

Members of the State, County & Municipal Employees—Sue Narikawa, Jill Tardy and Claudia Furlong—go on the air with "A Matter of Fairness." The program, produced by AFSCME for public service television, answers some of the questions and misconceptions on pay equity. The TV tape features former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, Minnesota Personnel Commissioner Nina Rothschild and actress Betty Thomas of "Hill Street Blues," a strong advocate of pay equity.

Union delegation explores causes of Bhopal disaster

Bhopal, India—An international trade union delegation investigating how to prevent large-scale chemical tragedies reviewed the causes of the Dec. 3, 1984, accident at the Union Carbide plant here that killed more than 2,000 people and injured tens of thousands more.

The week-long mission was sponsored by the International Chemical, Energy & General Workers Federation (ICEF) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

The delegation's visit followed separate calls by both the ICEF and the ICFTU for strengthened standards on the prevention and control of such accidents in plants where hazardous chemicals are used and stored.

U.S. delegates

Among the seven-member delegation were two representatives of U.S. labor—Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, and Michael Wright, director of the Steelworkers' health and safety department.

"We learned first hand the enormity of the problems and that it could have been prevented," Seminario said. "We found out that the people had little information about what was being produced across the street from where they live and little information about the hazards. There were no evacuation plans. These conditions, however, are not unique to India—this could happen anywhere."

Seminario said the accident in Bhopal strongly reinforces the case being made by unions and communities across America for strong "right-to-know" laws governing hazardous materials. The delegates will be making recommendations to the ICEF and ICFTU next month on steps that can be taken to prevent such tragedies.

The Bhopal accident resulted from a leak of methyl isocyanate (MIC) from an underground storage tank. While Union Carbide is readying its MIC production facility in Institute, W.Va., to begin producing the pesticide ingredient, the Indian government has filed suit against the firm in U.S. District Court in Manhattan on behalf of its citizens affected by the chemical spill.

The trade union delegation met for two days in New Delhi with representatives of the Indian labor movement, government officials and civil servants from the Labor Ministry to gain an understanding of the functioning and responsibilities of the unions and government in relation to the accident at Union Carbide.

Three more days were spent in Bhopal touring the affected areas and meeting with medical authorities, Union Carbide workers and their union representatives.

Steelworkers get three-year pact at Kaiser Aluminum

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers ratified a new three-year agreement with Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., that exchanges pay and benefit cuts for preferred stock in the company.

The contract, reached 14 months before the previous settlement was to have expired, covers 6,300 workers at 12 Kaiser plants across the country. The early agreement, which is aimed at helping the company recover from a string of losses in the early 1980s, removes the firm from the aluminum industry pattern.

Under the new contract, ratified by 58.5 percent of those voting, total compensation costs are reduced by about $4.50 an hour from the previous level of $26.50. About 80 percent of the concessions will be returned to employees in the form of stock under a plan modeled after one accepted by the union at Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp.

The company estimated that the reductions will save it $50 million a year and that comparable sacrifices by salaried employees will save another $24 million.

Wages will be reduced $2.19 an hour under the pact, and future cost-of-living adjustments will be paid at the rate of 1 cent for each rise of three-tenths of a point in the consumer price index instead of the old rate of 1 cent for each .26-point rise in the CPI. As with base pay, the COLA payments will be diverted to stock.

Other reductions were made in the area of holidays and vacations and insurance coverage.

Focus on fiscal affairs

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue tells the 1985 Secretary-Treasurers Conference in Milwaukee how union fiscal operations may change as labor works to meet the changes in the nation's workforce. The two-day meeting covered tax changes, postal rates, pensions, advertising, car leasing and audits. Seated from left are Boilermakers Sec.-Treas. Charles F. Moran, vice chairman of the conference, Steelworkers Treas. Frank S. McKee, conference chairman, and James Kennedy, executive assistant to Donahue.

Senate panel revives attack on Davis-Bacon protections

same tactic in 1981, when the Republicans first took control of the Senate.

Then, too, the committee moved to exempt military construction from Davis-Bacon requirements. But the late Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) took the battle to the Senate floor and won.

Jackson, with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) as chief co-sponsor, introduced an amendment to restore Davis-Bacon coverage to the bill and it carried on a 55-42 vote. Sixteen Republicans voted with 39 Democrats to keep prevailing wage protection, while seven Democrats sided with 35 Republicans.

Kennedy argued strongly in support of labor standards protections within the Armed Services committee in this year's battle and presumably will be taking the same role in the anticipated Senate floor fight later this spring.

Priority items

Budget issues will get the lion's share of congressional attention when Congress resumes on Apr. 15, with the Senate expected to act first on a budget resolution.

Still hanging over Congress is the unfinished business of dealing with the staggering U.S. trade deficit, especially the imbalance in trade with Japan.

Japanese government officials have promised to ease the way for a greater flow of U.S. goods into Japan's home market, but nothing that has been seriously mentioned along these lines is likely to make much of a dent. Meanwhile, an increased flow of Japanese autos has jeopardized additional 90,000 U.S. manufacturing jobs.

The phaseout of the Federal Supplemental Compensation program for the long-term unemployed, which Congress approved just before the recess, has been signed into law by Reagan.

It assures that persons entitled to benefits in the first week of April will be able to complete their entitlement period of up to 14 weeks. But no additional persons will be added to the benefit rolls under the legislation.

Also on the unfinished business agenda of the House is a decision on whether Democrat Frank McCloskey or Republican Richard D. McIntyre should be seated as the elected representative of Indiana's 8th Congressional District. McCloskey held the seat in the last Congress, and with several ballot disputes still to be resolved a recount shows a virtual dead beat.

Victor Lusinchi dies, covered ILO for News

Geneva—Victor Lusinchi, a special correspondent who had covered the International Labor Organization for the AFL-CIO News since 1958, died Apr. 3 while on a trip to southern France. He was 73.

His death was attributed to complications stemming from emphysema, from which he suffered for years.

Lusinchi provided coverage for the AFL-CIO News on the regular sessions of the ILO and its Governing Body as well as special ILO conferences that the United Nations agency conducted. A native of San Francisco, Lusinchi worked for the Exchange Telegraph, a British news agency, from 1934 to 1956 except during the 1940s when he served in the U.S. armed forces. He also worked for the New York Times as a part-time correspondent since the late 1950s and was a free-lance reporter for a number of other publications.

Survivors include his wife Paulette and a son.

Needs shortchanged

Reagan's new budget called 'irresponsible'

iums due to cuts in other budget proposals.

The new version of the Administration budget closely follows the blueprint of Reagan's earlier proposals for killing off or drastically curtailing federal programs.

It would end mass transit operating subsidies, thus compelling higher fares for millions of Americans dependent on public transportation.

In the face of a recovery that has bypassed large segments of America, it would kill off the Economic Development Administration and the Appalachian Regional Commission.

The Job Corps, despite its broad-based support, would be abolished as too costly. So would Urban Development Action Grants, a key to making inner cities more liveable.

Revenue-sharing would be ended, putting added strains on local and state governments. AMTRAK passenger service would be shrunk or abolished with the ending of federal subsidies. Postal rates for most non-profit organizations would be forced up, and low- and moderate-income housing assistance would be substantially reduced.

Farmers, students

Despite the wave of farm foreclosures, agriculture aid would be cut back although not to the extent Reagan earlier proposed. The reduction in college student aid—by $2.6 billion over the next three years—is based on a different formula than the Administration earlier proposed. But higher education groups don't consider the new version much of an improvement.

Some of the shifts in the Administration budget were of the frying-pan-to-the-fire variety.

Under present law, federal workers are due for a comparability pay increase to keep pace with the private sector, although in recent years only a fraction of the amount due has been granted.

Reagan's February budget proposed a 5 percent pay cut for government workers. The Senate Budget Committee balked at this, and the White House settled for a pay freeze in the new version of the budget. But it coupled this with plans for elimination of 80,000 federal jobs—in dollar terms, the equivalent of a 4 percent payroll cut.

Initial version

The White House describes the national defense category of the budget as a cut, since the increase is less than the amount Reagan proposed in February.

The version initially adopted by the Senate Budget Committee was described as a "freeze" even though it actually provided for a 4 percent increase in spending to offset anticipated inflation.

The latest version is described as a 3 percent rise in "real" terms, since that is the increase above the inflation factor.

Adding to the complexity, authorization, appropriations and outlays are all elements of the budget and affect future spending obligations. Thus, the Administration budget projects a similar 3 percent after-inflation rise for fiscal years 1987 and 1988 as well.

In outlays for each fiscal year—the money actually paid by the Treasury—the current fiscal year's expenditures for defense are estimated at $252 billion. The new budget would raise this to $276.1 billion, an increase of $24.1 billion. The military spending estimate for future years is $298.4 billion for fiscal 1987 and $321.4 billion the following year.

During that same period, the funding for education and social services programs would shrink from $30.3 billion this year to $28.8 billion in fiscal 1988.

Built on sand

The agreement between Reagan and the Senate GOP leadership does not assure that the Republicans' 53-47 majority in the Senate will hold intact on budget issues or enlist Democratic support.

In the House, where Democrats hold a 252-182 majority, the Budget Committee and the party leadership almost certainly will come up with a version less costly on the military side and more adequate in the domestic area than the Administration plan.

The test then will be whether Reagan is able to repeat his successful tactic of 1981, when in the flush of his first-term election victory he was able to split off enough "boll weevil" Democrats to form a coalition majority with House Republicans.

Unions map ad campaigns to support federal service

Two federal-sector unions are buying radio and television time to fight back against Reagan Administration attempts to belittle government-sector workers and downgrade their worth.

Radio spots in nine cities have been scheduled by the Government Employees, and a television campaign in 17 major markets will be launched next month by the Postal Workers.

The thrust of both campaigns is that the American people are getting full value and more from a hard-working public service.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said the Administration's latest anti-worker ploy—announcing plans to abolish 80,000 federal jobs because Congress has been unwilling to go along with a budget calling for a 5 percent pay slash—illustrates the White House attitude.

This isn't the first time that government workers have been portrayed as faceless and overpaid bureaucrats, he said. "But never has an Administration attacked its workers the way this Administration has."

The ad campaign, showing federal employees as "dedicated Americans keeping our country strong," will emphasize the diversity of jobs and services government workers perform, Blaylock said.

They will be shown as "the people who inspect the food we eat, get the social security checks out and keep the border safe," Blaylock said.

The Postal Workers' television theme, to be announced in greater detail later, is that "hard working public employees should not be taken for granted," the union said.

The AFGE blames Office of Personnel Management Director Donald J. Devine for much of the Administration's downgrading of the career civil service, and has strongly opposed Devine's confirmation to a new four-year term. The nomination remains stalled in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee after hearings that found just about every union and association of federal and postal workers opposed to his reappointment.

Blaylock said the AFGE's counter-offensive will air initially in Boston, Oklahoma City, St. Louis, San Antonio, San Francisco, Seattle and Washington.

Its theme will be that government workers are neighbors who live in communities, work, vote and pay taxes.

"We believe that a greater awareness of what federal workers actually do will help limit the political grandstanding of people like Devine and result in more effective service to the public," Blaylock said.

Louisiana House seat won by Cathy Long

Cathy Long won a special election in Louisiana's 8th Congressional District to fill out the term of her late husband, Democrat Gillis Long.

By taking nearly 52 percent of the vote in a five-way contest, she was able to avoid a runoff. The district stretches through the center of the state, from the outskirts of New Orleans to Alexandria.

The late Gillis Long had a generally progressive record in the House and Mrs. Long said funding of programs to deal with toxic wastes will be her special concern in Congress.

Service Contract Act's rules changes upheld

A federal appeals court has upheld the Labor Dept.'s revised regulations that organized labor says undercut the Service Contract Act's guarantee of locally prevailing wages for workers employed by firms performing services for the federal government.

The regulations, imposed in 1983, weaken "successorship" rules that kept firms from cut-throat wage competition to win federal contracts. They exempt entirely from the law's coverage various "high-tech" maintenance and service contracts.

They were challenged by the AFL-CIO and the Building & Construction Trades Dept., in a suit joined by the Carpenters, Electrical Workers, Machinists, Laborers, Seafarers, Service Employees and Transport Workers.

The decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia let stand seven of the eight challenged rules. But the court struck down a regulation change that would have exempted most contracts performed outside the United States.

Raising the Plateau

FOR 11 MONTHS now, the nation's unemployment rate has hovered in the 7 percent range, and obviously the rebound from a devastating recession has lost its spring.

If this is to be the plateau of unemployment until the next recession cycle, it is clearly much too high. This nation's economy is already badly eroded by a pattern of increasingly severe recessions followed by increasingly weaker recoveries.

Five years ago, the rise of the jobless rate to 6.2 percent rated a banner headline in the AFL-CIO News as a foreshadow of recession—and properly so. For 17 months, the plateau of unemployment had been a narrow 5.7 to 5.9 percent range.

Not many years before then, a 5.7 percent rate would have been viewed with serious concern. Now President Reagan sees in 7 percent unemployment a picture of prosperity.

THE RATCHETING UP after each recession of the level of joblessness that is considered normal is a dangerous self-delusion. By denying the problem, it defers the effort to find a solution.

We know where the lost jobs have gone. The trade deficit, to which Congress is belatedly awakening, tells us.

There are measures, even at this late stage, that can retain and expand the goods-producing sector of our economy.

There is still a vast unmet need for salvaging the nation's deteriorating infrastructure and providing affordable housing, not just for the poor but for young working families as well. And as ever-higher unemployment increases the need for public services, the ability of communities to provide them diminishes.

These are the problems our generation lives with. But if they are not recognized, they will not be solved.

A Fair Share

THE CAMPAIGN to get America's corporations to shoulder a fair share of the nation's tax burden deserves the cheers—and the active cooperation—of all of us.

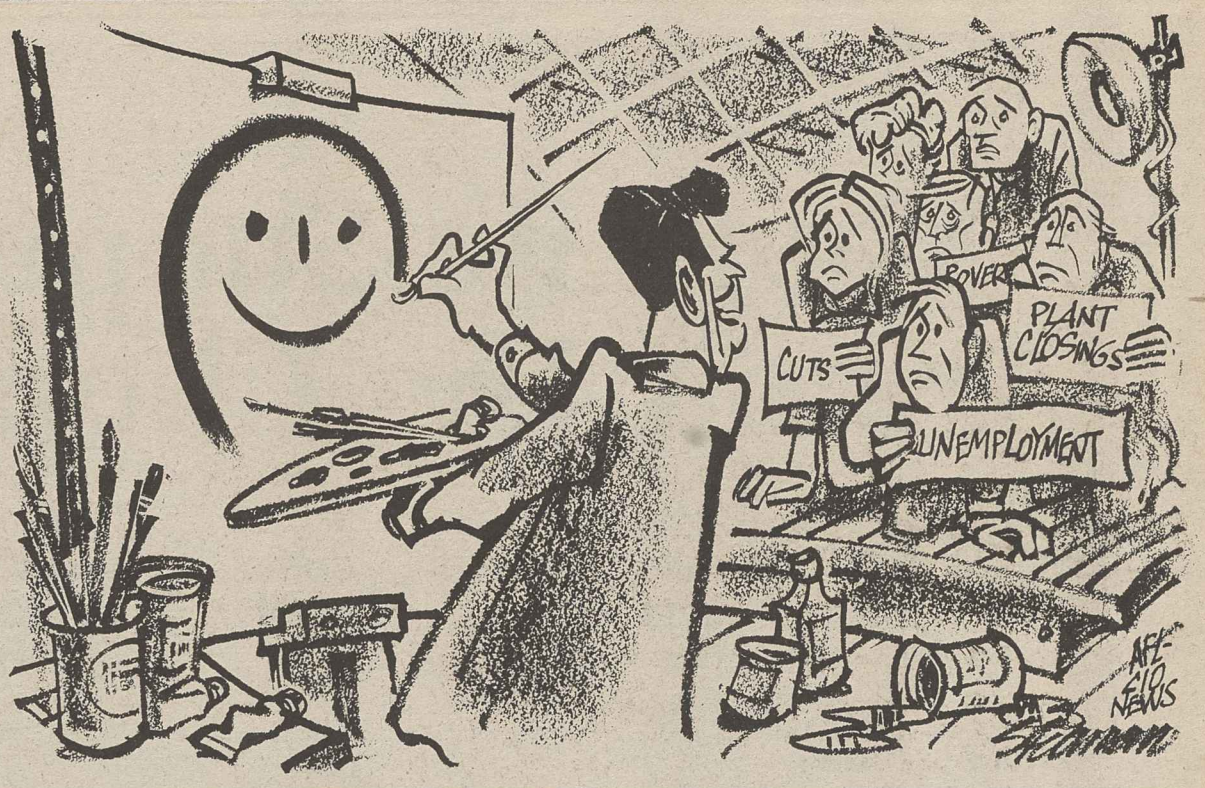
It represents the most realistic hope for the easing of a budget and deficit squeeze that confronts even the best-intentioned members of Congress with exceedingly difficult choices.

The cooperating organizations, including many of the AFL-CIO's unions and the federation's Public Employee Dept., wisely chose Apr. 15—the deadline for income tax returns—to launch a nationwide petition campaign.

Ordinary Americans, turning in tax returns representing a good-sized bite out of their paychecks, find it difficult to understand why billions of dollars in corporate profits remain untaxed.

Without a fair-share corporate tax, there is no light at the end of the deficit tunnel.

Certainly, the answer is not in a Reagan Administration budget that would sacrifice domestic needs and steal money from the pension checks of the elderly and disabled in order to finance further increases in a $252 billion military budget.



BUT EVEN sensible restraint on the growth of the defense establishment will not free vast sums for other needs and hold budget deficits to manageable proportions. Congress cannot and certainly should not neglect its constitutional obligation to provide for the nation's defense as well as its general welfare.

Corporate tax reform is a big part of the answer.

The people who hurry to get their returns in the mail before the income tax deadline are those whose kids are threatened by loss of school loans, whose parents are threatened by Medicare costs and lower retirement checks, whose jobs are endangered by a deteriorating economy.

Their message, in the words of the petition that union members and community groups are helping to circulate, is a simple one:

"We, the undersigned taxpayers, pay our fair share of taxes and more. It's time for our largest and most profitable corporations to pay their fair share, too."

Reagan budget shuts door on vital public statistics

By Press Associates, Inc.

In this age of instant worldwide communications, it may come as a shock that the United States has been falling into a dangerous information gap.

Ever since the Reagan Administration came into office in 1981, it has been trimming, slashing and eliminating vital government reporting and information programs.

These programs, in which "dry statistics" are collected and disseminated, may not seem important at first glance. They may even conjure up the image of a paper-shuffling bureaucrat.

That image, however mistaken, fits comfortably into the anti-government mythology of Reagan, whose budget and staff cuts in statistical reporting programs pose a threat to the nation's economy and public welfare, according to business, labor and congressional experts.

Because of those cuts, there is less reliable information about the labor market, the direction of the economy, population trends, the gross national product, consumer and wholesale prices, the housing stock, health and nutrition, nursing homes, and energy consumption, according to a House Government Operations Committee report.

Program cuts

The Administration's reduction or elimination of at least 50 major statistical programs has "raised serious questions over the future of the federal statistical system," said the report, which was approved unanimously by the committee's Democratic and Republican members.

Cutbacks in the Dept. of Labor have meant that less and less is known about trends in the nation's labor force, including employment, wages, family budgets, collective bargaining agreements, and strikes. The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics, which recently celebrated its 100th anniversary, has been forced to scale back or reduce the accuracy of some dozen important reports, including surveys of unemployment statistics for localities, the Occupational Outlook Handbook, wage reports on various industries, and the work stoppage survey.

Further, the BLS has scrapped more than a half-dozen reports entirely, including factory hirings and layoffs, analysis of union contracts, a directory of unions, a report on workers holding more than one job, hypothetical budgets for a retired couple and an urban family of four, and a survey of the skills and numbers of workers needed to build schools, hospitals and housing across the nation.

Currently, the Administration wants to drop a planned national survey of dislocated workers.

Effect on labor

AFL-CIO economist Markley Roberts, who chairs the Labor Research Advisory Council to the BLS, said "the cuts have had a negative effect on union bargainers. We know less about industries and wage patterns, area employment and unemployment, pension and health plans."

Business and government decision-makers at the federal, state and local level also have complained about the growing information gap. And private economist said the government should know more, not less, about the nation's economy and workforce to be better able to take timely action and, as The Wall Street Journal put it, "prevent another Great Depression."

However, a recent proposal by the White House Office of Management & Budget would make the information shortage even worse. The OMB directed all federal agencies to subject their data collection and distribution efforts to so-called "cost-benefit" criteria. The budget office also proposed more user charges, thus limiting information to those who can afford it.

As American Library Association official Eileen Cooke put it to the New York Times, "What's the dollar benefit of an informed citizenry? What's the dollar benefit of housing or health statistics?" She called the OMB move part of "a real trend of this Administration to limit public access to information."

Your Life-Support Benefits Are on The Chopping Block!

Congress right now is drafting a tax on the health care, life insurance, dental plans, prepaid legal service, disability payments and other workplace benefits that American families today rely on for their very security. Hidden in the "tax simplification" plan of the Reagan Administration, the new tax will cut your take-home pay, reduce your benefits and leave you with less protection. This is cruelly unfair.

Here's How You Can Fight This Takeaway!

The AFL-CIO is leading a nation-wide campaign to stop this unfair tax dead in its tracks. The campaign materials shown above are available now from the AFL-CIO Legislative Department to help you spread the word in time to save your hard-earned life supports. Send for them today.

In the meantime, use the letter shown here as a sample or write your own and send it to your two senators and your representative. Write to your Senators, care of the U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C., 20510, and to your Representative, care of the U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515. Don't wait. Write Now!

Dear Senator _____:

I am opposed to any legislation which will tax my hard-earned employee benefits and reduce my coverage. Protections like health, doctor and hospital care, life insurance, educational assistance, child care, etc., are my life support benefits. Taxing them reduces my take-home pay and could cut benefits for myself and my family.

I'd like to know how you stand on this issue. Please let me know.

Sincerely,

Stiff sanctions urged on South Africa

ICFTU calls for action to end apartheid

By James M. Shevis

The world's free trade unions approved an action blueprint aimed at eliminating South Africa's racist policy of apartheid, declaring the time has come to step up international pressure against a form of government that denies blacks basic human rights.

The executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, meeting in Washington, spelled out a policy of escalating economic sanctions that its affiliates will press for in their home countries, including selective disinvestment by foreign firms now operating in South Africa.

The ICFTU represents some 83 million workers in 145 labor organizations in 99 nations. Most of its affiliates are national labor centers, like the AFL-CIO, that group together the trade unions of their countries. Some individual unions also are members.

At a rare special session of the board during its semi-annual meeting, the ICFTU condemned "all collaboration with the South African regime serving in any way to strengthen or maintain" its policy of total racial segregation, called apartheid.

Meanwhile, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue was scheduled to give the AFL-CIO's views on hastening the dismantlement of apartheid at House hearings on legislative sanctions against the racist South African regime.

Disengagement

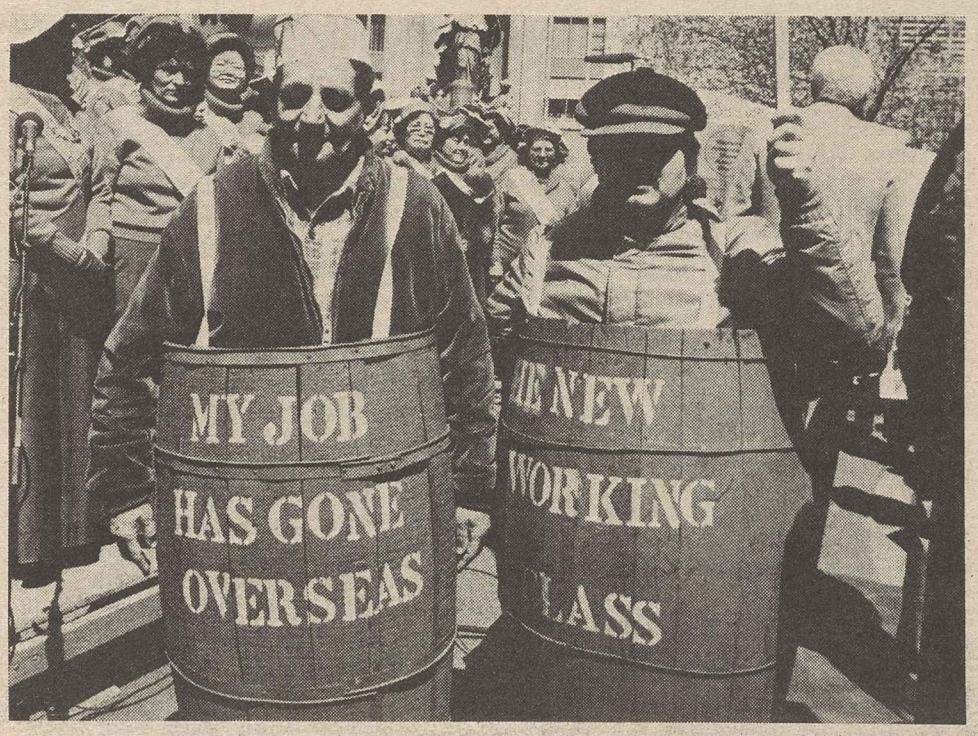
The ICFTU board called on all governments to embark on a vigorous policy of "constructive disengagement" that would isolate South Africa from the family of civilized nations.

"The threat of economic isolation is a major concern for the apartheid regime, but must be made more credible by specific commitments to effective action by the large industrialized countries," the board said in a statement approved unanimously.

The statement called on governments to build up, by administrative and legislative action, a tough policy of sanctions culminating in the adoption of mandatory United Nations sanctions to enforce the economic isolation of South Africa.



The policy calls for an end to new investment in South Africa by multinational corporations, a stop on bank loans and new loans to South Africa by the International Monetary Fund, and "compulsory

Time for change

Garment and textile workers in New York protest the government's deficit-ridden trade policy that is shutting down their shops and wiping out their jobs. The Apr. 10 rally was one of 50 across the country to launch a petition campaign for action to stem the flood of imports. (Story and more photos, Page 4.)

3,000 carry labor's case to Congress

By David L. Perlman

More than 3,000 local and state leaders of building trades unions carried a crusade for fairness in tax policy and labor relations to Capitol Hill and then headed back to their home communities to organize a follow-up lobbying effort.

A major focus of the four-day legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. was reinforcement for the labor movement's campaign against so-called "tax simplification" proposals that would tax workers on the value of employer-provided benefits such as health insurance.

Whatever it's called, that's still a tax increase, BCTD President Robert A. Georgine stressed at the opening of the conference. "By counting benefits as though they were income," he said, the government would be taxing workers "on money that never appears in their paychecks."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the delegates they will have to "speak more forcefully than ever" to get the attention of Congress and the Reagan Administration.

Shifting the burden

Otherwise, he warned, the deficit brought on by tax giveaways to corporations and the rich will be used as an excuse to demolish needed government programs and shift more of the burden on to workers and retirees.

Just as Reagan showed himself willing to abandon his promise to protect social security benefits, "the promise of no new taxes does not extend to the taxes that working people pay," Kirkland noted.

The two other fairness issues on the conference's "short list" lobbying agenda dealt with matters of special importance to the 15 building trades unions and their

Rights panel condemned for pay equity rejection

The AFL-CIO sharply criticized the U.S. Civil Rights Commission's attack on the principle of equal pay for jobs of comparable worth and said it won't deter the trade union movement from its fight against sex discrimination in the workplace.

There was "no surprise" in the panel's 5-2 vote attacking the comparable worth concept, an AFL-CIO statement noted.

"The Reagan appointees who dominate the Civil Rights Commission long ago signaled their intent to try to scuttle pay equity, just as they have sought to dilute and diminish legislative and public concern for civil rights in every other area," the federation said.

It pledged a continued fight against sex bias "through collective bargaining, legislative and legal action, exactly as we fought for the child labor and minimum wage laws."

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act establishes the principle that wages should be determined by the value of the work performed, not the sex, race, age or religion of the workers, the AFL-CIO pointed out. And "nothing this commission says can change the law."

Benefit cuts spell crisis for 650,000

Another 650,000 Americans will be pushed below the poverty line during the next three years if Congress adopts the cuts in social security and government pensions urged by President Reagan and Senate Republican leaders.

That's the assessment of the Congressional Budget Office on the impact of the budget proposal to limit the COLA for social security, railroad retirement, military pensions and social security retirement. The COLA would be limited to 2 percent next year, with a comparable ceiling for each of the two following years.

Two-thirds of the newly created poor would be elderly, the nonpartisan budget office estimated.

During the Easter Week recess of Congress, senior citizen groups and their coalition allies met with more than 170 House and Senate members in their home districts to ask them to sign a "Birthday Pledge" on the 50th anniversary of social security and the 20th anniversary of Medicare and Medicaid.

Vote sought

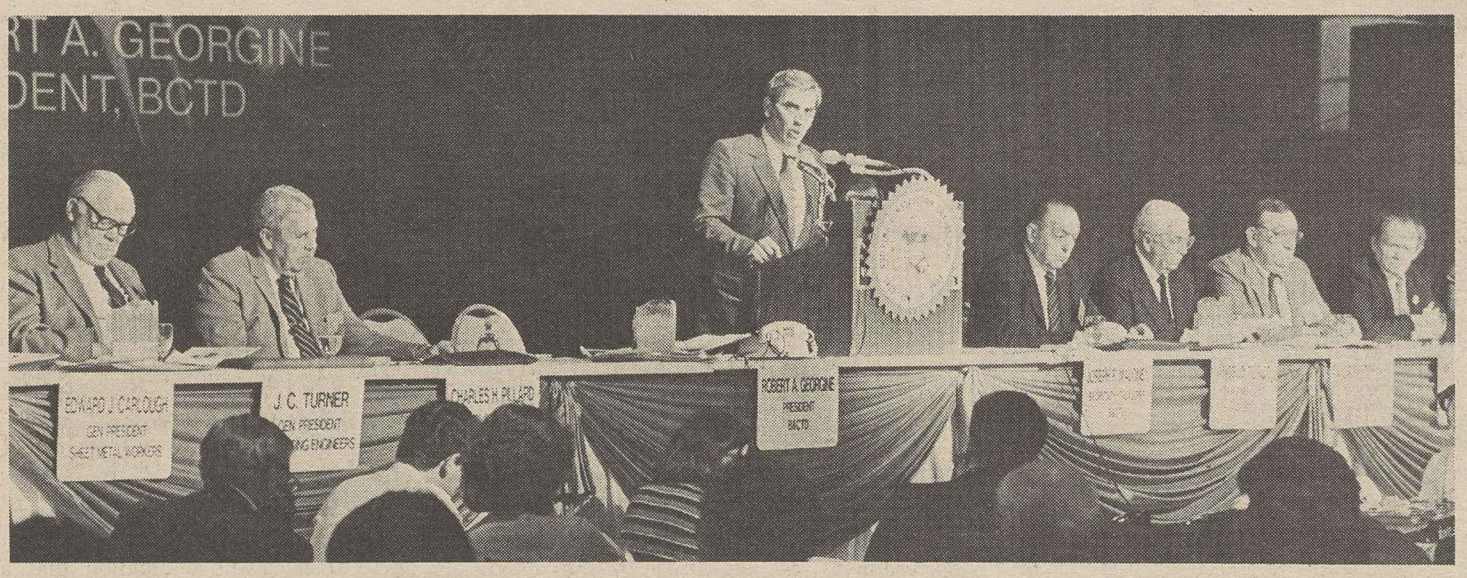
The pledge sought to commit them to "protect the dignity, health and welfare of older Americans" by voting against reducing COLA payments and imposing higher premiums and deductibles for Medicare and Medicaid.

Social security benefits average $452 a month and go to some 36 million persons, mostly elderly or disabled.

The Congressional Budget Office estimated that under the new budget plan, the buying power of social security checks would fall 5.4 percent over three years.



In a related area, a new study by the Children's Defense Fund found that the poor are paying substantially more in federal taxes despite the big 1981 tax cut.

Total taxes paid by the working poor increased 58 percent from 1980 to 1982, the study noted. "Taxes on the working poor have skyrocketed while taxes on the well-to-do and on profitable corporations have declined dramatically," it said.

It noted also that a mother with three children who earned $11,456 and paid $1,384 in federal taxes last year "paid more federal taxes than Boeing, General Electric, Du Pont, Texaco, Mobil and AT&T, although these corporations earned $13.7 billion in profits.

more than four million affiliated members.

● Through new regulations, the Internal Revenue Service is seeking to curtail travel expense tax deductions for building trades workers who have to travel to job sites far beyond normal commuting distances—or else uproot or leave behind families to move closer to temporary work sites.

The building trades are backing remedial legislation that has been introduced by Representatives Fortney H. Stark (D-Calif.) and Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.).

● Contractors with pre-hire collective bargaining agreements have been able to evade paying prevailing wages and benefits by going "double-breasted," setting up non-union subsidiaries through dummy corporations. Legislation introduced by Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.) and 36 cosponsors would require contractors to apply provisions of a collective bargaining agreement to all their operations.

Closing loopholes

Clay, who addressed the conference, gave this succinct description of his bill: "Simply, it says that no legal loopholes will be allowed which permit those contractors who have entered into a collective bargaining agreement to weasel out of it."

In the fight against taxation of worker benefits, delegates got a strong and unequivocal pledge of support from Senate Finance Committee Chairman Bob Packwood (R-Ore.).

Packwood's committee has jurisdiction over tax legislation, and he told the delegates that Treasury Sec. James A. Baker III is on notice that no proposal that includes taxation of worker benefits will get the panel's sympathetic consideration.

If such a proposal is included in the Administration tax reform bill, Packwood said he informed Baker, "I will do everything I can to defeat the bill no matter what else is in it."

Georgine and Kirkland addressed a range of labor concerns in their opening day speeches.

Like other segments of the labor movement, Georgine said, the building trades have found they can't rely on the National Labor Relations Board to look after the interests of workers.

"It is we who must organize," he stressed, including "further organizing the organized into a more potent political force, into an aggressive lobbying arm . . . working together across trade and geographic lines."

Skills training must be improved, he urged, pension funds used to generate union jobs, and "we must be more competitive to retain the work we have and to gain new work. . . . Assigning one craftsman too many to a job is as wasteful as having a crew wait a couple of hours for needed supplies."

It's "political realism" to work with both parties in Congress and with the Executive Branch on behalf of union members, Georgine said, but "we make no apologies" for supporting the Democratic presidential ticket "and we don't look for scapegoats."

Kirkland's speech also touched on the outcome of the presidential election.

"We tried hard and failed to elect an honorable candidate who shared our convictions and our principles," he said.

"More important than the outcome are the things you stand for," Kirkland stressed. If unions were to abandon convictions "each time the political winds change direction," he warned, "we would soon stand for nothing, and be good for nothing. The same might well be said of the Democratic Party."

The trade union movement must continue to fight for America's workers, Kirkland said, and do "a better job of getting our message across to Congress and to our fellow citizens."

Doubting disciples

Kirkland welcomed "signs that even some of President Reagan's most faithful disciples are beginning to doubt the wisdom of trashing our country's productive capacity, wiping out the jobs of millions and the economies of hundreds of communities."

The blame, he suggested, is not on the Japanese "for sending more cars than our market can sustain without grave injury. . . . Common sense should tell us that the guilt lies more with those who threw open the gates rather than those who accepted the invitation."

Likewise, he said, the Administration's "dogmatic conviction that chaos is better than regulation" has led to "wave after wave of corporate raids and takeovers" that leave industry weaker "without producing a dollar's worth of goods or services."

The four-day conference included state meetings and receptions with congressional delegations, an array of speakers from Capitol Hill and other branches of government, and workshops on matters ranging from legal issues in construction to apprenticeship job safety and health.

Bus firm ordered not to use nonunion, part-time drivers

Durham, N.C.—Duke Power Co.'s transit division, which operates bus lines in Durham and Greensboro, N.C., has been ordered to stop hiring non-union part-time drivers to do the work of its unionized full-time workforce.

Acting on complaints filed with the National Labor Relations Board, Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates ordered the company to rescind the position it unilaterally implemented on Feb. 2, 1984, and to return to the table and bargain in good faith with Transit Union Local 1437 of Durham and Local 1312 of Greensboro.

The contract covering the two locals expired Oct. 31, 1983 and the company contended that it has the right to hire the part-time drivers. Declaring it needed flexibility because the firm was losing money, Duke said it wanted the part-timers for charter runs, split runs, vacation relief and "for anything in general that an extra operator would do." Company negotiators also said any full-timers who left the firm would be replaced by part-timers.

After the unions voted down the company's final offer, Duke declared an impasse had been reached and it instituted the part-time provision. It later rebuffed the unions' attempt at resolving the situation. Cates ruled that Duke "unlawfully insisted to impasse on its demand that part-time employees be excluded from the unit." He determined that the bargaining unit includes, not only full-time workers as stated in the recognition clause, but also "regular part-time employees."

Further, while a company can legally bargain with a union over what constitutes the bargaining unit, it cannot bargain to impasse over the issue which is held to be a "nonmandatory subject of bargaining," Cates said.

Because the company forced an impasse in bargaining by its insistence on a nonmandatory item, the impasse was not a valid one, the judge held, adding that Duke's subsequent implementation of the provision by hiring part-time workers also violated federal labor law.

Besides ordering the company back to the bargaining table, Cates directed Duke to "make whole" any part-time workers for lower pay under the firm's two-tier wage system. It was also ordered to preserve all documents relevant to computing the backpay due these workers.

Cates rejected the union's request that Duke discharge the part-time workers it hired, saying that such employees are "inherently included" in the bargaining unit.

Reagan panel hit for attack on pay equity

The commission majority stirred a firestorm of controversy by adopting a draft report asserting that "implementation of the unsound and misplaced concept of comparable worth would be a serious error."

The State, County & Municipal Employees, which has led the campaign for comparable worth in the public sector, termed the commission's action "insupportable as a matter of law or policy."

AFSCME President Gerald McEntee accused the agency of "ignoring the fact of overwhelming evidence of pay discrimination against working women in traditional jobs like secretary, librarian, and nurse."

President Judy Goldsmith of the National Organization for Women called the report "a biased, absurdly one-sided" study. She called the panel's majority "right-wing ideologues" who speak "only for President Reagan and the business interests who profit from discrimination."

Lauded by business

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce predictably praised the commission report, and called comparable worth a "fallacy" and a "misunderstanding of the marketplace and the law of supply and demand."

In its report, the commission contended that the wage gap between men and women results "in significant part" from factors other than discrimination, such as unequal education and skills.

"Since the wage gap is not entirely due to discrimination, it is wrong to try to eradicate that gap in the name of anti-discrimination," it said. "Things that are beyond an employer's control should not be the basis for a finding that an employer has discriminated."

Pressure from unions and women's groups recently has given momentum to the comparable-worth concept in some state legislatures and court cases. Six states have begun to adjust the salary scales of public jobs traditionally held by women to make them equal those of jobs deemed comparable that are held by men.

The two commissioners disagreeing with the majority report, Mary Frances Berry and Blandina Cardenas Ramirez, said pay equity "can be an important tool in the arsenal for attacking discrimination."

PBS focuses on pay equity

Working Women, an eight-part National Public Broadcasting series, will examine the issue of pay equity on PBS stations the week of Apr. 21-27. The episode includes a segment produced by the AFL-CIO's Labor Institute of Public Affairs for its America Works series. It focuses on an AFSCME University of Maryland member who took the pay equity debate to the Maryland State House.

Solidarity with Solidarnosc

The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions reaffirmed its long-standing support of Poland's banned Solidarity trade union, and pledged to work for the release of all members and supportrs of the Polish labor organization who are now in jail.

In a resolution adopted unanimously, the ICFTU executive board said it would press to end all harassment of independent trade unionists by the communist Polish regime.

The action came in response to a letter ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken received from former Solidarity Chairman Lech Walesa.

"Support at the ICFTU level is invaluable to us in our struggle for human and trade union rights," Walesa wrote. "We are very pleased that ICFTU support for our cause is not diminishing." He estimated that there are currently about 100 Solidarnosc activists and supporters in Polish prisons, including former Vice President Andrzej Gwiazda.

"The fury with which the Polish official mass media have recently attacked Solidarity's representative body abroad, particularly the director of the Brussels office, Jerry Milewski, reveals the authorities' alarm over worldwide support for Solidarity from trade unions, political parties, governments, and social organizations," Walesa said.

ICFTU seeks world sanctions on South Africa

disinvestment" by multinational firms now doing business there, particularly those in the armament, energy, and high technology sectors.

An ICFTU ad hoc coordinating committee will target companies for disinvestment at a June 4 meeting in Geneva. The selections will be made from a list of firms identified by the independent black trade union movement in South Africa as being in violation of internationally accepted standards of labor practice.

South Africa is the only country in the world where racism is entrenched in the governing constitution, as Director Gen. Francis Blanchard of the International Labor Organization observed in an address before the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pledged American labor's wholehearted support in the international campaign to create a free and democratic South Africa.

U.S. labor backing

"We are in full support of the statement, and we intend to give our support in carrying it out," Kirkland said at a news conference following the meeting. "As soon as we hear from the ICFTU what the target companies are, we will take the steps that are recommended."

The special session on South Africa was the centerpiece of the three-day board meeting, the first ever held in Washington. ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken noted that both the time and the venue of the meeting were significant, occurring just as a new wave of repression against blacks and trade unions was sweeping across South Africa and with the AFL-CIO taking the lead in pushing the Reagan Administration to change U.S. policy toward Pretoria.

Agenda items

During the meeting, the board also adopted resolutions on the war in the Persian Gulf between Iraq and Iran, the fate of Soviet human rights leader Andrei Sakharov, the East-West disarmament talks in Geneva, Poland's Solidarity independent trade union, and the Tunisian government's attempt to freeze workers' wages.

The board also heard a report on an ICFTU factfinding mission to Central America earlier this year, released its second annual survey of trade union rights violations throughout the world, and approved affiliation of three new labor groups in Japan and one in Guatemala.

In all the discussions on South Africa, the members of the ICFTU board stressed that the only change acceptable to the international free trade union movement is the total abolition of apartheid. Yet there was the realism that change does not come overnight.

"The situation has reached a crisis point," Vanderveken warned. "This crisis situation could result in more arrests and the banning of trade union organizations representing black majority workers.

"This would inevitably lead to a bloodbath, to violence which could not remain confined to South Africa, which would affect us all. Only a coordinated international effort will effectively ward off this tragic possibility."

Kirkland told reporters that what the board wants "is not simply to improve the performance of apartheid, or to ameliorate or to seek a way of living with apartheid. We want to eliminate apartheid."

While the public at large and other governments can do much toward that end, "we believe that the most potent and most effective force for democracy and for peaceful change in that country is the black trade union movement," Kirkland said.

Gen.-Sec. Phiroshaw Camay of the Council of Unions of South Africa, one of the largest groupings in the independent black trade union movement, called for a "synergistic" approach to bring down apartheid, which he described as "a pernicious crime against humanity."

Continue protests

"There should be mass picketing of South African embassies and consulates. Honorary consuls should be prevailed upon to resign. There should be a strong and vigorous campaign to curtail the sale of South African fruit and other manufactured products. There should be picketing of South African stalls at trade fairs and exhibitions.

"Disinvestment is only part of that synergistic approach," said Camay, a member of the ICFTU board. "There should be a strong, direct, and immediate pressure in every visible way to embarrass the South African government. There should also be a campaign directed against those governments, agencies, and organizations which assist the South African government in spreading its false propaganda of peaceful reform."

Disinvestment argument

Camay rejected the contention that a pullout of foreign companies from South Africa would cost more in jobs than the tactic might gain.

"That's an emotional argument," he said. "That's the rhetoric of the South African apartheid government. It's the rhetoric that's been used by a lot of other people in support of campaigns against disinvestment.

"If that is the ultimate sacrifice that people would have to make, then that's the sacrifice that I'm sure the membership would be prepared to make.

"We're balancing that against the basic need of the people, the basic need of people everywhere, to enjoy freedom in their country and enjoy the citizenship rights that that freedom will give to people in that country."

ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken calls for economic sanctions to end apartheid in South Africa.

Eastern Airlines pact rebuffed in ratification votes

Two of three unions that reached tentative agreements with Eastern Airlines rejected the accords in rank-and-file balloting, but members continued on their jobs.

The Machinists and the Transport Workers voted down the proposals that included concessions to help solve the company's financial problems. The Air Line Pilots last month accepted a one-year package of concessions.

Eastern's flight attendants, represented by the TWU, turned down their proposed agreement by a 4-to-1 margin. IAM mechanics and other ground personnel rejected their agreement by about 400 votes out of some 6,600 ballots cast.

TWU represents about 6,800 Eastern employees, IAM 11,500 and ALPA 4,000.

Despite the rejection by TWU and IAM, no strike is anticipated since the parties must first exhaust the procedures of the Railway Labor Act governing transportation industries.

No new talks by either union were scheduled, but the Machinists planned to hold a second vote. IAM District 100 President Charles Bryan said that neither the time nor the place of the vote had yet been decided.

Pay cuts

All three unions reached agreement with Eastern in February on partial restoration of the 18-to-22 percent pay cuts their members accepted in 1983 to ease the airline's financial problems.

The carrier's creditors have demanded additional labor concessions to keep the airline out of default on $2.5 billion in loans and leasing agreements. They have given the airline until May 15 to settle with the unions.

If Eastern failed to meet the deadline, it ostensibly would be in technical default.

Meanwhile, Eastern posted earnings of $24.3 million in the first quarter of 1985, compared with a $28.1 million loss a year earlier. The profit was the airline's largest ever for a quarter, and marked the third straight quarter of black ink for the company, which reported losses of $362.4 million between 1981 and 1984.

Elsewhere in the industry, talks aimed at ending a Machinists' strike against Alaska Airlines broke down again, this time over back-to-work provisions. More than 600 IAM mechanics and related employees struck the carrier Mar. 4.

Resistance to apartheid

Black unions providing leadership

Resistance to apartheid is gaining momentum inside South Africa, just as it is internationally.

At the leading edge of the struggle is the independent black trade union movement which is "growing both in its strength and in its anger at what is happening in the townships," as Phiroshaw Camay, general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa (CUSA), put it at a press conference following the meeting of the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Washington.

Leaders of the world's free labor unions stressed during the ICFTU meeting that the international campaign to eliminate apartheid is geared to the needs of the black workers and their unions, who they see as the great hope of South Africa.

Phiroshaw Camay

"I want to stress that what we do is in response to the needs as expressed by our South African trade union friends," ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken told reporters. "It is not a program that we dream up for them. It is worked out with them."

A delegation of top leaders of the South African black unions took part in the ICFTU meeting. It included Camay and President Chris Dlamini of the Federation of South African Trade Unions (FOSATU). CUSA and FOSATU are the two largest groupings in the independent black union movement.

Growing awareness

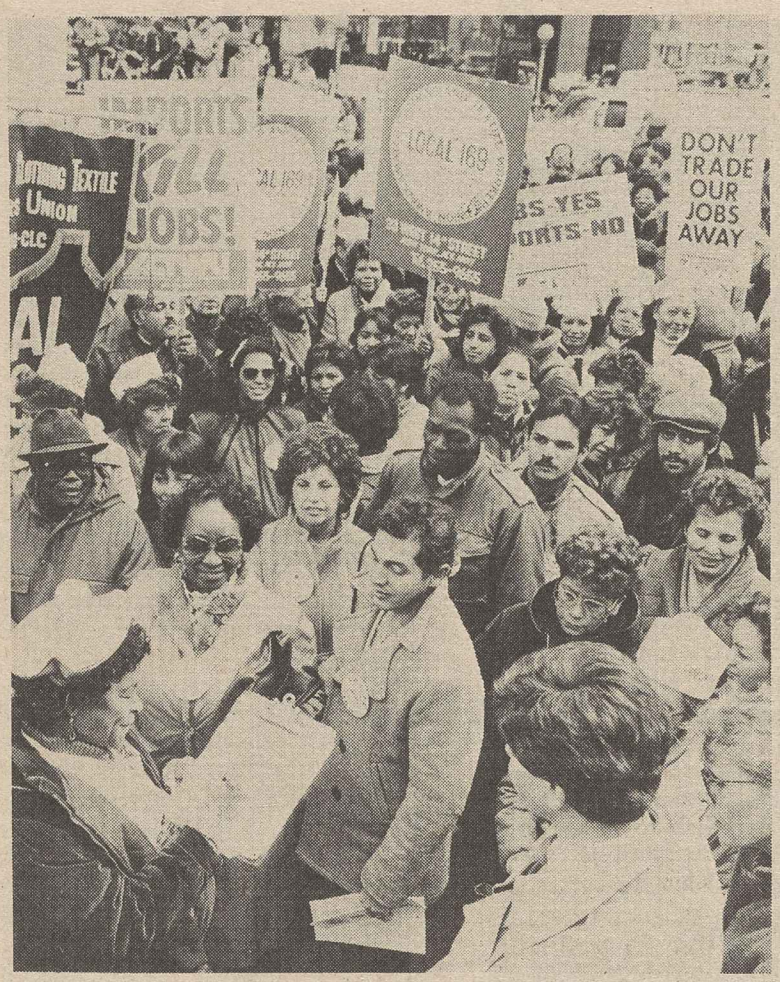
As apartheid continues to grip their nation, the black trade unions are rapidly expanding and have become more articulate in their demands. Black membership has grown 800 percent since 1980.

"They are claiming the application of fair labor standards generally, and have made significant gains," Director-Gen. Francis Blanchard of the International Labor Office pointed out in an address to the ICFTU board.

The large-scale work stoppages in the Transvaal area last November and other demonstrations since then reflect the growing impatience of blacks with the government's refusal to abandon its apartheid policies.

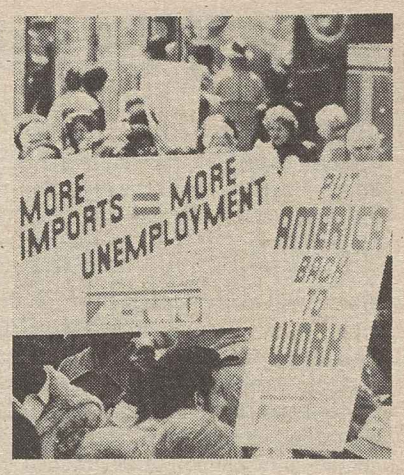
The ICFTU board noted in a report on South African labor developments that in spite of these achievements union membership still only represents 15 percent of the workforce of the country, estimated at 10.3 million.



Union membership in 1983 was estimated at 1.5 million, with blacks numbering 671,194, or 43.4 percent of the total.

At the same time that the independent black trade union movement is growing so rapidly, it has become a major target for repression by the authorities. Last year more than 250 persons were killed by security police and thousands injured, the report noted. Virtually the entire leadership of the South African Workers Unions is in jail facing treason charges, together with the whole leadership of the United Democratic Front.

Yet, despite setbacks, the independent black trade union movement has done more to generate international awareness of the true nature of apartheid than any other single group in the country.



The ICFTU leaders see the continued progress of the independent black labor movement as the only truly positive development in South Africa.

"As the unions are daily becoming more professional, dynamic, with a remarkable maturity and confidence in handling negotiations and disputes, through their successes they are looked upon by the black people of South Africa as the only hope for peaceful change," Vanderveken said.

To save America's jobs

Thousands of garment and textile workers turned out for a noon rally in New York's Herald Square as part of a nationwide protest against the flood of imports that has wiped out nearly one-quarter of a million jobs. The Apr. 10 rally organized by the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers was one of 50 demonstrations held across the country.

In New York, the protestors were joined by Gov. Mario Cuomo, Mayor Edward I. Koch, members of Congress and employers supporting the campaign to curb imports.

Active members joined retirees in remembering the hundreds of shops closed by imports and substandard foreign wages. Some workers dressed in barrels to symbolize the plight of the apparel and textile industries and their employees.

The rallies launched a petition drive to obtain one million signatures nationwide, 125,000 in New York City alone, calling for legislation to preserve American jobs and industry.

Steel union plans to continue fight for 'Dorothy Six'

Pittsburgh — The Steelworkers are still convinced there's a future for "Dorothy Six," the U.S. Steel Corp. blast furnace in Duquesne, Pa., that once was the nation's most productive.

A study the union commissioned, with cost-sharing help from the city of Pittsburgh, Allegheny County and the Duquesne Light Co., pointed to profitability through modernization. That option would both preserve jobs and stave off a new influx of imported semi-finished steel.

U.S. Steel management had refused to take part in the study, and company chairman David M. Roderick rejected the report's conclusions. Costs would be too high, he contended, and the company was "not Santa Claus."

The Steelworkers have commissioned a financial study to identify prospective buyers and investors for the Duquesne plant and a marketing survey to respond to U.S. Steel's dismissal of the earlier study.

Once again, the union urged U.S. Steel to join in the worker and community efforts to find a way to get the plant back into operation. Dorothy Six has been shut down since May 1984 and is scheduled for demolition sometime after June 1.

The union said it will go to court if necessary to seek to block destruction of the works and the "irreversible" damage to the region that would result.

Destruction of the Dorothy Six would mean replacing nearly one million tons of semi-finished steel that could be produced each year with imports, the USWA said.

A.C. Skinner dies at 76, headed Mine, Mill union

Tucson, Ariz.—Albert C. Skinner, president of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers when the union merged with the Steelworkers in 1967, died of cancer at St. Mary's Hospital here. He was 76.

Skinner began his union career in 1937 at the Libby-Owens-Ford Glass Co. in Toledo, Ohio, where he led a successful sit-down strike and became shop steward. He rose through the union ranks and was elected president in 1963. On the union's merger with the Steelworkers, he was appointed assistant to the USWA president. Skinner retired in 1976.

He played a major role in organizing the Non-Ferrous Conference in 1968, which established coordinated bargaining for the 30 unions in the copper industry. Skinner also worked to abolish the copper industry's dual wage system, under which minority workers were paid less than white workers.

Business unleashes lobbying blitz to pass Reagan's budget plan intact

Business lobbyists are flexing political muscle in support of the Reagan budget, which combined deep cuts in domestic programs and reduced social security payments with an after-inflation rise in military spending.

Lobbyists for more than 50 national business and industry organizations met with White House budget chief David Stockman at a meeting arranged by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Wall Street Journal reported. The self-described "100 percenters," who pledged unconditional no-amendment support for the budget, included representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers, the Business Roundtable, the American Business Conference and a wide spectrum of trade associations that have been heavy contributors to political campaigns.

Their avowed goal is to hold a Senate majority to vote down any change in the budget package agreed to by the White House and key Republicans—and then, somehow, repeat the process in the Democratic-held House.

A comparable effort may be tried in support of the Administration's attempt to put through what the White House still insists will be a revenue-neutral tax reform package.

Ironically, Reagan described the proposal now being put into final shape as a bold initiative in loophole-closing that would likely be fought by business interests.

High-powered army

"It probably won't please Washington's army of high-powered lobbyists," the President said in his weekly radio broadcast.

As originally drafted by the Treasury Dept., the tax simplification package clearly would not have pleased many of the business lobbyists. It would have closed a number of corporate tax loopholes—a step that might have led to substantial business opposition.

But Reagan noted in his radio broadcast that he would like to "reduce corporate rates, too." While he was concerned with "fairness" in the tax system, the President said, "we must not jeopardize economic growth."

It appears now that the corporate sector will be more friendly to the Administration's tax package than once appeared likely. Again, a Wall Street Journal news analysis suggested the reason.

"The Administration's revised plan probably won't be as generous to the bulk of middle-income taxpayers as the Treasury proposal released last November," the news analysis concludes. It said that complaints from corporations and fears of hampering economic growth have persuaded Treasury Sec. Baker to switch less of the burden to corporations.

Last November, when the Treasury unveiled its draft plan, the AFL-CIO objected strongly to proposals to make workers pay taxes on the value of health insurance and other job-related benefits. But the federation saw as a plus provisions that would at least partly close some of the more notorious corporate loopholes.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned at the time, however, that in this Administration any changes made by the White House before sending the tax plan to Congress would most likely tilt toward restoring corporate loopholes.

Staff cuts would hobble social security

An Administration plan to eliminate 17,000 employees and close 300 to 600 social security offices was assailed as "outrageous" by William J. Driver, a former Social Security Administration commissioner.

Driver testified for the Save Our Security coalition at hearings before a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

"The quality of service in the Social Security Administration has suffered steady deterioration for over 10 years due to budget actions," Driver said. "But no proposal that any Administration has ever made is as outrageous as these."

"This is not a business plan to improve the administration of programs or the delivery of service," he said. "It is an act of cash accounting, without regard for the consequences which these savage cutbacks in service will have on the public."

Driver said the Social Security workforce has been cut by 7,000 since 1977 and, as a consequence, "quality public service has been repeatedly curtailed and adversely affected."

He cited as an example a General Accounting Office study which found that, between 1977 and 1981, nearly 19 percent or one out of every five beneficiaries had administratively caused payment errors.

"Less staff and fewer offices can only worsen these problems and add to the deterioration of service and public confidence in the Social Security Administration," Driver said.

The Social Security Administration cutback plan was not based on any "systematic and professional study," Driver said, but originated in the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control, known as the "Grace Commission," and was then referred by President Reagan to the Office of Management & Budget to implement.

Flawed study

Driver charged the Grace Commission recommendations were "flawed" and "incredibly unprofessional." The commission based its conclusions on a "handful" of interviews, "a few random observations" and false assumptions, he said.

"No management, whether private or public, determines its workforce by such simplistic formulas," Driver said. "Again the performance and the needs and demands for service suggest that, rather than cutting personnel, personnel should be increased." There was testimony from others.

Gayla Reiter, an officer of the Government Employees union representing San Francisco region social security field offices, confirmed problems caused by lack of staff. In some offices, she said, sacks of mail go unprocessed, "filing cabinets full of unworked overpayments and waiver requests, many of them over a year old," are unprocessed, and clients sometimes have to wait three or four hours for service.

Reiter predicted that "the hue and cry will be deafening as the Administration moves to implement its planned closures" because such problems will increase.

Martha A. McSteen, acting SSA commissioner, told the panel that staff cuts can be achieved without affecting services because of increased computer use and better systems design.

However, Joseph L. Delfico of the General Accounting Office said, "Whether SSA can achieve a 21 percent cut in staff without any adverse impact on service to the public is not known."

Harold Rigley dies, retired Utility Workers official

Jamesburg, N.J.—Harold T. Rigley, retired president of the Utility Workers, died Feb. 19 of heart failure. He was 71.

Rigley was one of the founders of the UWUA. While employed by Consolidated Edison in New York City, he was elected chief job steward of UWUA Local 1-2 and later served secretary-treasurer and then president of the local.

He served as the head of the national union from 1972 until his retirement in 1979.

OSHA policy denounced

Field workers refused basic sanitation, water

By Arlee C. Green

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration is under fire from labor, Congress and even its own staff specialists for refusing to set a field sanitation standard that would require employers to provide toilets and clean water for farm workers.

OSHA's abandonment of the proposed regulation leaves agribusiness the only sector of the economy where workers are not legally provided basic sanitation needs.

Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez said of the decision, "The American people would be ashamed, even if the Reagan Administration is not, at the perilous sanitation conditions that farm workers endure."

"We are not surprised that acting OSHA Director Robert Rowland is a substantial stockholder in Tenneco, Inc., which is the parent corporation for Tenneco West—a giant California agribusiness firm that has been found guilty of illegally firing field workers who complained about unsanitary working conditions and wages."

In 1982, the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board, Chavez said, convicted Tenneco West of firing 25 UFWA members who complained about these conditions.

"To this day, Tenneco West—Rowland's company—still refuses to bargain in good faith, even though its field workers voted to be represented by the UFWA in 1976," Chavez said.

Mean-spirited

AFL-CIO Industrial Hygienist Margaret Seminario charged that OSHA's decision not to provide these workers with a level of dignity that is afforded all other workers in the nation, only further demonstrates the "mean-spiritedness" of the Reagan Administration.

She noted that besides the obvious complications arising from a lack of toilet facilities, the lack of water for hand washing and for drinking will continue to expose these workers to the risks of heat stroke, parasitic infections, and exposure to the various pesticides used in the fields.

A five-member OSHA field sanitation team protested the agency's action, stressing in a letter to Rowland that "the record will not support" a determination that no standard be issued.

The five specialists pointed out they had nursed the proposed standard through from its inception and "we are, in short, your professional experts in field sanitation."

But their expert opinion mattered little in the final outcome as OSHA set forth its reasons for killing the overdue protections for some 500,000 farm workers.

Court battles

The battle for the field sanitation standard spans a dozen years in the courts.

U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia twice ordered OSHA to produce a standard, only to be overridden by the appelate court. A 1982 court agreement required that OSHA complete a standard by February 1985, or state why it could not. But in February, OSHA got the court to push back the deadline two more months.

Rowland ignored the recommendations of two special consultants OSHA hired to analyze the hearing records on field sanitation. They found that the lack of toilets, drinking and washing water for farm workers makes them 20 times more likely to suffer from parasites, 11 times more likely to suffer from gastro-intestinal diseases and 331 times more likely to contract viral hepatitis than the general public.

They also found the farm workers often carry diseases that are common in lesser-developed countries, but which have been eradicated from the U.S. years ago.

Rep. Bill Richardson (D-N.M.), head of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, called OSHA's refusal to issue a standard "an outrage" and a "national disgrace."

Charles Horwitz, an attorney with the Migrant Legal Action Program, noted the irony of the Reagan Administration courting the Hispanic vote prior to last year's election, and now refusing to set a basic standard to provide for human dignity. He said about 55 percent of the nation's farm workers are Hispanic.

Rowland's investment ties queried

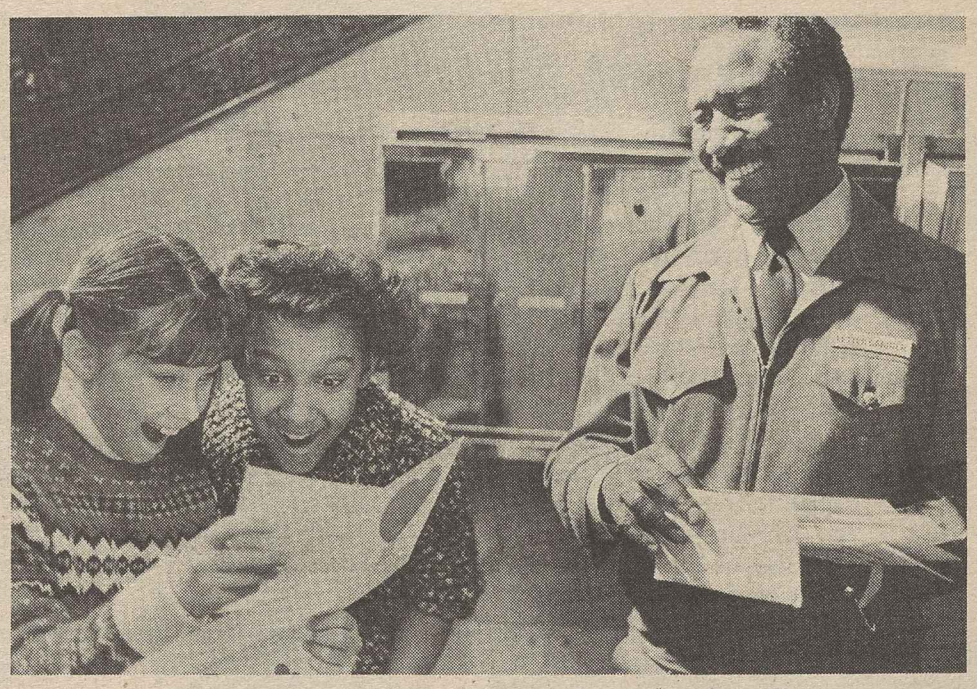
The head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has participated in regulatory decisions affecting companies in which he owns stock, and House Education & Labor Committee Chairman Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) has asked for an inquiry into whether a conflict of interest exists.



Robert A. Rowland, who has been serving as OSHA administrator since last fall, has substantial investments in several companies that could be affected by OSHA decisions, including such firms as the Manville Corp., which makes asbestos products, and the Monsanto Co., a major chemical manufacturer.

He also owns stock in Tenneco, which has subsidiaries in agriculture production presumably effected by OSHA's controversial decision not to require sanitation facilities for farm workers.

Rowland told reporters that he did not sell his stock holdings when he took the OSHA appointment because "it would have been a foolish thing to do." His holdings are in a blind trust, in which he does not control the buying and selling decisions.

Rowland said a waiver issued by former Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan exempts him from a strict requirement of non-involvement in decisions affecting companies in which he has invested. The waiver lets him make broad policy determinations, he said, but not involve himself in regulatory decisions directly affecting his holdings.

Hawkins said he asked the Comptroller General, Charles A. Bowsher, to look into "various allegations" regarding possible instances when the conflict of interest could have been violated.

Carry on

"Headin' out across America, spreading the word near and far" is the message of the Letter Carriers' new national television campaign. The TV spots will air this month in Washington and later this year in other parts of the country. The ads feature NALC members at work "daring the weather, everyplace, delivering for America."

Slowdown in GNP growth signals weakening economy

Signs of growing economic weakness emerged amid a mixed batch of government reports and private surveys, calling into question how long the spotty recovery from the Reagan Recession may last.

The clearest sign of weakness was the sluggish 1.3-percent annual rate of growth in economic output reported by the Commerce Dept. for the January-March quarter. That was the slowest quarterly gain since the end of the 1982 recession.

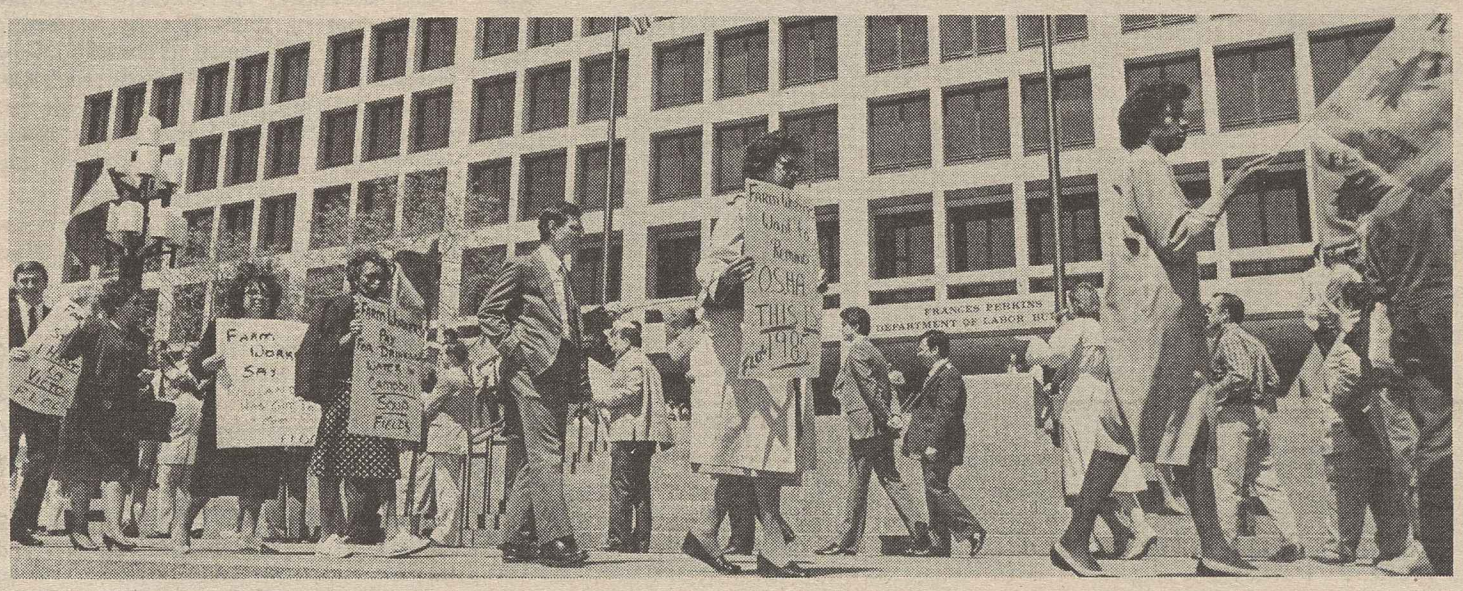
The rate of increase in the nation's real, or inflation-adjusted, gross national product compared with a rise of 4.3 percent in the fourth quarter of last year. Economists say sustained growth of about 4 percent is considered necessary to keep unemployment from getting worse.

The Commerce Dept. report on real GNP also showed that inflation, as measured by what it calls its "implicit price deflator," hit an annual rate of 5.3 percent, up from 2.8 percent at the end of 1984.

Other government statistics lent further doubts to the strength of the economy:

- The Federal Reserve Board reported a rise of only three-tenths of 1 percent in industrial production last month, and the Commerce Dept. said retail sales plunged 1.9 percent in March, the steepest drop in more than seven years.
- Consumer debt rose a record $10.37 billion in February, surpassing the old record increase of $9.09 billion set last May, the Federal Reserve Board said. The big February increase apparently reflected the 1.6-percent gain in retail sales during that month.

The installment debt could have been a factor in leading consumers to pull back on their spending in March.



- The Labor Dept. said 13 states and Puerto Rico had higher unemployment rates in February and nine states were experiencing double-digit joblessness.
- Factory capacity utilization last month remained the same as in February, 80.8 percent below the peak levels reached last summer. The Federal Reserve Board attributed the sluggish rate to the influx of foreign goods.
- Personal income rose a moderate five-tenths of 1 percent in March, but spendable income actually dropped by that much as a result of Internal Revenue Service delays in sending out tax refunds, the Commerce Dept. said.
- A Commerce Dept. survey of capital spending plans of U.S. businesses showed the gain this year will trail last year's by more than half. Business expansion and modernization in 1985 is expected to rise by 7.3 percent, compared to a 14.9-percent increase in capital spending last year.
- The Commerce Dept. said business inventories rose four-tenths of 1 percent in February, an indication that businesses are having trouble working down excess stockpiles, a problem that could translate into weak production and employment gains in coming months.

On the plus side, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said producer prices last month rose a slim two-tenths of 1 percent, indicating little inflation in the price of wholesale goods. And the Commerce Dept. reported a sharp 16.2-percent jump in housing sales in March.

The rise of only three-tenths of 1 percent in industrial output last month was a clear indication that the economy had entered a period of much slower growth. The March gain followed a decline of two-tenths of 1 percent in February.

The big March decline in retail sales was pervasive. The only increases were reported by hardware and garden supply stores and apparel outlets. The government said that auto sales last month dropped a sharp 4 percent while department store sales declined 2.3 percent.

States that still had double-digit jobless rates in February were West Virginia, 15.4 percent; Alabama, 10.9 percent; Alaska, 10.8 percent; Indiana, 10.9 percent; Louisiana, 11.6 percent; Michigan, 10.2 percent; Mississippi, 11.3 percent; Oregon, 11.3 percent, and Washington, 10.6 percent.

Labor Dept. employees—members of AFGE Local 12—join farm workers and supporters in protesting OSHA's refusal to issue field sanitation regulations. They called for OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland to resign.

How about $700 an hour?

The way the Big Three auto companies see it, American workers should show wage "restraint" to stay competitive with Japanese workers. But top executives need a stronger incentive.

Reports on 1984 compensation to the top auto executives show even higher rewards than the previous year, when huge bonuses drew strong criticism. General Motors Chairman Roger Smith got a $300,000 raise to $1.8 million; Ford Chairman Philip Caldwell added $200,000 to $1.6 million, and Chrysler Chairman Lee Iacocca got nearly $1.2 million—more than double his 1983 salary. At that level, their average pay works out to well over $700 an hour, not including fringe benefits.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber said if the U.S. executives really want to emulate their Japanese counterparts, they might consider that in Japan a chief executive's salary is much closer to that of production workers. Corporate greed, he suggested, is "incredibly short-sighted" and "way out of line with the message being sent to workers and the public on the need to become more competitive."

Federal court's injunction reinstates union supporter

Birmingham, Ala. — A federal judge has ordered immediate reinstatement of a supporter of the Auto Workers who was fired during an organizing drive, ruling that injunctive relief was necessary to "restore the status quo," and to signal the workers that company retaliations will not continue.

Judge E. B. Haltom, Jr., of the U.S. District Court for Northern Alabama, held that actions of Ona Corp., a manufacturer of gasoline and diesel engines and generators, was a flagrant violation of labor law.

The request for injunctive relief was brought by the National Labor Relations Board regional administrator on behalf of the UAW and Roger Armstrong, who was fired by Ona last June.

The UAW has been trying to organize the 700 workers at the Ona Corp. plant in Huntsville, Ala., since 1979. Judge Haltom's decision held that the firing of Armstrong was for "the deliberate purpose of stamping out union support among (Ona Corp.) employees."

The court noted that Ona Corp. was the subject of an NLRB order in May 1982, in which the company was found to have committed 59 unfair labor practices over a 10-week period prior to a representative election held on June 22, 1979. Seventeen company officials were found to have engaged in the employer's unlawful, anti-union campaign.

The NLRB set aside the election results and ordered the firm to begin bargaining with the UAW. A renewed UAW membership drive in the plant resulted in additional unfair labor practice charges of refusing to bargain and of maintaining personnel documents identifying a worker as a "union pusher." The NLRB affirmed the unfair charges.

Then in 1983, an administrative law judge found that the firm has "initiated, sponsored, formed, assisted and dominated an employee labor organization at the plant" in violation of labor law. That decision is on appeal to the NLRB.

The incident that led to the district court judge's interim relief order was the firing of Armstrong, the worker who had been identified as a "union pusher." Armstrong, an eight-year employee of the firm, had been promoted while with the company, and given several raises based on merit. Armstrong also had served as a union observer in NLRB-conducted elections, openly sported union shirts and hats, had solicited authorization and membership cards, and testified against Ona in unfair labor practice proceedings.

He was fired for "insubordination."

Actions vs. words

Judge Haltom noted that "the company's action in discharging the union's most vocal supporter in open defiance of the court's order 'speaks louder' than any notice that the employer may post. . . . The employees at Ona have undoubtedly taken this discharge of the union's inside linchpin as a warning that if they choose to support and deal with the union, as has Armstrong, they risk severe company retaliation."

In ordering the reinstatement, the court said, "the revival of UAW's organizing campaign at Ona . . . will be virtually impossible unless (Ona's) employees are given an affirmative signal that further union activity will not cause the kind of company retaliation that has occurred in the past."

Sheet Metal union aids retirees with 'inflation' checks

Some 14,000 retired members of the Sheet Metal Workers will be receiving an extra pension check each year to help offset inflation.

The program and a companion measure to cover costs not paid by Medicare were announced by Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough at a news conference with Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), a leader in the congressional battle against the Administration proposal to cut back the social security cost-of-living adjustment.

Carlough said the increase for retirees covered by the union's National Pension Fund will be financed by a five-cent-an-hour contribution that local unions have negotiated with their employers. The benefits, based on a formula which takes into account the number of years a pensioner has been retired, will be paid each year in a lump sum "13th check" in addition to the regular monthly payments.

The voluntary Medicare supplement program, covering retirees and their spouses, will be underwritten by the pension funds. Participants will pay a portion of the costs, at a rate of $13 a month for an individual or $26 for a couple.

Pepper congratulated the union on its program and pledged to continue the fight to protect social security cost-of-living adjustments for all retirees, "most of whom do not have this kind of help available."

Import quotas termed essential for survival of U.S. shoe industry

The import-battered American shoe industry needs a five-year period of "global quotas" to reduce the flood of foreign footwear to about 55 percent of the U.S. market, unions, employers and members of Congress told the International Trade Commission.

"We are asking for sensible controls on import levels that have gone berserk," President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers testified. "With five years of quotas, this industry will be able to complete a sound program of modernization and become more competitive."

Finley noted in reference to his appearance before the commission a year ago, "I am beginning to think it is a rite of spring" to bring the plight of the U.S. shoe industry before the commission. Last year, the ITC decided industry didn't need import relief because the surviving shoe plants were still making a profit even though imports claimed 63 percent of the U.S. market. Today, shoe imports have taken over more than 70 percent of the market.

Workers' plight

The ACTWU president asked the commissioners what workers whose firms have gone out of business should be told. "Workers saw more than 100 factories close their doors on them in 1984 alone," he said, stressing that the wage and employment trends, both last year and now, unequivocally support a finding of serious injury.

"Decent and hard-working people should not have to see their jobs systematically shipped overseas to countries that don't have the slightest intention of practicing free trade principles," Finley said. When shoe workers are laid off, he said, "their prospects are extremely poor for finding new jobs," as their skills are not easily transferable.

"Without effective import relief and without modernization and improved productivity, there is very little hope for any jobs for U.S. shoe workers at all," Finley stressed.

The quota system proposed by the coalition would generate some 37,000 direct jobs and 23,000 related jobs—a 33 percent increase over current direct employment levels.

May decision

The ITC will determine in mid-May whether the shoe industry has been injured by imports and forward its recommendations to President Reagan on July 1. The President then has 60 days to act on the matter.

Sen. William S. Cohen (R-Me.), whose state has been hard hit by shoe plant closings, noted that last year two shoe plants each week closed their doors, throwing thousands of workers out of their jobs.

Cohen, his Democratic colleague from Maine, George D. Mitchell, and 15 other senators recently introduced the American Footwear Industry Recovery Act of 1985. An identical measure was introduced in the House, sponsored by Olympia J. Snowe (R-Me.) and 48 other House members. That measure calls for eight years of quotas, limiting imports to just 50 percent of the U.S. market.

Snowe said that Maine is the largest shoe producing state in the nation, but given the conditions that exist today, "the honor is becoming a little like being shuffleboard champion on board the Titantic."

Trade imbalance

She stressed that while the U.S. market lays wide open for the taking, foreign markets remain closed to U.S. footwear. "Japan limits footwear imports to 1 million pairs annually, a figure that can be only described as ridiculous when the U.S. imports an average of 2 million pairs every day."

The entire Maine congressional delegation urged the ITC to rule that the domestic shoe industry has been injured and to support quotas proposed by the Footwear Trade Action Coalition, comprised of ACTWU, Food & Commercial Workers and the Footwear Industries of America.

The coalition called on the ITC to limit imports to 55.2 percent of the domestic market. It also suggested using the 1981-82 period as the "quota floor" level, thereby limiting imports to roughly 427 million pairs of shoes annually, with the quota levels adjusted quarterly to hold market shares at the proposed levels.

Industry plan

FIA President George Langstaff told the panel the industry is ready with a five-year plan of action to improve its manufacturing technology and increase productivity so that it will be competitive with the low-wage exporting countries, such as Korea, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore and Brazil.

Also testifying in favor of the quotas were Jeanne Hebert and Barry Huff, officials of the Shoe Workers Association of Maine. Hebert told about the closing of the plant where she worked in Livermore Falls. Over the past two years, she said, "We have been joined by 5,700 shoe workers in Maine and 25,000 more in 37 other states" who have lost their jobs to imports.

She stressed that the town's unemployment rate is still more than 20 percent, and other employers that depended on the shoe workers as consumers are feeling the effects of the job losses. Besides the economic effect, there has been a human effect on the town as the dropout rate at the high school doubled, and child abuse, alcoholism and crime have all increased.

Representatives of the Federal Trade Commission, testifying before the ITC, voiced strong opposition to quotas and instead favored temporary trade adjustment assistance for workers who are thrown out of their jobs by increasing imports. The FTC based its concern on the availability of "cheap" shoes for low-income consumers. The quota system recommended by the FIA provides for maintaining the 1985 level on low-cost imported shoes.

Demolition Derby

AMERICAN CRAFTSMEN and production workers are the best in the world. But they can't beat foreign competition as long as their own government and their own employers are stacking the cards by exporting their jobs and importing all the things they used to make.

In recent weeks there have been signs that even some of President Reagan's most faithful disciples are beginning to doubt the wisdom of trashing our country's productive capacity, wiping out the jobs of millions of Americans and the economies of hundreds of communities and entrusting our daily needs and our future to foreign suppliers and foreign moneylenders.

We can hardly blame the Japanese for sending more cars than our market can sustain without grave injury. The fault is here; the enemy is among us. Common sense should tell us that the guilt lies more with those who threw open the gates rather than those who accepted the invitation.

America's place in the world is not endangered solely by unfair foreign competition, but equally by American mismanagement, furthered by the Administration's disregard for the antitrust laws and its dogmatic conviction that chaos is better than regulation.

Wave after wave of corporate raids and takeovers, which amount to open, unpunished extortion, are draining the substance of business and industry.

Any pirate who gets the backing of a few banks makes a pass at a company. That company, in turn, takes defensive measures that involve running up the price of its stock, setting up "golden parachutes" for its executives, swallowing something called a "poison pill" and preparing to scorch its own earth, all designed to make what's left of the company an unattractive proposition.

WHEN THE DUST settles, the pirate walks away with 50 or 80 or 100 million dollars, leaving a weaker, poorer company behind, or, if he gains control, he closes plants, fires workers and deals off divisions to pay for the cost of his adventure.

All this takes place with no redeeming social value, without producing a dollar's worth of goods or services. Workers, stockholders and the public at large pay the freight. Nobody is better off except the takeover artist, the lawyers and investment bankers who share in the millions that are skimmed from corporate treasuries and stockholder equities, and stock speculators who know when to get in and out, fast.

Instead of going to jail or being held up to public shame, these highly professional extortionists are offered up by television and magazine interviewers as proper objects of respect, admiration and envy.

But nobody seems to care. Those who most piously warn us against the dangers of protectionism, and who exhort American workers to work harder to overcome foreign competition, seem to have nothing but applause for the highbinders who steer productive American enterprises in a wild demolition derby.

Crime in the Fields

IF THE PUNISHMENT could fit the crime, OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland would spend many a hot workday in a pesticide-sprayed field far from the nearest toilet or source of soap and water.

Then, just possibly, he might have second thoughts about his callous refusal to issue a standard that would require large farm employers to provide the most basic sanitary facilities for field workers.

OSHA's professional staff strongly urged such a standard, citing the spread of diseases linked to poor sanitation. Five staff experts, ordered to prepare a justification for OSHA's refusal to issue a standard, protested that such a position "can only bring discredit to the agency and ourselves."

In light of Rowland's decision, it is clear where the discredit falls.

Switch on social security mocks Reagan's promises

By Press Associates, Inc.

Like a moth circling a flame, Ronald Reagan cannot leave social security alone. He gets burned again and again. Still he comes back.

Reagan's latest attack on social security came in a proposal to reduce the cost-of-living increase in pension benefits and cut back Medicare. Donald Regan, his chief of staff, said he made the deal with Senate Republican leaders "on behalf of the President."

Critics were quick to quote Reagan's election-year pledges to keep his hands off social security:

- Reagan said, during the debate with Walter Mondale last Oct. 7 in Louisville: "With regard to social security . . . I will say this—a President should never say 'never' but I'm going to violate that rule and say, 'Never.' I will never stand for a reduction of the social security benefits for the people that are now getting them."
- Reagan, on a visit to Wesley Park Senior Center in Milwaukee last Nov. 3: "There is no secret plan to do anything about depriving people who are dependent on social security, and there never will be as far as I have anything to say about it."
- Reagan, in an interview with the right-wing "Human Events" magazine last December: "Well, I have to say my pledge during the campaign carried with it the clear implication that present social security beneficiaries would get their cost-of-living increases as well. I made that pledge and so, therefore, I feel bound by it."

Runaway deficit

But by January, the runaway federal deficit took center stage on Capitol Hill. Because Reagan is holding off on tax increases as a last resort, the White House-GOP strategy was to focus initially on budget cuts, including social security.

Reagan tried to put the monkey on the back of Congress by telling a news conference on Jan. 9: "Up on the Hill there was a widespread feeling about freezing the COLAs and social security. . . . I would have to look at that situation and what I was faced with, with regard to a possible congressional mandate."

But congressional Democrats wisely stayed away from that trap. What emerged was not a mandate from Capitol Hill but rather a cleverly contrived plan by Reagan and Senate GOP leaders to palm off a reduction in social security and other federal benefit COLAs as an increase.

The hard reality, according to an analysis by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, is that Reagan's proposed 2 percent hike in benefit COLAs would fail to keep up with inflation and push 650,000 people below the poverty line.

Three years of cuts

The Administration claims it needs the $20.8 billion in social security cuts over the next three years as part of its deficit-reduction package.

This contradicts what Reagan has said time and again: "Social security is not part of the deficit problem. It is totally financed by a payroll tax, and that tax is dedicated to that one program."

Social security has been a political football ever since it was made part of the unified budget in 1969.

The Reagan approach is consistent with his career opposition to government programs. For a quarter-century, he favored making social security voluntary. The program was steadily improved over the decades until Reagan was elected. In 1981, the salami tactics began with elimination of minimum benefits, lump-sum death benefits, and college student benefits. The cruel campaign to remove alleged disability "cheats" followed.

Social security was one of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's proudest achievements. FDR said payroll tax financing was deliberately put in "to give the contributors a legal, moral and political right to collect their pensions and their unemployment benefits. With those taxes in there, no damn politician can ever scrap my social security program." April marked the 40th anniversary of FDR's death and, in his memory, it is time to fight once again.

Public View of PACs—Mixed Bag

How does the public feel about political action committees (PACs) and their influence on elections? One poll measured the reaction of California voters, and it was close to a stand-off, with 36 percent thinking PACs over-all have a positive influence on the political process, 42 percent negative, 22 percent no opinion.

Asked about PACs representing specific groups, voters gave highest backing to environmental and consumer organizations, lowest ranking to real estate interests and large corporations, bankers and lawyers.

Union PACs were rated 11th in a list of 17 different types of PACs with 36 percent of voters feeling union PACs are a good influence on the process, 47 percent calling them a bad influence, and 17 percent with no opinion.

Four out of five polled said they favor limitations on use of PAC funds, including an upper limit on the amount PACs can give to a candidate and a lid on amounts a candidate may accept from PACs in aggregate.

Following is the public judgment of the influence, good or bad, of various types of PAC.

| | Good | Bad | No Opinion |
|---|---|---|---|
| Environmental groups | 63% | 19% | 18% |
| Consumer groups | 63 | 20 | 17 |
| Teachers organizations | 58 | 23 | 19 |

Odds 'n Ends

REAGAN MISLEADS public when he says higher education cuts will affect only middle class students, American Association of State Colleges and Universities charges. Group claims 250,000 students from poor families would lose an average of $1,160 in grants and loans. In all, AASCU says, a half-million students from families with income below $25,000 would lose some aid as a result of Reagan proposals—105,000 of these from minorities groups.

BLACK CONSERVATIVES form political action committee, BLACK PAC, chaired by William Keyes who campaigned in North Carolina for Sen. Jesse Helms' re-election last year. Among founding members of the BLACK PAC advisory board: GOP Sens. Jeremiah Denton (Ala.), John East (N.C.), Orrin Hatch (Utah), and Reps. Jack Kemp (N.Y.), Newt Gingrich (Ga.), Phil Crane (Ill.).

GOP NATIONAL COMMITTEE announces more than 920,000 individuals made contributions to party during 1984 for a total of $62 million. Average donor gave $37.50. GOP claims cost of its fund-raising runs 22 percent of take, which is very efficient.

GOOD ADVICE, by the way, from GOP finance directors for political fund-raisers and spenders that's self-evident but too often forgotten. On debt, GOP says, you get into it when (1) you spend too much, (2) you don't raise enough, (3) you don't consult with experts, (4) you borrow. You get out of it when (1) you raise more money, (2) you spend less, (3) you don't borrow.

ONE MORE WORD from GOP on how much political money to ask for. "Ask a lot of people for a little money, or a few people for a lot of money. Better yet, ask a lot of people for a lot of money."

REAL TAX BREAKS in Reagan 1981 proposals went to corporations, study by Citizens for Tax Justice shows. Investment tax credits (you buy a machine and your tax liability is cut 10 percent of its cost) and accelerated write-offs will short Treasury nearly $400 billion in next five years, study reveals. Put them together with other corporate loopholes and the cost of these Reagan giveaways every year exceeds every federal program except defense, and is greater than outlays for all federal programs for the needy.

GOING FURTHER, tax study says seven major oil firms will by 1990 save $35 billion in federal taxes thanks to Reagan. And Reagan's old boss, General Electric, not only didn't pay any tax to the government the past three years—despite $6.5 billion in domestic profits—it actually got $283 million from the government. Then, there are 129 major U.S. firms that among them rolled up profits of $45 billion in 1983 and paid only four-tenths of one percent in taxes.

ANOTHER STUDY, this one by a congressional committee, turns up the news that some industries at-large pay hardly any tax—telecommunications firms two percent; railroads four percent. Chemicals, insurance, aerospace, and large banks—like GE—got refunds.

BUT DON'T WORRY, someone's paying taxes so the nation can function. And guess who that is. You. The average American wage earner coughed up 12 percent of his/her income to Internal Revenue—without any tax dodges, investment credits, or accelerated write-offs.

NOT SO THE RICH, however, who duck $24 billion in taxes a year by writing off investments in losing ventures in oil, cattle, real estate and in such exotica—can you believe it?—as llamas, oysters and treasure hunts. As a result of tax shelters like these and others, the Treasury estimates some 9,000 Americans earning more than $250,000 a year pay nothing in taxes.

Getting One Back

Republicans have been chortling over the recent party shift from Democrat to GOP of former UN Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, and before that of Rep. (now Sen.) Phil Gramm of Texas and a couple of other Boll Weevil Democratic House members.

Now, the Democrats get a chance. A member of the Nebraska legislature, James Pappas, switched his allegiance from the GOP. (Nebraska has a one-house legislature and candidates do not run as party members. However, they have party loyalties and usually vote that way.)

This might not seem like a big deal—two nationally known names for a complete unknown—but Pappas' change-over gives Democrats control of the state legislature.

And maybe there are a few future draft choices still to come.

Oh, That Gary Hart?

Will Democratic Sen. Gary Hart run for governor of California?

It just might be that he will.

If so, you say, would someone please explain why a Senator from Colorado would run for governor of *California.

Well, who says he's from Colorado? In fact, this Sen. Gary Hart isn't from Colorado. He is from California. And he isn't a U.S. Senator, he is a State Senator.

And his name is Gary Hart. And he is a Democrat.

And he is looking into running for his party's gubernatorial nomination in 1986.

And if you like parlays, look at all the possibilities that open up: Simultaneously a Gary Hart Senator from Colorado and a Gary Hart governor of California; a few years hence a Colorado Gary Hart as President with a California Governor or Senator Gary Hart. And a few years after that, a California President Gary Hart succeeding a Colorado President Gary Hart.

Here's a Switch

House Election Spending Dips

Spending in U.S. House elections in 1984 dipped substantially from the 1982 level—the first drop in campaign costs in memory.

Figures compiled by Common Cause from Federal Election Commission reports show spending by the 802 House candidates on the ballot November 6 was $165 million—down from $174.5 million in 1982, a 5.4 percent drop.

Though less was spent, a new high was reached in funds collected by House candidates. Even there, growth was only 7.3 percent compared to jumps in the range of 35-48 percent in recent election years. (Unspent funds hit a record $37.5 million, most of it held by incumbents.)

There are several possible reasons for reduced spending in House campaigns, though most observers remain uncertain of the precise cause(s) and it will take more scrutiny before anyone's sure. Among explanations advanced: Fewer open-seat races than usual, only 27 compared to 58 in 1982 (open-seat contests run up to 70 percent higher than average races in which an incumbent is involved); 64 candidates unopposed, reducing the need for large-scale spending; fewer marginal, closely contested races than in recent years.

Even though over-all costs declined, a record 24 districts showed combined outlays by major party candidates of $1 million or more, and 35 candidates—18 GOP, 17 Democratic—shelled out more than $600,000 each.

One Vote Counts!

Abstainers Recant

It happened in the annual town meeting in Andover, Mass.

Citizens were asked to vote on permitting construction of a parking lot by a private firm on public land.

Debate was heated. When it ended, the pro-parking lot position won out—by just one vote, 257-256.

Nineteen citizens who were present abstained from voting.

Further discussion ensued. A second vote was demanded and held. The parking lot was defeated 271-261.

No matter how you feel about private parking lots on public land, the lesson is the same for all of us:

The act of abstaining affects the outcome of a lot of elections.

It counts for one to vote . . . and one vote counts.

Emergency action pressed on trade, overvalued dollar

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called for emergency measures to deal with a world trade and monetary imbalance that has put the brakes on the nation's economic recovery, forced up the cost of U.S. goods on the world market and wiped out the jobs of American workers.

Labor's proposals, advanced by AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, included:

- Convening of an international conference to negotiate a realignment of currencies to achieve a better balance in international trade. Overvaluation of the dollar is a major factor in the huge U.S. trade deficit.

- Imposition by the President of a temporary 15-percent tariff surcharge—a step that can be taken under existing law. Section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974 allows the President to impose such a surcharge for up to 150 days or to take other steps, including quotas, to deal with large U.S. balance of payments deficits.

"Such temporary actions could and should be used to help alleviate the present trade imbalance," Oswald stressed.

Deficit rise

The AFL-CIO's documentation of the case for emergency action traced the parallel growth of the U.S. trade deficit and the exchange rate of the dollar in relation to other currencies. A high dollar value means that other countries have to pay more for American-made goods, thus hurting exports. And it means that imported goods can be sold at lower prices in the United States—or at a higher profit for merchants.

The merchandise trade deficit—which bears most directly on the loss of jobs—climbed from $25 billion in 1980 to $69 billion by 1983 and jumped to $123 billion last year. It's "still rising," Oswald noted.

Over the same period, the value of the dollar rose 58 percent above the average for 10 other major countries. As a result, "American costs needed to be 58 percent lower in 1984 than in 1980 in order to be at the same competitive position that they held just four years earlier," he said.

To offset that imbalance, Oswald said, "material, capital and labor costs would all need to be lowered 58 percent."

American workers would have to be 58 percent more productive—or take a 58 percent pay cut—and that doesn't make sense, Oswald noted.

Workers shouldn't have to take pay cuts—or suffer loss of their jobs—to offset the effects of the government's economic policies. It is the rise of the dollar's exchange rates, not any rise in workers' wages, that made U.S. goods less competitive, Oswald asserted.

The AFL-CIO testimony noted also that the overvalued dollar has encouraged U.S. companies to build plants overseas. And that in turn meant that more jobs went overseas—both in plant construction and permanently in manufacturing.

"The whole quagmire of misaligned exchange rates and abnormal trade imbalance

Birthday wishes

Senators should cut birthday cakes—not benefits as President Reagan is demanding—to mark the 50th anniversary of social security and the 20th anniversaries of Medicare and Medicaid, senior citizens urged as they delivered cakes to every member of the U.S. Senate. Addressing the Capitol Hill rally is President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens. Former Cabinet member Arthur Flemming, seated, spoke on behalf of the Save Our Security coalition. The cakes, donated by the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, were baked by members of BC&T Local 118.

Brock nomination gets Senate panel's support

William E. Brock will take office as Secretary of Labor with bipartisan good wishes and a realistic awareness of the problems he is inheriting.

He got both during confirmation hearings by the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee. The unanimous endorsement reflected Brock's personal popularity in the Senate where he once served, and the questions reflected the concern of senators of both parties with the drift of the department he will head.

The Labor Dept. has been under caretaker administration since last October, when Raymond J. Donovan took a leave of absence after his indictment on criminal fraud charges.

When Donovan resigned in March, President Reagan tapped Brock, then the U.S. Trade Representative, to succeed him. Brock had been Republican national chairman after having served in both the House and Senate but his appointment was not seen as a partisan move.

Brock had won the respect of many who disagreed with him on specific issues, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed the hope that his appointment could achieve "a new and constructive relationship" between the trade union federation and the Labor Dept.

At the Senate hearings, the questioning of Brock was more in the nature of lobbying by senators on issues in which they had special interest.

On the Republican side, Chairman Orrin

Consumer prices edge up as weekly wages lag behind

Sharply higher prices for gasoline and medical care costs pushed up the government's consumer price index four-tenths of 1 percent in March as workers' real weekly earnings continued to lag behind the year-earlier level, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The latest increase in retail prices—the largest monthly rise in more than a year—raised the index for Urban Wage Earners (CPI-W) 4 percent above the March 1984 level. The index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U) rose five-tenths of 1 percent over the month, and was 4.1 percent higher over the year.

While real, or inflation-adjusted, weekly earnings of production or nonsupervisory workers in the private sector rose only three-tenths of 1 percent in March, they were down by seven-tenths of 1 percent

Budget battle opens

Humane approach to deficit urged

The battle of the budget got under way in the Senate with Republican leaders counting on an emotional television appeal by President Reagan and a carefully orchestrated lobbying blitz by his business allies to tilt the outcome.

The budget Reagan says is necessary for America's future calls for reducing social security payments over the next three years and slashing or wiping out entirely important government programs.

It would push up military spending, adding billions to the deficit. But while warning against "immoral" deficit spending, Reagan said he will veto any tax increase, "no matter how cleverly it is disguised."

To the AFL-CIO, it is the Reagan budget that is immoral.

In a letter to senators on the eve of the budget debate, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged passage of amendments that take "a more humane approach to deficit reduction."

Denison assailed the "immorality" of social security reductions that would drive an estimated 570,000 more people into poverty and other budget proposals to raise their health care costs. Congress should not "ignore the educational needs of our children, and strangle our transportation, postal and economic development programs," he insisted.

Tax loopholes

Such a course in the name of deficit reduction is "morally repugnant," Denison said, at a time when federal tax revenues are being lost through tax provisions that allowed 65 companies making nearly $50 billion in profits to escape federal income taxes.

If other programs are to be frozen, so should defense spending, Denison said. There should be at least a minimum tax on profitable corporations, he urged.

The Republican leadership strategy is to try to keep the budget amendment-free, if possible, or to come up at the end with a package plan that wipes out most of the amendments approved. Toward that goal, the business groups that have signed up as "100 percenters" for the Reagan budget are lobbying for no-amendment commitments from senators.

Denison stressed in his letter to senators that the AFL-CIO considers the budget resolution as brought to the Senate floor "wholly unacceptable."

And "if toward the end of the amending process, there should be a substitute

Worker, union rights under siege around globe

By James M. Shevis

A deterioration in the general climate for free trade unionism the world over, combined with a more hostile management style often backed by government policies, makes the need for union solidarity greater than ever, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions warned.

In its second annual survey of violations of trade union rights, the Brussels-based ICFTU said the continuing increase in the number of violations clearly poses a major problem to workers.

Among its conclusions, the report stressed that workers and their unions have a responsibility to face up to the struggle.

"Good laws and a constructive management attitude from the top down can help prevent anti-union activities, but union strength at the workplace is the only effective deterrent against union-busters," the report observed.

"The traditional virtues of unity, membership participation, and effective representation are therefore the primary defense against the union-busters."

Anti-union discrimination and union-busting were the subject of an entire section of the survey. Other chapters described the trade union rights situation in different parts of the world and focused on violations of union rights in the public service sector.

The report was released at the recent meeting in Washington of the ICFTU's executive board. The confederation represents 83 million workers in 145 labor organizations in 99 countries of the free world.

The survey was issued in keeping with the statement adopted at the ICFTU's 13th World Congress in Oslo in 1983, which stressed that the full exercise of trade union rights is possible only under governments that guarantee fundamental human rights.

The report noted that in the period since the last survey, the ICFTU—in close coordination with the efforts of its affiliates, including the AFL-CIO—took specific actions to protect and promote trade union rights in all parts of the world.

These actions included several missions in 1984 and early 1985 to countries where trade union rights were under particularly severe attack, such as Indonesia, the Philippines, New Zealand, Turkey, and areas of South America and Central America.

The ICFTU also made numerous representations to governments violating the principle of freedom of association and continued to provide humanitarian, legal, and organizational support to trade unionists and their organizations operating under repressive regimes.

Additional measures

"Further work will have to be done by the ICFTU, the International Trade Secretariats, and their affiliates to identify the problems and strengthen the defense of trade union rights worldwide, including in many of the so-called advanced democracies," the report said.

Skipping from continent to continent, the survey focused on the general situation in countries where violations of union rights are most flagrant.

In Africa, for instance, the situation with respect to human and trade union rights "remains very much the same as reported in the previous survey," the ICFTU said. The report specifically cited South Africa where "the racist nature of the apartheid system negates fundamental human rights, and therefore severely restricts the full exercise of trade union rights."

Elsewhere around the globe, the survey found that the trade union situation in Central America "continues to give cause for concern" with "very serious problems arising from deep-rooted economic and social injustice" in all countries except Costa Rica.

"In South America, on the other hand, a number of countries have returned to democratic regimes, and this has also led to an improvement of the trade union rights situation," the report observed.

Serious violations continue in rural areas of Brazil, however, and in Chile basic human and trade union rights are still being violated more than 11 years after the Pinochet regime came to power, the survey noted.

In Asia, the most serious violations of basic trade union rights occur in communist countries where the official trade unions are instruments of the Communist Party, and fundamental union rights are denied in law as well as in practice.

In Iran, new cases of violent suppression of strikes took place last year. Following a three-week strike at a steel complex in Isfahan in November, a number of strikers were executed and others arrested.

In Turkey, basic trade union rights continue to be violated as martial law remains in force in 23 of the country's 67 provinces.

A "distinct improvement" in the situation in New Zealand took place in 1984 with the advent of the Labor government. The outlawing of union security arrangements that occurred a year earlier has been lifted, and negotiations with the trade union movement have begun on how to terminate the current wage freeze, the report noted.

Wage-fixing

As in 1983-84, the governments of a number of West European countries have resorted to wage-fixing and similar measures that severely limit the right to collective bargaining.

In Poland and elsewhere in Eastern Europe, the trade union rights situation remains in flagrant violation of the principles of freedom of association. The official trade unions are strictly subordinated to the Communist Party by law and serve primarily as agents for the implementation of economic plans and to maintain labor discipline, the ICFTU pointed out.

In the chapter on violation of trade union rights in the public service, the report found "disturbing" the extent to which workers in that sector are prevented from enjoying adequate rights to form and join labor organizations, bargain collectively, and take strike action.

"Even in those countries where their rights are recognized, public service unions find that they are under attack by governments who are seeking to restrict these rights," the survey found.

Thomas R. Donahue

Tough sanctions against South Africa backed to overcome apartheid policy

South Africa's black trade unionists fully support proposed economic sanctions as a means of dismantling the racist system of apartheid in their country and are prepared to accept the consequences, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told Congress.

"They see no other solution," Donahue told a joint hearing of the House subcommittees on Africa and on international economic policy and trade.

"We have close, extensive contacts with the black trade unions in South Africa," Donahue said, "and it is very clear to me there is a very strong consensus for sanctions."

Some 20 bills aimed at bringing pressure to bear on the Pretoria government to end apartheid have been introduced in the current session of Congress.

While the AFL-CIO supports legislation proposed by Rep. William H. Gray III (D-Pa.) and other pending measures, Donahue said it would go further and seek a policy of even tougher sanctions.

The Gray bill, Donahue noted, includes recommendations for a number of actions also proposed by the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions at its recent meeting in Washington, including a ban on the sale of gold Kruggerands and South African coal in the United States and an end to new U.S. investment in South Africa.

Labor is concerned, however, at the failure of all the pending measures to press for the abolition of South Africa's so-called Preventive Detention laws "that are used to harass, intimidate, and imprison labor leaders and others without trial," Donahue observed.

"These laws, as the AFL-CIO Executive Council pointed out, in effect, nullify much of whatever benefit accrued from previous legislation recognizing the trade union rights of black workers.

"It is not enough to bring external pressure to bear on the South African government. Change must come from within. But such change will not come unless the democratic forces within South Africa—preeminently the black trade union movement—are able to organize and effectively represent the will of the majority.

"It is therefore imperative that we do all that we can to remove the coercive impediments to their exercise of freedom of association."

Fighting for freedom

Donahue said congressional measures aimed at wiping out the Preventive Detention laws would be a "powerful encouragement to those who are fighting on the front lines of freedom in South Africa."

Since last November, more than 2,900 Americans in 26 cities have been arrested for civil disobedience to demonstrate their abhorrence of apartheid and their displeasure at the Reagan Administration's "constructive engagement" policy toward South Africa. Many of the arrests occurred at protests outside the South African embassy in Washington and at consulates in other American cities.

Inside South Africa, 21 black unionists are being held in jails without charges or trial under the Preventive Detention laws, some for more than six months. Donahue urged the subcommittees to pressure the Administration to demand their release.

He said emergence of the black trade union movement even in the face of repression "holds the greatest promise for the ultimate elimination of apartheid through peaceful means."

"In South Africa, as elsewhere, the ability of people to organize and control their own institutions—that is, to effectively exercise freedom of association—is the best alternative to the bloody resolution of conflict," Donahue said. "And if violent revolution comes to South Africa, there will be no winners, only unimaginable suffering."

SEIU gains pact with realty group covering 30,000

New York—The Service Employees negotiated a new agreement with the owners of 2,400 apartment buildings providing wage increases averaging 17 percent over three years for some 30,000 handymen, porters, doormen and elevator operators in Manhattan, Queens, Brooklyn and Staten Island.

The agreement between SEIU Local 32B-32J and the Realty Advisory Board on Labor Relations was reached on Apr. 21, a day after the previous contract expired. The union is still negotiating with the owners of 1,600 buildings not associated with the realty board. In the past, the board agreement has set the pattern for unaffiliated owners.

Under the agreement, SEIU members will receive weekly raises of $20 in each of the first two years of the contract and a $21 increase in the third year. Their weekly wages now range from $335 to $327 a week.

The owners had sought a two-tiered wage scale under which new employees would be paid $89 less a week than current workers.

Ken Brown plans to retire as GCIU head in September

Kenneth J. Brown will retire as president of the Graphic Communications Union in September. He has headed the GCIU and its predecessor unions since 1960 and has been an AFL-CIO vice president since August 1983.

He announced his retirement in letters to the union's officers, general board and local unions and went to his Toronto local Apr. 20 for a pre-retirement seminar where he said he could "finally take advantage of the retirement plans" he helped to set up.

Under the GCIU constitution, Recording/Financial Sec. James J. Norton will become acting president until a successor is elected in a membership referendum next January.

Brown, 59, joined the Amalgamated Lithographers of America in 1942 and was elected president of Toronto ALA Local 12 in 1955. He was president of the international union in 1960 when he was 34.

The ALA's merger with the Photoengravers in 1964 created the Lithographers & Photoengravers International Union, which in 1972 merged with the Bookbinders to form the Graphic Arts International Union. In July 1983, GAIU merged with the Printing & Graphic Communications Union to form the GCIU.

Brown serves on the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Committees on Economic Policy, Public Relations and International Affairs, and is a vice president of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Marge Cronin retires, COPE research director

Margaret Cronin, director of research for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, retired Apr. 26 after 37 years of service to the labor movement.

She joined the research staff of the AFL Labor's League for Political Education soon after it was formed in 1948, stayed in political research when the respective AFL and CIO political committees merged into COPE in 1955.

Cronin, who is 63, was appointed COPE director of research in 1977.

Compensation lacking

Unions call for action on job health hazards

America's workers need better protection against toxic substances and a more adequate system of compensation for job-related diseases that often take years to reveal themselves, the AFL-CIO testified at congressional hearings.

State workers' compensation laws have proved "woefully inadequate" to deal with occupational illness, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Jay Power told the House Labor Standards subcommittee. He said only a small percentage of victims ever get compensation—and then usually only after litigation.

Supporting statements to the subcommittee by the Industrial Union Dept. and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. emphasized the concern of a broad spectrum of unions whose members have been exposed to occupational health hazards.

Power said a federal program is clearly needed, and he urged that it be "comprehensive in scope, covering known occupational health hazards" and providing machinery for extending coverage to additional hazards "as they become known."

Such a program should make allowances in the time period for filing claims for "the long latency period for occupational diseases," Power said. It should presume eligibility for benefits if a worker who has been exposed on the job to a substance known to increase the risk of developing a disabling illness does develop that illness.

Broad remedies needed

Power cautioned against making a workers' compensation system the sole remedy for persons whose lives may have been jeopardized by employers who deliberately exposed them to health risks. Occupational disease is such a serious and growing problem in the United States, he said, that "every means of encouraging preventive action" should be taken—"including the deterrent effect of possible legal action."

In similar vein, he urged that third-party legal claims against manufacturers for additional remedies should remain available to workers.

The possibility that a manufacturer will be held accountable "has proved to be a major incentive for high standards of testing and production, as well as comprehensive notice of possible hazard," Power testified.

IUD President Howard Samuel's statement urged Congress to be as specific as possible in its intent so that OSHA and other Executive Branch agencies have a clear mandate to act.

State workers' compensation laws have proved inadequate for compensating victims of occupational disease, Samuel noted, partly because of the legal difficulty in proving cause of the ailment—such as cancer contracted by coke oven workers in steel mills.

High-risk groups

He urged, as did the other union statements, passage of legislation to spur identification and notification of persons who are in high-risk groups because of past or present exposure to health hazards. Labor is supporting a bill that has been introduced by Rep. Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.) and Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.).

President Robert Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. stressed that the issue is not just "of abstract concern" to unions.

Nearly every building trades union has members who have been exposed to asbestos dust, a known cancer agent, Georgine said.

Respiratory diseases have been linked to toxic welding gases, Georgine's statement noted. Painters are exposed to harmful fumes and solvents.

Funding compensation payments is a major problem, Georgine acknowledged. But "any mechanism, for paying compensation should place the burden of payment on the manufacturers of the toxic substances," he urged.

AFL-CIO's Rudy Oswald warns of trade crisis.

Emergency remedy pressed to correct trade imbalance

cries out for an international solution," Oswald urged.

While the International Monetary Fund is charged with promoting exchange rate stability, Oswald noted that "it does not provide a forum for negotiations to arrive at an exchange rate alignment that will promote greater balance for international trade and economic growth."

There is urgent need, he said, for major industrial nations to set up a forum for "continuing negotiations to make adjustments from time to time that would produce an equilibrium of international exchange rates" and avert the type of trade deficit the United States is experiencing.

Meanwhile, the trade imbalance can at least be alleviated by the temporary tariff surcharge available to the President, Oswald said. In the absence of presidential action, he said, Congress should direct such a move.

In the case of developing countries, where low wage rates are a principal factor in penetration of the U.S. market, Oswald urged "fair trade import quotas" that would allow these nations limited shares of the U.S. market without flooding the marketplace to the detriment of America's workers.

Imports are often defended as a boon to consumers. But Oswald noted that "U.S. consumers get a relatively small part of the wage differential advantage as the foreign producers, exporters, importers and retailers each take as much advantage to increase their mark-up as the market will permit."

Civil service politicking

House report takes Devine to task

A House committee delivered a sharp, bipartisan rebuke to Donald J. Devine, top administrator of the federal civil service until his term as director of the Office of Personnel Management ran out last month.

Its report found that Devine—who openly campaigned for right-wing Republicans in the 1984 election—was wrong on all counts last fall when he threatened three Democratic governors with loss of federal funds if state agencies gave any assistance to nonpartisan voter registration drives.

Devine's selection of the Democratic governors of New York, Ohio and Texas as the target for warnings amounted to "selective application and misuse" of the law he cited, the House Government Operations Committee unanimously concluded. Further, the report noted, there is no evidence that any law was violated and Congress is on record that "voter registration efforts should be encouraged by governmental entities at all levels."

President Reagan earlier this year nominated Devine for a second four-year term as OPM director, but a reputation as a bare-knuckles political operative has put Devine's confirmation in doubt. The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee put off a vote when it appeared that the nomination might be defeated.

Testimony before the committee showed that while serving as head of a supposedly nonpartisan career civil service, Devine and hand-picked aides had campaigned actively across the country for conservative Republican candidates—while ostensibly on government business.

In an Administration that has boasted of cutting down the size of government, Devine added in his own agency a new layer of five politically appointed regional representatives. Like Devine himself, they were veterans of Republican political campaigns.

Devine had also come under heavy attack from unions representing federal workers for a "dirty tricks" memo prepared in his office that proposed to manipulate a pay equity study so as to pit "union against union and both against radical feminist groups."

When Devine's term expired on Mar. 26, his deputy, Loretta Cornelius, became acting director of the agency. She immediately hired Devine as her executive assistant—a newly-created $72,300 a year job.

OPEIU unit gets 3 years' back pay in NLRB award

The National Labor Relations Board ordered a California-based company that closed its Missouri branch to avoid bargaining with the Office & Professional Employees to pay workers it fired more than three years' of back wages.

OPEIU Local 13 organized the St. Charles, Mo., facility of Orange Data, Inc. in early 1981, and was certified as representative of the office employees there in September.

Just before certification, however, a company official threatened workers repeatedly if they chose the union, the NLRB found. The threats continued until the company issued termination notices to the workers in June 1981.

Five months later, the company transferred computer processing work to its home office in California, and discharged its 11 employees in Missouri.

The NLRB found that Orange Data engaged in a number of unfair labor practices "because its employees engaged in union and/or concerted activities for purposes of collective bargaining or mutual aid and protection."

Besides ordering the company to bargain with OPEIU on closing the St. Charles unit, the board ordered Orange Data to pay discharged employees their normal wage rate from November 1981 through March 1985, when the ruling was issued.

Copper strikers push corporate campaign

New York—The 13-union coalition fighting Phelps Dodge Corp. took its campaign to the annual stockholders meeting of Manufacturers Hanover Bank, challenging the seating of Phelps Dodge Chairman George Munroe on its board and questioning the bank's loans to the union-busting copper company.

The unions withheld votes representing some 112,000 shares of bank stock from Munroe during balloting.

In addressing stockholders, Joseph Uehlein of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., accused Munroe of "financial mismanagement." He questioned Munroe's continued tenure on the board in light of Phelps Dodge's losses of $406 million over the past three years. Manufacturers Hanover is a major creditor of the troubled copper company, which owed it $30 million in 1984.

Uehlein also challenged the bank's loans to Chile, pointing out that the influx of low-cost copper to the United States from Chile's state-owned mines undercuts U.S. copper producers, costing the U.S. jobs.

The action was largely symbolic, Uehlein said, but served to encourage members of the union coalition on strike against Phelps Dodge since July 1, 1983.

The walkout was called when the company refused to accept an industry pattern agreement. Phelps Dodge has a long history of union-busting attempts.

Shares withheld from Munroe's vote included 89,400 in New York City employee pension funds, 11,000 by the Operating Engineers, 6,700 by Graphic Communications Local 51-M, and 4,000 by the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The union coalition members are the Steelworkers, Carpenters, Boilermakers, Machinists, Electrical Workers, United Transportation Union, Chemical Workers, Painters, Railway Carmen, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Operating Engineers, the Morenci- Clifton Metal Trades Council, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Louisiana-Pacific boycott stepped up

The Carpenters will step up boycott activities against the struck Louisiana-Pacific Corp. with rallies across the country May 4 to handbill some 1,000 retail stores that sell L-P products.

In announcing L-P Boycott Day, Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell said, "Our consumer boycott has cost L-P, and until we achieve justice for our striking members, we will do everything in our power to make the company recognize the heavy price of its irresponsible actions."

The 22-month-old strike began when L-P, the nation's second largest lumber 17 lumber mills in the Pacific Northwest to strike. The strikers are members of the union's Western Council of Lumber Production & Industrial Workers. The council negotiated pattern agreements with 135 other lumber firms that L-P flatly rejected.

The L-P boycott was endorsed by the AFL-CIO in December 1983.

City workers win 19% gain in N.Y. pact

New York—District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees reached tentative agreement with the city administration on a new three-year contract covering 115,000 city employees.

Council 37 President Victor Gotbaum said the contract package would raise workers' pay and benefits 19.1 percent over three years.

The AFSCME district council represents clerical and blue-collar workers, engineers, accountants, school-crossing guards, librarians and health-service workers employed by the city government.

The agreement, which was scheduled to be voted on by union members Apr. 25, would give city workers pay raises of 5 percent in each of the first two years and 6 percent in the third year, as well as additional fringe benefits. The increases would be retroactive to June 30, 1984, when the last contract expired.

The economic package also provides for an additional $500 a year for employees with 15 years of service.

The average salary of AFSCME members under the old contract is $16,000.

Under the new agreement workers gained the right to a 12th paid holiday in honor of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King's birthday.

In a concession to the city, the union agreed that workers hired after July 1 would get only 10 vacation days, to be increased to 20 over four years.

The AFSCME agreement is expected to serve as a pattern for settlements with other city workers. Talks are underway with teachers, police, sanitation workers and other municipal employees.

Earl J. Kruse

Kruse succeeds Wiederkehr as head of Roofers

Earl J. Kruse has been elected president of the Roofers by the union's executive board to succeed Joseph A. Wiederkehr, who resigned.

Kruse, 55, a third generation roofer, is a 35-year member of Local 11 in Chicago where he held a number of offices and served as trustee for the local's pension, vacation and health and welfare funds. He was elected vice president of the international in 1972 and has served as special assistant to the president since 1979.

Kruse, whose term as president will expire in 1988, is a member of the union's liaison committee, which coordinates activities between the Roofers and contractor associations. He also has been involved in administering the union's apprenticeship and safety and health programs.

Wiederkehr had taken over the union's presidency three months ago, after Roy E. Johnson retired in January.

Wiederkehr, 60, had been business manager of Local 20 in Kansas City since 1968 and an international vice president since 1970.

Glory days of CIO recalled 50 years after its founding

By Candice Johnson

The 50th anniversary of the founding of the Committee for Industrial Organization (CIO) was marked by a special meeting of the National Capital Labor History Society at AFL-CIO headquarters.

Members and guests gathered to celebrate the occasion and to hear reminiscences of the "glory days" of the CIO by a number of its pioneers.

Victor Reuther, who headed the Auto Workers' International Affairs Dept. before his retirement in 1972, recalled the dramatic organizing and bargaining struggles of workers in the steel, auto, rubber and other industries. He called the industrial organizing drive of the 1930s and 1940s perhaps "the finest hour of the trade union movement" because "so many millions of new workers were drawn into labor's ranks."

Reuther described his early organizing experiences at Kelsey-Hayes Wheel, an auto parts factory in Detroit. The drive to organize Kelsey came on the eve of the great sit-down battles throughout Michigan, he noted, and 3,000 of the plant's 5,000 workers went on strike for a union contract.

Workers of different nationality and race, needing leaflets in seven languages, "responded to the simple message that in unity there is strength" and "that workers need to defend themselves against corporate greed and corporate arrogancy," a message that still makes sense for American workers, Reuther said.

Initial skepticism

George Weaver, former executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee, said the CIO's announced objective of organizing all workers regardless of race, creed, religion or sex was met with "enthusiasm, hope and skepticism" by the black community. Weaver said the CIO's activities "laid the groundwork for success" in the human rights field because campaigns were geared "not only to organize workers in plants, but to extend influence in the communities."

Labor historian Nelson Lichtenstein, an associate professor of history at Catholic University, discussed the CIO's role in advancing the cause of social and economic democracy.

He said the CIO conferred "industrial citizenship" upon mass production workers. It allowed and often required immigrant workers "to participate in the main stream of politics and American life." Lichtenstein agreed that the CIO brought this citizenship to black workers for the first time and said the nation's first civil rights movement actually began in the 1940s.

Larry Rogin, former director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, said today's organizing climate and problems are different from the 1930s and labor must take advantage of every opportunity. He cited the recent AFL-CIO Executive Council report on "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions" as a necessary step for the labor movement to examine its cause and future.

Founders

The CIO's founding committee was spearheaded by John L. Lewis of the Mine Workers and included leaders of the Clothing Workers, Typographical Union, Ladies' Garment Workers, Textile Workers, Oil & Refinery Workers, Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers and the Hatters.

The group's early aim—as expressed in a 1935 statement of purpose—was to "foster recognition and acceptance of collective bargaining in basic industries; to counsel and advise unorganized and newly organized groups of workers; to bring them under the banner and in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor as industrial organizations."

But relations between the AFL and CIO generally deteriorated and by 1938 had broken down completely. Unions affiliated with both organizations were first suspended and then expelled from the AFL.

The CIO held its first constitutional convention in Pittsburgh in November 1938 when it became the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The two labor groups, under AFL President George Meany and CIO President Walter Reuther, were reunited in 1955 as the AFL-CIO with Meany at the helm of the merged federation.

Donahue bars compromise on civil rights

Whatever the political climate, the trade union movement cannot compromise its commitment to "equal opportunity, equity and fairness," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in keynoting the federation's 16th annual Civil Rights Institute.

Donahue hit hard at the Reagan Administration's retreat on civil rights enforcement and its opposition to pay equity for women workers—themes sounded also by AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard and conference speakers including NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks and National Organization for Women President Judith Goldsmith.

Delegates taking part in the weeklong institute at the George Meany Labor Studies Center came from 32 AFL-CIO unions.

In the "hostile environment" of the Reagan Administration, Donahue said, labor must continue to block "those who would turn back a half-century of gains in civil rights" and at the same time continue "to press our demands for new gains."

No sale

Donahue noted the Administration's stepped-up efforts to sell a subminimum wage for teenagers as a means of opening up more jobs for blacks and Hispanics. "They'll attempt to sell it without explaining that the targeted jobs tax credit enacted in 1981 already offers employers an 80 percent tax subsidy for hiring disadvantaged youth," he said.

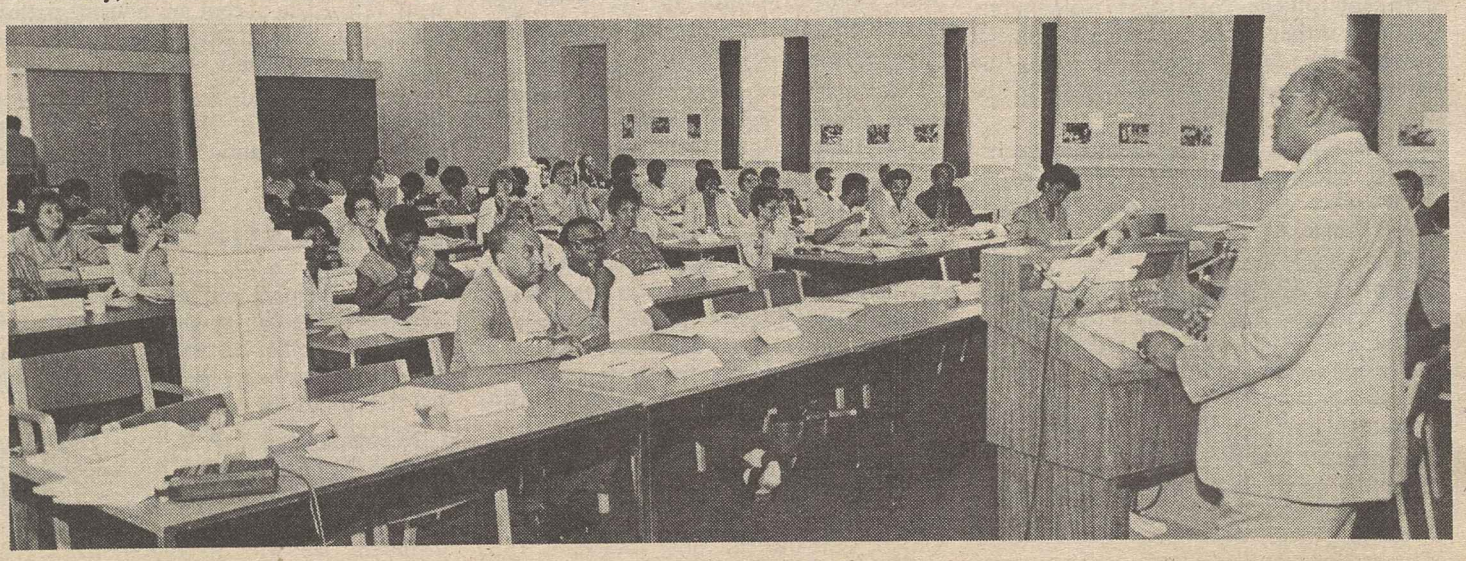
Civil rights progress, Donahue noted, has been achieved through a continued push against the concept of "outer limits" of what can be achieved.

"We have to keep on pressing against the outer limits," Donahue insisted, just as the black trade unionists of South Africa are pressing against limits that others wrongfully seek to maintain.

The pressure must be kept up until all artificial limits "finally crumble," he urged.

Pollard stressed the need to continue on the path of human rights progress.

"The escalation of the attack on affirmative action, civil rights and women's rights by this Administration demands renewed efforts to push forward in our quest for equality," he urged.



Seminars on civil rights and women's rights issues were part of the conference program, including discussion of legislative and political strategies.

Focus on Congress

Legislation to overcome the impact of the Supreme Court decision last year in the Grove City College case is high on the congressional agenda and was a focus for workshop discussions.

The case dealt specifically with a law barring sex discrimination in education. But the decision is seen by civil rights groups as weakening enforcement of all anti-discrimination laws.

In addition to Hooks and Goldsmith, speakers at the institute included Rep. Esteban E. Torres (D-Calif.) and Bernice King, daughter of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard underscores labor's goals for justice.

Report finds OSHA's failures threaten workers

By Arlee C. Green

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has bungled its mandate to protect workers from on-the-job hazards, the Office of Technology Assessment charged.

In a 495-page report, the nonpartisan congressional agency faulted OSHA for its lackadaisical approach to standards setting and enforcement.

The report highlighted the findings of most studies that OSHA's performance under the Reagan Administration has had little or no effect on injury rates. It attributed the decline in injuries between 1979 and 1983 to the economic recession, not the efforts of a scaled-back OSHA.

Every workday about 25 American workers are killed on the job, the report said, and between 12,000 and 45,000 are injured seriously enough to require medical attention or restricted activity.

The report, Preventing Illness and Injury in the Workplace, includes 31 options that Congress is urged to consider in trying to boost the effectiveness of worker safety and health programs.

Matthew Gillan of the Workers Institute for Safety & Health, a member of the advisory panel to the OTA, said adoption of some of the options could reverse the direction being taken under the Reagan Administration, which he warned may adversely affect the health and well-being of workers. Gillan is a former OSHA compliance officer now on the staff of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Committee on Energy & Commerce, who asked the OTA to produce the report, said it "seems to indicate that employers have the ability to do far more to protect workers on the job."

Dingell noted also that the report points out that "effective enforcement of existing OSHA regulations and a more active effort to provide information to both employers and workers could result in major reductions in occupational disease."

OSHA regulates only 410 substances. Since the agency's formation in 1971, it has issued only 11 new or revised health standards concerning 24 specific chemical substances and one covering exposure to noise. Three of these were overturned by the courts. Thus, the bulk of the standards and regulations OSHA enforces are mainly those adopted in 1971 from the existing standards of professional safety and health societies. Although those groups have continued to update their standards, OSHA has not, the OTA charged.

Fewer findings

It said changes in OSHA enforcement under the Reagan Administration have resulted in a decline in the findings of "serious" and "willful" violations by employers and in the assessed penalties. OSHA's policy of encouraging regional directors to "settle" citations by eliminating or reducing penalties in exchange for a promise to abate the hazard "may have further reduced the already weak regulatory effort," the report stressed.

The report sharply criticized the efforts by Reagan's OSHA to permit use of personal protective equipment as a substitute for engineering controls for limiting workers' exposure to hazardous substances. This approach may "endanger the health and well-being of many American workers and reduce the regulatory imperative to develop new and better production and control technologies," the OTA said.

Known as the "hierarchy of controls," the OSHA policy until the Reagan Administration took over gave preference to controlling hazards as close to the source as possible, primarily through engineering controls, then personal protective equipment, augmented by work practices.

In February 1983, OSHA said it was considering rulemaking on the "hierarchy" to explore whether a revised policy could allow employers to use more "cost-effective" compliance methods, such as respirators.

The OTA suggested that Congress consider the appropriate level of OSHA enforcement and then either maintain the current status or "increase the number of inspectors, and the level of fines, and change the targeting and settlement policies to increase the incentives for compliance."

Other suggestions by the OTA were that Congress:

- Encourage formation of labor-management safety committees.
- Expand OSHA's consultation program by increasing its funding and by offering the service to workers and unions as well.
- Continue to fund training of occupational health and safety specialists through grants from the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health. This would include restoring funding for educational research centers which Reagan wants to eliminate.

Worker training

- Require employers to provide a minimum level of health and safety training to their entire workforce.
- Support introduction of classes on occupational safety and health into business administration and engineering curricula, and occupational medicine into medical school course work.
- Increase federal funding of OSHA's training and education programs.

Other recommendations dealt with options ranging from tax credits to government loans that might induce employers to voluntarily install engineering controls to reduce workplace hazards.

In a related development, OSHA announced that it has determined its current standards are sufficient to protect workers exposed to hazards in the biotechnology industry. The agency said it will consider setting standards if hazards emerge that pose a significant risk to workers.

The growth of the biotechnology industry has raised questions concerning health risks to workers involved in laboratory processes that modify genetic materials.

OSHA scored for new delay on formaldehyde standard

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's court-ordered decision to begin rulemaking on formaldehyde was branded a delaying tactic and "the least responsive action" the agency could take.

OSHA waited until the final day of the federal court's Apr. 15 deadline before issuing an "advanced notice of proposed rulemaking." This is usually followed by additional notices, hearings and reviews in a process spread across several years.

"This is just another one of their games," charged Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security. "We are no closer to having a regulation on formaldehyde than we were five years ago."

Over the last four years, unions have repeatedly prodded OSHA to issue an emergency temporary standard that would immediately reduce worker exposure to the suspected cancer-causing chemical.

OSHA has twice refused to take emergency action after being petitioned by the Auto Workers and 14 other unions. The unions then sued. Last year, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ordered OSHA to decide by Apr. 15 whether to proceed with rulemaking.

Dr. Frank Meier, the UAW's health and safety director, charged that "OSHA has invented a new way to delay. This is the third attempt to sidestep action by calling for new information gathering."

OSHA still has not proposed to lower the exposure limit from the current level of three parts of formaldehyde per million parts of air (3 ppm).

Some 1.3 million workers are exposed to the chemical and they will remain at risk while OSHA delays, Meier warned.

"There is adequate information for regulation and no further delay is warranted," he stressed, expressing concern that the agency will take no action in reducing exposure limits.

Meier said the UAW will likely ask the court to find OSHA's response inadequate.

The only time OSHA has issued a standard during the Reagan Administration was under court order. OSHA has not responded to the lawsuit or the court order.

Joseph L. Durst, Jr., the Carpenters health and safety director, pointed out that the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health called for lowering the exposure limit to 1 ppm nine years ago.

Tax petition drive

Coalition seeking to close corporate tax loopholes is conducting a petition drive in cities across the country. Chicago campaign is announced at a news conference by Vice President Steve Cullen of the State, County & Municipal Employees. Others are Carl Shier of the Auto Workers, Chicago Teachers Union President Jacqueline Vaugh, and the Rev. Thomas Joyce of the Eighth Day Center for Justice.

19 unions cited for disaster relief

Nineteen AFL-CIO unions whose locals have set up a network of disaster relief centers in cooperation with the American Red Cross were honored at a White House ceremony with the President's Volunteer Action Award.

Electrical Workers President Charles H. Pillard, whose union had a major role in launching the program two years ago, accepted the presidential award on behalf of all the unions involved.

Union locals along the southeastern coast from Louisiana to Virginia—an area that has suffered severe hurricanes—have made their halls available for relief operations. Donated telephone and emergency generating equipment have made the centers immediatly available when disaster strikes. Pillard termed the project an example of unions and employers working together for a common good.

Participating unions honored with the award include the Communications Workers, Clothing & Textile Workers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Operating Engineers, Machinists, Boilermakers, Carpenters, Bricklayers, Auto Workers, Iron Workers, Steelworkers, Rubber Workers, Longshoremen, Government Employees, Paperworkers, the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and Ladies' Garment Workers.

Sheet Metal Workers move to deter 'double-breasting'

Steps to halt the spread of "double-breasted" contractors who operate both union and non-union shops in the sheet metal industry have been approved by the Sheet Metal Workers' executive council.

The council established a policy that SMW local unions may not accord special contract provisions to employers for the purpose of competing more effectively with non-union contractors unless those employers are all-union themselves.

SMWIA President Edward J. Carlough, in a statement in the union's Journal, said the time to "terminate the practice" of double-breasting in the sheet metal industry is now.

The mechanism adopted by the union's executive council for halting the practice is to bar double-breasted contractors from the privileges and concessions granted employers under the union's three-year-old program to help make union contractors more competitive.

The union credits the program with helping cut unemployment in half for its members during the past two years.

Counterproductive

To grant contract benefits to employers who then hire non-union workers would be to destroy the very purpose of the program, Carlough pointed out.

The policy approved by the SMW executive council requires employers to sign an "integrity clause" before negotiating and receiving contract concessions. The clause defines a "bad-faith employer" as one who operates on a double-breasted basis or permits a subsidiary to do so, or is in fact a subsidiary of a double-breasted company.

New York union volunteers honored

New York—A graduation ceremony for 588 newly trained union counselors highlighted the annual institute of the Central Labor Rehabilitation Council—the community services arm of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Gerald R. Waters, Sr., who administers the program, said the volunteers came from more than 60 AFL-CIO unions—and included 280 electrician apprentices from IBEW Local 3.

The men and women who received the counselor certificates all tok at least 24 hours of training, with emphasis on identifying problems, referring persons to United Fund and other agencies able to give professional help, and following up on progress. Alcohol and drug abuse, physical or mental health problems, financial difficulties and job safety are among the areas of assistance. While the emphasis is on help for fellow workers, the volunteers also use their knowledge of city resources to help people in their communities.

The all-day program included panel sessions with participants including national AFL-CIO department heads, state and local union leaders and officials of organizations involved in community services. James Joy, Jr., who heads the Community Services Committee, chaired an awards presentation luncheon.

Focus on health care

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney, chairman of the AFL-CIO Executive Council Ad Hoc Committee on Health Care, leads the discussion on the Reagan Administration's efforts to tax workers' life-support benefits, and employers' attempts to trim back health care coverage for workers. The committee was briefed on legislative developments and reviewed a cost-containment measure. A health care video tape will be available by August.

Church-operated business ruled subject to wage floor

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously that employees of religious organizations engaged in commercial enterprises are protected by minimum wage and overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The high court upheld lower court decisions that the businesses run by the Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation, based in Alma, Ark., are subject to the federal wage law despite their religious sponsorship.

The controversial right-wing foundation operates more than 30 businesses which are staffed by some 300 workers who receive shelter, food, clothing and medical care from the foundation—but no wages.

The foundation, formed in 1969, was sued in 1977 by then Labor Sec. Ray Marshall to enforce the FLSA requirements on minimum wages, overtime and record-keeping. A federal district court's finding that the foundation was subject to the FLSA rules and that its "associates" were actually employees was upheld by the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis.

In the unanimous Supreme Court decision, Justice Byron White wrote that the foundation is an "enterprise engaged in commerce" and subject to the FLSA. The ruling rejected the foundation's contention that it is not a business enterprise because it is considered a tax-exempt religious organization by the IRS and that its activities are not for a "common business purpose."

The court determined that the FLSA "contains no express or implied exception for commercial activities conducted by religious or other nonprofit organizations" and the Labor Dept. has consistently held that such activities are within the reach of the statute.

Business ventures

Justice White said the lower courts correctly rejected the foundation's argument that its businesses, which include gas stations and motels, are actually "churches in disguise." He cited the lower courts' finding that these businesses are in direct competition with ordinary commercial enterprises and that the foundation would have a competitive edge over other businesses if it were allowed to pay substandard wages.

Even though the "associates themselves vehemently protest(ed) coverage under the Act," the "purposes of the Act requires that it be applied even to those who would decline its protections," White wrote.

He stressed that if an exception were allowed for those who testified that they performed work "voluntarily," then employers "might be able to use superior bargaining power to coerce employees to make such assertions, or to waive their protections under the Act."

over the year. That's the fifth time in the last six months that real earnings were below the level of a year earlier.

BLS said that workers grossed an average $299.75 a week in March in current dollars, but in constant 1977 dollars this translated to $172.37.

Transportation costs registered the sharpest turnaround last month, going from a decline of one-tenth of 1 percent in February to an increase of 1.3 percent in March. BLS attributed the acceleration to higher gasoline price increases than are usual at this time of the year.

A seasonally adjusted rise of 3.6 percent in gasoline prices over the month ended a three-month string of gasoline price decreases.

Medical care costs posted a rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent in March, about double the February pace. Over the year, medical care costs were up 5.9 percent, making them one of only two major CPI components with inflation rates higher than 4 percent. The other is a miscellaneous "other goods and services" category.

Auto prices continued to rise last month, but by less than in February. New car prices were up five-tenths of 1 percent, while used car prices rose by 1 percent, BLS said.

Auto finance charges fell by nine-tenths of 1 percent in March, marking the fourth straight monthly drop.

The cost of public transportation climbed by seven-tenths of 1 percent last month, mainly due to a 1.2 percent rise in airline fares.

Senate urged to reject cuts in vital needs

resolution offered" which would nullify the improvements made, the AFL-CIO would consider that as the key vote on the budget in its congressional scorecard.

This is the third time this year Reagan has gone all out to sway a congressional vote. The first was on freeing funds for the MX missile, where he was successful in House and Senate votes taken on the eve of arms reduction negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Most recently was the issue of a $14 million appropriation to aid the Nicaragua "contras"—to be available for military purposes if peace negotiations broke down.

There, he won Senate approval for a compromise version, but lost in the House despite having backed down substantially from his original position.

In the budget battle, Reagan faces a credibility gap on his flip-flop over the issue of reducing the social security cost-of-living safeguard.

Apart from his election pledge not to tamper with it, Reagan earlier this year at a news conference made exactly the point opponents of his budget package now are making.

Social security, Reagan noted then, did not cause the deficit and is not running at a deficit.

In the budget battle, Reagan faces a lumped elderly Americans concerned by his social security cuts with "special interests," who would pick the budget apart "piece by piece."

The House is weeks away from the budget issue and the Democratic majority of the Budget Committee is certain to propose an alternative to the Reagan plan, regardless of what the Senate does.

Disputed seat

While the Senate debate was under way, the House was locked in an increasingly bitter partisan battle over the outcome of last November's election in the 8th Congressional District of Indiana.

A recount directed by the House Administration Committee found Democratic incumbent Frank McCloskey the winner by four votes out of more than 234,000 cast.

Republicans, who earlier had tried to seat the GOP candidate, Richard D. McIntyre, on the basis of a state certification, threatened a policy of disrupting House proceedings unless Democrats agreed to require a new election. They kept the House in session with all-night speeches, and warned of stronger tactics to come.

Senate unit gives strong bipartisan support to Brock

G. Hatch (Utah) sought and received assurances that Brock would move quickly to fill top-level vacancies that have left many programs drifting.

Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), who has pushed for a subminimum youth wage, was assured that Brock considered the Administration proposal "worth the effort" although not the "sole answer" to youth unemployment. Brock said he is "sensitive" to labor's concerns that a lower youth wage could hurt adults in minimum wage jobs.

Democrats pressed Brock on Labor Dept. backsliding on assistance to workers and the unemployed.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) displayed charts showing OSHA's failed promises and "poor management." Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) pointed to OSHA's "shameful" refusal to issue a field sanitation standard for farm workers. Others questioned plans to eliminate Labor Dept. regional offices—a decision Brock promised to review when he takes office.

Brock's opening statement stressed his belief that skill training is essential to keep American industry competitive and to provide jobs for unemployed. "Our pool of unskilled workers continues to increase while the pool of jobs for unskilled workers is declining," he warned.

The committee unanimously supported confirmation, clearing the way for approval by the full Senate.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer seven institutes and workshops during May and June. The schedule:

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, May 12-17—A course concentrating on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators. The exercises are videotaped for self-criticism.

Organizing Techniques I, May 12-17—A program for full-time union organizers teaching the essentials of an organizing campaign: targeting, interviewing workers, picking winning issues, selecting plant committees and countering employer hostilities.

Advanced Editing Skills, May 19-24—A workshop for experienced editors focusing on makeup, photo editing and headline writing, cosponsored by the International Labor Communications Association.

Advanced Leadership Skills, June 2-7—A workshop on how to read faster and remember more, speak more effectively, write more clearly and chair meetings more effectively.

Occupational Health & Safety, June 2-7—A program that coaches participants to recognize health and safety hazards, the nature and causes of occupational diseases, worker and union rights under OSHA, and on health and safety issues in negotiating and administering contracts.

Fact Finding & Interest Arbitration, June 16-21—An institute to examine the forms of interest arbitration and the use of fact finding to settle public employee contract impasses.

TV: The Cool Medium, June 30-July 3—A three-day workshop to coach officers of local central bodies on working with television reporters. Participants will have three exercises facing the video camera: A hostile confrontation, a panel discussion and a studio interview.

Also using the center's facilities during May for staff training sessions: Railway & Airline Clerks, May 5-10; State, County & Municipal Employees, May 5-10 and 28-31; Service Employees, May 19-24; Flight Attendants, May 28-31, and AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, May 28-31.

The Labor Heritage Foundation is sponsoring the annual Labor Song Exchange May 12-14. More than 50 labor troubadours are expected to swap labor songs, attend workshops in the history of labor music and song writing and skit production. The session will end with a concert in the campus auditorium May 14 at 8 p.m.

During May, the American Institute for Free Labor Development will tutor two groups of trade unionists—20 from Brazil and 22 from Caribbean countries. The Brazilians will study collective bargaining techniques and research methods; the Caribbean group, comparative political and economic systems.

More information on these or other labor studies is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

Stolen Rhetoric

THE NEW DEAL era of Franklin D. Roosevelt is enshrined in our history books, and with good reason. The social reforms brought about by the combination of a popular, visionary President and a progressive Congress permanently changed the face of America—for the better.

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the social security system, one of those watershed achievements of the New Deal.

It was based on the once revolutionary notion that persons no longer able to work should not have to rely on public or private charity to live out their lives.

Perhaps because it was relatively recent, most history books have not yet caught up with the shorter-lived sequel to the Roosevelt revolution—the achievements of President Lyndon B. Johnson at the height of his popularity and the overwhelmingly Democratic Congress that shared power with him 20 years ago.

That was a Congress that at LBJ's urging struck down racial bars to voter registration and changed forever politics in the Deep South, broke new ground with the first federal aid to education—and passed Medicare.

IRONICALLY, the same arguments that had been raised against social security in 1935 were raised against Medicare in 1965.

Fighting the New Deal, the National Association of Manufacturers protested that providing pensions for persons too old to work and for their survivors would weaken "the incentive for individual self-help, thrift and forethought."

In close paraphrase, the opponents of Medicare protested that it would "rob a person of much of his urge for thrift" and warned that if children were relieved of the burden of paying hospital expenses for elderly parents, there would be more mental illness because parents would have a feeling of being unimportant to their children.

President Reagan stopped barely short of matching that rhetoric in his televised speech urging support for a budget that demands new sacrifices from the elderly—and from just about everyone else who struggles to make ends meet. The President vowed fierce resistance to imposing a minimum tax on corporations instead of reducing social security benefits, for example.

But to America's elderly who remember clearly the ringing words of John F. Kennedy's inaugural address, there was bitter irony in the scolding they got from Mr. Reagan, "Ask not what your country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country."

John Kennedy, let the history books note, was not asking retired and disabled workers to give up their earned benefits so that profitable corporations can continue to get a free ride.

Continuing Struggle

OUR STRUGGLE is for human worth, for dignity on the job, and we never change our answer to the vital question, "Am I my brother's keeper?" The civil rights movement and the labor movement have always answered with a resounding "Yes." But Reaganites say the question is irrelevant.

They have no wish to talk about public health, public education, public welfare as human values or even as public capital investment that enriches and enlarges the society of which we are a part. They think of these things only as consumer expenditures that increase public spending and reduce the return on private capital.

While the irresponsible 1981 tax concessions to the rich and corporations have sent the budget deficit into orbit, the Republican solution is to cap social security cost-of-living increases and cut out more of the programs designed, as Lyndon Johnson said it, to remove the chains with which minorities come to the starting line of life's race.

We have to keep pressing and pressing for dignity and equality.

Corporate takeover fever adds burden to economy

By Press Associates, Inc.

The nation seems to be in the grip of a corporate "merger mania"—large companies gobbling up smaller ones, and even small fish swallowing whales.

A real-life soap opera is played out almost daily in the media—tales of bold corporate "raiders," "white knight" rescuers, and "poison pill" defenses.

The actors in this boardroom melodrama are becoming household names—oil baron T. Boone Pickens, media mogul Ted Turner. In an age lacking for heroes, these wizards of high finance and fast bucks are seen as modern-day Lancelots.

But there's more to the picture. However entertaining to watch is the battle for CBS, Unocal and other prizes, it's important to look at what's going on under the table in this game of monopoly. For the game is being played with real money, and the stakes are high for the nation's economy and the jobs that depend on it.

Alarms are being sounded in many corners. Charles Marinaccio, soon to retire from the Securities & Exchange Commission, said recently that the growing threat from corporate raiders has forced many corporate executives to concentrate on erecting elaborate defenses at the expense of managing their companies. He said this was unfortunate in view of stiff foreign competition.

Laws make it easy

Marinaccio said corporate takeovers, achieved through "leveraged buyouts" and other new financing gambits, are too easy under current laws and regulations.

Nobel Prize-winning economist Wassily Leontief observed that mergers don't produce any "new assets or new jobs—nothing is added to the economy." Indeed, smaller companies which become merged into large conglomerates often become less efficient, productive and profitable.

Further, the billions of dollars borrowed to finance as well as to fight takeovers is money not available for productive investment.

The diversion of these billions into merger and anti-merger corporate "war chests" has been a factor in keeping real interest rates at historically high levels, economists say.

In addition, the increasing burden of corporate debt resulting from the merger craze has raised new concerns about the health of the U.S. financial structure.

Various causes

The merger fever's causes are varied. An important one is the Reagan Administration's permissive interpretation of the nation's anti-monopoly laws. The Administration has kept hands off in the name of letting the "free market" work its will.

Congress also has been sitting on its hands. After a series of hearings, the Senate in early 1984 rejected a bill to impose a six-month moratorium on big mergers.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in a speech to the recent building trades conference, described the destructiveness of the merger battles and the role which a democratic government should play.

"America's place in the world," Kirkland said, "is not endangered solely by unfair foreign competition, but equally by American mismanagement, furthered by the Administration's disregard for the antitrust laws and its dogmatic conviction that chaos is better than regulation."

When the dust from the merger battles settles, he continued, "the pirate walks away with 50 or 80 or 100 million dollars in what they call greenmail, leaving a weaker, poorer company behind. Or, if he gains control, he closes plants, fires workers and deals off divisions to pay for the cost of his adventure with the company's own lifeblood."

The issue of megamergers, Kirkland said, is one which "revolves around the question of what, precisely, government is for—what role government should play in the life of a democratic society."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Budget Battle Heats Up:

Key Programs Face Senate Votes, But Test To Come On Package

Earlier this month, the Senate leadership and the White House came to an understanding over a collection of budget cuts and freezes that arbitrarily strike at the heart of worker programs. In the next week, many members will be offering their own amendments to this package, so they can go on record as trying to save their favorite programs. Look for measures restoring the Social Security COLA, Mass Transit Medicare, Medicaid, student loans, Job Corps, and more. But the real test will be down the road.

There is a good chance that all this preliminary activity will be for naught. Majority Leader Robert Dole will be waiting in the shadows and when he's sure which way the political wind is blowing, he may very well put together his own separate budget package --one he is confident will pass muster. This late-hour package budget could well include many of the cuts in programs that Senators will have voted earlier to save. If so, this will be the only vote that really counts.

In the meantime, the AFL-CIO has sent a letter to Congress, detailing our strong opposition to the so-called "White House Compromise". Now, union members need to follow up with personal visits and letters to their congressmen on this important fight.

Below are some of the important new cuts in worker programs contained in the White House package before the Senate:

* Total elimination of Mass Transit subsidies and Amtrak.
* Total elimination of the Jobs Corps.
* A three-year cap on the cost-of-living adjustment for Social Security, with worse long-term implications for retirees.
* Total elimination of all UDAG grants.
* A new 3 percent increase in defense spending.

This compromise would direct the elimination of these programs, rather than just reduce funding levels, as previously planned. This would make it impossible to revive them at a later date.

The Care And Feeding Of Your Congressman On The Life-Support Benefits Tax Issue

Your Questions And Their Answers:

With action heating up in both the Senate and the House of Representatives over the proposed tax on life-support benefits, union activists around the country are meeting with their elected officials to find out exactly where they stand on this important issue.

Some members will already be on our side, but others will likely use a number of slight-of-hand tactics to avoid making a commitment. Below are the kind of dodges some members may use to avoid taking a stand, along with the responses union members can use to make them commit:

THE DOUBLE SHUFFLE

"Of course I support you on the issue, but if it's in a package, I'll have to take a second look at it." If you get this response, the legislator hasn't given you a commitment at all, because the employee tax will likely rear its ugly head as part of a package: either as part of a budget bill or a tax simplification bill. So press on --get an unequivocal commitment to oppose the life-support benefits' tax no matter what form it takes.

THE DETOUR

"Why shouldn't employee benefits be taxed ... it's only fair." No, it isn't fair! Health coverage and other benefits aren't frivolous "perks" or tax gimmicks designed to shelter income from fair taxation. Rather, they are long-standing economic protections built into the tax code by Congress in order to encourage their availability to all citizens by providing an economic incentive designed to induce employers to provide those benefits. These benefits haven't been taxed before and they shouldn't be taxed now!

THE DODGE

"Taxing employee benefits is part of a trade off for an overall reduction in your taxes." Don't you believe it. A recent United Auto Workers analysis of a UAW family with total wage earnings of $30,000 yearly would experience a tax increase of $515 under Reagan's first tax simplification proposal while under the Bradley-Gephardt bill -- income taxes would rise by $614. A separate AFL-CIO analysis, based on the U.S. Treasury's $33,600 median family income model (joint return, one wage earner with two dependents) shows that taxing employee benefits coupled with the loss of other deductions contained in the Reagan proposal, would increase worker taxes by $265 yearly. So much for a trade off.

THE DUNCE

"I don't know much about the issue." Don't let a legislator play dumb on this issue. Reagan's tax simplification proposal isn't a brand new idea. It has been widely publicized, and practically every member of Congress is receiving mail from his or her constituency opposing it. Besides, Reagan proposed taxing health benefits in the last Congress. So your legislator has had plenty of advance notice about this issue.

THE DREAMER

"It's probably not going to come up." You've got to be kidding? Faced with $200 billion plus federal budget deficit, the benefits tax -- which will pick the pocket's of workers to the tune of $24 billion annually -- makes for an easy target. So the benefits tax will get more than a passing glance. The goal is to make sure your legislator doesn't look twice.

If Congress Is Really Serious About Tax Reform, Then First Put Corporations Back On Tax Rolls

Support is growing on Capitol Hill for a new bill that would make our tax-dodging corporations finally pay their fair share of federal taxes.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright has said he favors a 15 percent tax for all corporations, and in the Senate, Howard Metzenbaum has said he would amend the budget to cut down on the "corporate welfare" that allows companies like General Electric to earn over $6 billion in profits and pay no taxes at all.

It's the first indication that some members are serious about tax fairness.

Congress as a whole can demonstrate its sincerity about tax reform by first closing these shameful loopholes and putting our big corporations back on the tax rolls.

In the meantime, a Washington D.C. research group has released the latest figures on those American companies which are paying no taxes at all. These are only five of a total of 65 major U.S. firms:

America's Biggest Tax Avoiders

The following companies not only paid no net taxes at all during the period 1981-1983, but actually received rebates from the federal government. At the same time, their profits were in the millions or even billions, and their top executives received handsome -- and increased -- salaries.

| Company | 1981-83 profit | tax rebate | Executive | 1984 pay | 1983 pay |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| G.E. | $6.5 bil. | $283 mil. | J. Welsh jr. | $1.3 mil. | $1.1 mil. |
| Weyerhauser | $640 mil. | $138 mil. | G. Weyerhauser | $.672 mil. | $.720 mil. |
| Georgia Pac. | $400 mil. | $99 mil. | T.M. Hann | $.685 mil. | $.452 mil. |
| Celanese | $296 mil. | $45 mil. | J. Macomber | $.9 mil. | $.68 mil. |
| CSX Corp. | $1.7 bil. | $15 mil. | H. Watkins | $.97 mil. | $.48 mil. |

Trade deficit continues to soar

Talking it out in Providence

At the AFL-CIO regional conference in Providence, R.I., Federation President Lane Kirkland responds to a question on organizing from Morty Miller of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 217. The two-day session attended by more than 300 persons included workshops, question-and-answer periods and five satellite meetings. Members from New England states and Pennsylvania voiced concerns on imports, health care cost containment, attempts to tax worker benefits, state and local central body affiliations and the Reagan budget. The next regional conference will be May 17-18 in Cherry Hill, N.J., for five mid-Atlantic states and the District of Columbia.

Import tide drains jobs, U.S. industry

By James M. Shevis

The nation's long-running foreign trade deficit continued to soar in March, reaching $11 billion for the month and heading toward a record $130 billion for the year.

The Commerce Dept. reported that the March figures brought the U.S. merchandise trade deficit for the first three months of the year to $32.8 billion, almost 9 percent greater than the same period in 1984.

"These trade imbalances, particularly in the manufacturing sector, are quickly eroding the strength of America's industrial base and costing millions of jobs," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned.

"The economic and social dislocation that results from this torrent of imports is being felt in hundreds of communities across our country," Oswald said.

"Even the most sophisticated and heretofore competitive industrial sectors like telecommunications and industrial machinery are now paying the price of the Reagan Administration's economic mismanagement."

Oswald said the March report gives new urgency to the AFL-CIO's appeal in Senate testimony last week for emergency measures to deal with the growing trade crisis.

Oil imports drop

The government said the picture would have been even bleaker except for a sharp decline for the fourth straight month in the value of petroleum products brought into the United States—from $3.75 billion to $3.12 billion.

Total imports for March reached $29.5 billion while the value of exports was $18.45 billion.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige was not optimistic about any immediate turnaround in the situation.

"The economy probably will strengthen during the current quarter, but domestic

Economic index tilts downward, forecast gloomy

The U.S. economy continued to sputter in March.

A drop of two-tenths of 1 percent in the government's key indicators and slow growth in the economy in the first three months of the year, "is a matter of substantial concern," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald declared.

"It points up not only the current weakness in the economy, but further weaknesses in months to come. Such weakness in the economy offers no hope for the large number of jobless workers," Oswald said.

The March decline in the Commerce Dept.'s composite index of leading indicators followed downward revisions in the index for February and January. The index gauges economic activity between three and nine months ahead.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. reported that new orders for factory goods fell nine-tenths of 1 percent for the second straight month in March and now have declined in eight of the last 12 months.

In another report, the Labor Dept. said U.S. business productivity declined 1.2 percent in the first quarter of 1985, the first downturn since the third quarter of

Social security cutback beaten in Senate, 65-34

The Senate voted down a social security cutback sought by President Reagan and the Republican leadership, but the National Council of Senior Citizens warned that the victory wasn't yet final.

It marked, however, the first unraveling of a budget package that combined deep cuts in domestic programs with a large increase in military spending.

The Senate's 65-34 vote knocked out of the budget resolution a labor-opposed provision reducing the social security adjustment for each of the next three years.

The budget package was the result of a deal between the Reagan White House and the Senate Republican leadership. Senate Republican leaders wanted the projected budget deficit reduced, and Reagan agreed to break his campaign pledge and support a cutback. Even though the social security system is financed from payroll taxes and is running a surplus, reducing benefit checks by $22.7 billion over three years would show up as a budget saving.

In return for Reagan reneging on his promise to social security beneficiaries, Senate Republicans agreed to support a multi-billion dollar rise in military spending—above the amount needed to keep up with inflation.

Showdown vote

The political pressure against a social security cut proved too strong for the thin Republican majority in the Senate, however. On the showdown, 19 Republicans joined a solid bloc of 46 Democrats in rejecting the COLA cutback. In fact, Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole (R-Kan.) even maneuvered to get Republicans recognized first to offer the amendment to restore the social security cuts so that Senate Democrats wouldn't get all the political credit.

But Dole and other Republican leaders made clear their intent to try to put most of the original budget package together on a final vote—nullifying many of the changes made through floor amendments.

That's what the AFL-CIO warned about in a letter putting senators on notice that an end-of-the-debate package erasing many of the amendments would be considered the "key" budget vote on labor's congressional scorecard.

Executive Director William R. Hutton of the National Council of Senior Citizens said the social security vote reflected "the efforts of hundreds of thousands of older people across the nation."

But Hutton, too, warned of the possibility of a final passage package and of the still-alive threat of cutbacks in Medicare and other "survival" programs.

The Senate budget debate was still in its early stages when the AFL-CIO News went to press.

President Reagan had opened the campaign for his budget plan with a televised speech that won applause for the performance but apparently failed to generate the response Reagan sought. He had urged

Rubber Workers contracts set pattern for tire industry

Akron, Ohio—The Rubber Workers reached tentative agreement with a second major tiremaker, Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., after concluding a pattern-setting accord with B. F. Goodrich Co.

The agreements left only Uniroyal Inc. and Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., the other major tiremakers yet to settle with the union.

Originally, URW had targeted Goodyear for a pattern settlement. When talks bogged down, the union switched the focus to Goodrich.

The Goodyear contract, like the Goodrich pact, would raise the hourly rates by 25 cents immediately, 10 cents in the second year and 8 cents in the third year, while retaining a quarterly cost-of-living adjustment based on a formula that raises hourly wages 1 cent for each .26 rise in the government's consumer price index. Assuming a 5-percent inflation rate, the formula would yield $1.89 per hour over three years.

The Goodrich agreement, reached on Apr. 26 and approved by the URW's 15-member tire advisory committee, covers 7,200 workers in five plants. The union said ratification votes should be completed at plants in Fort Wayne, Ind.; Miami, Okla.; Oaks, Pa.; Tuscaloosa, Ala.; and Akron by May 10.

The tentative Goodyear pact covers about 16,000 hourly workers at 12 plants across the country.

URW President Milan Stone said the Goodrich agreement "meets the union's objectives for 1985 and the next three years. At the same time, the agreement reflects a meaningful and realistic attitude in labor-management relations."

Pension benefits improved from $16.50 to $20 per month per year of service, while current retirees will get a 50-cent increase in the benefit formula.

A health care cost containment program negotiated between the URW and Good-

Northeast unions see damage in Labor Dept. office closings

New England as a region and Connecticut as a state will be hurt if the Labor Dept. goes ahead with its announced plan to eliminate three regional offices, Betty L. Tianti testified before a Senate Appropriations subcommittee.

Tianti is secretary-treasurer of the Connecticut AFL-CIO and the subcommittee is headed by her state's senior Republican senator, Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. Her testimony had the endorsement also of the Northeast AFL-CIO council, made up of the six New England states plus New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Maryland.

Elimination of the Boston-headquartered New England region of the Labor Dept. was one of the proposed cutbacks that Tianti testified against. It would add program services affecting some 6 million New England workers to an already overburdened New York regional office, she protested.

Tianti spoke of regionally administered programs involving job training and placement, OSHA safety and health education, and programs keyed to such needs as a Women's Bureau project to improve career opportunities for Indian women.

"Will all the services provided by the Boston regional office now be handled by telephone or mail out of the New York office, with additional time delays?" she asked.

Tianti also stressed in her testimony the labor movement's opposition to a proposed reduction of $119.5 million in funds for dislocated worker programs under the Job Training Partnership Act and a $100 million reduction in the JTPA summer youth employment and training program.

She cited as evidence of the need for these programs the Bureau of Labor Statistics report that 5.1 million workers had lost their jobs because of plant closings or heavy layoffs over a five-year period, the extremely high unemployment rate among black teenagers, and the job-destroying impact of the nation's huge trade deficit.

If funds already appropriated are rescinded, Tianti testified, Connecticut's United Labor Agency will be cut 70 percent. The ULA, she reminded Weicker, "provides information and counseling services to victims of job dislocation" plus follow-up services to dislocated and disadvantaged workers. It provides skill training and job hunt guidance to workers whose previous jobs have been wiped out.

OSHA reinstates noise rule, court slates rehearing

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has ordered its field offices to resume full enforcement of the hearing conservation amendment to OSHA's noise standard following an appellate court's decision to rehear the case in which the amendment was struck down.

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond granted OSHA's petition for a rehearing by the full court. A 2-1 decision by the court last Nov. 7 overturned the amendment, holding that OSHA exceeded its authority by requiring employers to protect workers from hearing loss that could be caused in part by sources outside the workplace.

OSHA's noise standard limits worker exposure to 90 decibels (db) averaged over eight hours. The amendment provides that when exposures reach 85 db, a number of provisions must be implemented with respect to monitoring, hearing tests, use of hearing protectors and training and education.

5.1 million exposed

The amendment, issued in March 1983, is aimed at reducing work-related hearing impairment for the estimated 5.1 million workers exposed to noise levels in excess of 85 db.

After the three-judge panel overturned the amendment, OSHA suspended enforcement of the hearing conservation program. It petitioned the appellate court for full review after being pressured by organized labor to do so.

If the ruling that killed the amendment were to go unchallenged, it could have a chilling effect on all other OSHA regulations, said Alice Suter, a former OSHA scientist who directed development of the amendment.

"How could you tell the difference between chronic lung disease from cotton dust or smoking? Or how can you tell the difference between occupational and non-occupational asbestosis?" she asked.

SEIU charges bias

Pay equity complaint filed in Los Angeles

Los Angeles — The Service Employees, in one of the largest pay equity complaints filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, charged that Los Angeles County is "deliberately maintaining sex and race segregated job classifications and is discriminating in compensation paid to its female and minority employees."

The complaint joins two other pay discrimination actions the SEIU is pursuing in this state—one against California, the other against San Francisco.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney said at a press conference here that the EEOC complaint centers on a pattern of discrimination against county workers on the "basis of sex, race and national origin in wages, hiring, promotions and other terms and conditions of employment" that is "undeniable."

Discrimination in county jobs is clear, Sweeney said, as "evidenced by job classifications so rigidly segregated by race and sex that five out of six county workers are in jobs that are either 70 percent or more female or 70 percent or more male. This segregation did not happen by chance."

40,000 affected

The legal action, which may affect 40,000 of the county's 60,000 employees, was filed by 11 SEIU members, the international union and SEIU Locals 660, 434 and 535.

An SEIU study of pay records supplied by the county showed that white-dominated jobs pay an average 32 percent more than minority-dominated jobs and that male-dominated jobs pay 21 percent more than female-dominated jobs—for occupations that require the same amount of education and experience.

"The result is devastating," Sweeney said. "Black and Hispanic men and white women earn about $7,000 less per year than white men who work for the county in comparable jobs. And then we drop down another $3,500 a year to the average wages of Hispanic and black women who suffer doubly from race as well as sex discrimination."

Deadline for action

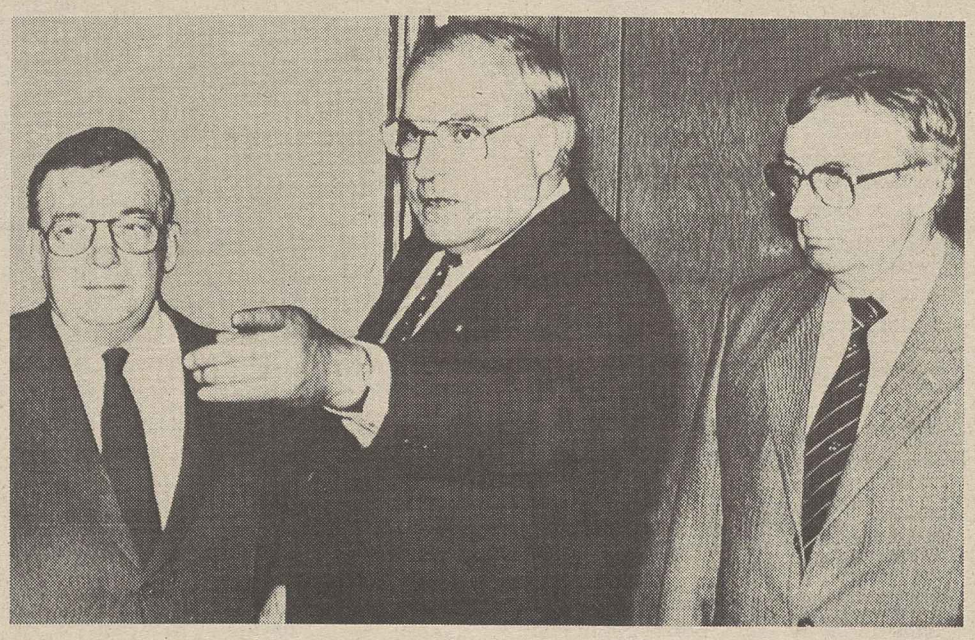
The union's complaint, filed Apr. 29, must be addressed by the EEOC within 180 days. If the agency fails to act, the union then may file a lawsuit in federal court.



Labor lawyer Winn Newman, a pay equity specialist, is representing the union in the Los Angeles case, as well as in the state suit by SEIU-affiliated California State Employees Association. He charged that the government approach to such cases is "to immediately label these cases comparable worth and then not to investigate."

The CSEA suit was filed on behalf of 39,000 state workers last November, charging that women in female-dominated jobs are paid less than workers in male-dominated jobs. U.S. District Court Judge Marilyn Hall Patel last month rejected the state's request that the case be dismissed. Newman also represented the workers in the historic comparable worth case won by the State, County & Municipal Employees against the state of Washington.

Not there yet

Rasheedah Shahdid, a SEIU member and unit secretary at Bay Harbour Hospital, told reporters the workers have drawn the line. "It's been 20 years since federal laws were passed to end discrimination, and we aren't there yet," said Shahdid, who is one of the 11 individuals to file the EEOC complaint. "The kind of discrimination we see hides behind ingrained practices, job classification inequities, blocked career paths, subtle hiring practices and double pay standards."

In late April, San Francisco Mayor Diane Feinstein's veto of a $28-million pay discrimination adjustment package for city workers was overridden by the city's Board of Supervisors. The board passed a resolution in February urging action to implement comparable worth. The city's 7,000 workers who are members of SEIU Locals 790, 250 and 535 will receive the money over the next two years.

Summit time

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Chairman Ernst Breit, right, of the West German Labor Federation (DGB), meet with Chancellor Helmut Kohl in Bonn prior to the annual economic summit conference of major industrialized countries. Kirkland, Breit and other representatives of the Trade Union Advisory Committee of the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development spelled out TUAC's proposals for leaders of West Germany, France, Britain, Italy, Japan, Canada and the United States. TUAC stressed the need to solve the growing problem of unemployment in many of the 24 OECD countries.

Building trades create trust fund for safety plans

A national labor-management safety trust has been set up by the affiliates of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to assume the funding of cooperative safety programs that will soon lose their government money.

Establishment of the trust fund by the BCTD Safety & Health Committee "is the most significant act the building trades has done" since working for enactment of the Construction Safety Act in 1969, BCTD Safety Director Jim Lapping said.

There are 26 cooperative safety programs currently, Lapping said, including four under the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's "star" program, which exempts firms with good safety records from inspections. The fund is the solution to the end of federal financing for the projects, he said.

Enormous potential

Lapping predicted that by the end of the year some 20 contractors' projects will be committed to the fund and within five years most union contractors will have joined. The potential for the fund "is enormous," he said, suggesting that it could reach $40 million.

The trust will be administered in Washington. An equal number of trustees from labor and management, to be chosen in the next few months, will monitor the program and sponsor safety seminars.

Project agreements by local building trades councils and contractors will be submitted to the trust for approval. Contributions, ranging from one to five cents per man-hour worked, will be based on the number of workers and the type of program set up.

The BCTD safety committee noted that current programs have meant savings for participating contractors by reducing the number of accidents and workers' compensation claims. Lapping pointed out that the average cost of a lost-time injury in construction is $32,400 with some half-million injuries occurring each year.

Senate panel clears bill on Conrail sale

Debate on the government's plan to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corp., stepped up on Capitol Hill as both Senate and House panels scrutinized the proposed $1.2-billion transaction.

The Senate Commerce Committee approved a bill permitting the government to sell its interest in the freight line by a 12-to-5 vote. The measure now goes to the Senate floor, where Republicans plan to include it in the budget reconciliation process.

A similar bill came up for a second hearing of the House Energy & Commerce transportation subcommittee, which took testimony on the proposed sale from Treasury and Justice Dept. officials.

Rep. James Florio (D-N.J.), who heads the subcommittee having jurisdiction over the legislation, said he intends to fight the move to make the Conrail legislation part of the budget reconciliation process, saying it was not intended to be used for a bill such as the Conrail sale.

In reporting the bill out, the Senate Commerce Committee adopted two labor protection amendments offered by Sen. Wendel Ford (D-Ky.). One would give workers whose jobs were eliminated because of the sale of the first right of hire for vacancies opening on Norfolk Southern rail subsidiaries, except those jobs covered by voluntary or required affirmative action plans.

Seniority rights

The other amendment would give laid-off employees a first right of hire at Norfolk Southern without regard to their previous craft or class, and allow them to retain their seniority rights to return to their original craft or class when a vacancy occurs.

Conrail was formed from the bankrupt Penn Central in 1976. The government owns an 85-percent interest in the freight line, which lost money for years until it turned a profit in 1983. Conrail employees own 15 percent of the railroad.

Conventions

The Colorado AFL-CIO 1985 convention will be held in Denver Oct. 3-4.

The Alabama AFL-CIO will hold its 1985 convention in Montgomery Oct. 14-16.

Students protest apartheid

State, County & Municipal Employees Local 420 President Jim Butler tells students at a Columbia University rally that the school's administrators should divest holdings in firms that continue to conduct business in South Africa. Two busloads of Local 420 members attended the rally to protest South Africa's racist policies.

Firings of South African strikers called setback to peaceful change

The dismissal of 15,000 black workers at the world's largest gold mine after a series of strikes for higher wages was "an act of provocation that can only fuel the unrest and deepen the alienation" of blacks throughout South Africa, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

In a cable to the director of the Anglo American Corp., in Johannesburg, Kirkland charged that the action "sets back the prospects for peaceful democratic change" in South Africa.

"Such change cannot occur without full recognition of the trade union and human rights of black workers," he observed.

Kirkland's cable, and a similar protest by the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, charged that the dismissals violated accepted international procedures for settling disputes, disrupting fair labor-management relations.

The firings occurred at Anglo American's huge Vaal Reefs mine, 65 miles southwest of Johannesburg, where workers represented by the National Union of Mineworkers were attempting to negotiate a 10-percent increase in pay, which now averages $160 a month.

The dispute served to heighten mounting black dissatisfaction with social and economic conditions under South Africa's racist regime, and added to the growing international pressure for the Botha government to end the apartheid system of segregation.

Annual output

The Vaal Reefs complex is the biggest gold mine in the world with an annual production of about 82 tons.

Mass dismissals are not unusual at South African gold mines, but the Apr. 26-27 layoffs were the most extensive yet.

In a separate development, police detained at least 30 black labor activists in central Johannesburg during a peaceful demonstration to protest layoffs in the metal industry.

Armed police confronted demonstrators from the Metal & Allied Workers' Union outside City Hall, and hauled away at least 30 of them in vans. The demonstrators had earlier accompanied union negotiators meeting with metal industry employers' association.

The demonstrators carried placards that read "Stop retrenchments," and "We demand a living wage."

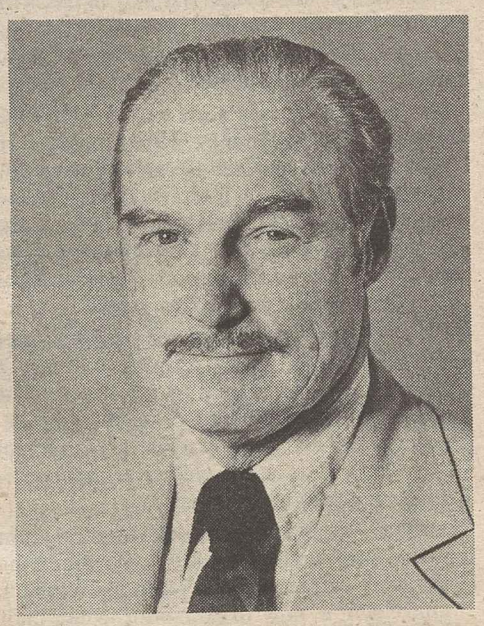
Meanwhile, the House Foreign Affairs Committee voted 26-6 to impose economic sanctions against South Africa to pressure the Pretoria government into ending its racist policies.

The measure adopted by the Democratic-controlled panel calls for new restrictions on U.S.-South African trade, a prohibition on new investments and bank loans and the suspension of the sale of South African gold coins.

A watered-down Republican alternative to set up a commission to investigate conditions in South was rejected by a vote of 19-4.

The Reagan Administration is opposed to the stiff Democratic sanctions.

The firings at Vaal Reefs and the dismissal of another 2,200 black miners by Anglo Vaal Co. in Hartesbeesfontein came as nearly 60,000 blacks joined in mass funerals for 26 persons killed in racial rioting last week in Cape Province.



The black National Union of Mineworkers, formed less than a year ago, called work stoppages and slowdowns after Anglo American offered a 10-percent wage increase to black supervisors but not to other black workers.

William Lindner dies at 65, transport union president

New York—William G. Lindner, president of the Transport Workers since 1979, died of a stroke May 1 at the TWU headquarters here. He was 65.

Lindner was the third president of the TWU in its 50-year history. He succeeded Matthew Guinan, who is now president emeritus.

Under the union's bylaws, Executive Vice President John D. Lawe will serve as president until the TWU convention elects a successor in September. Lawe is also president of New York's TWU Local 100.

William G. Lindner

In a message to his family, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said Lindner devoted his life to battling for workers.

"His leadership and service enriched a great many lives, not only among TWU members but far beyond their ranks," they stressed.

Lindner joined the TWU in 1946 while working as a mechanic for American Airlines in Chicago and helped organize Local 512. He became the local's first president in 1947.

He was elected to the union's executive board in 1948 and moved to the TWU headquarters in 1951 as assistant director of the air transport division.

He became an international vice president in 1968, air transport director in 1973 and executive vice president in 1978.

Lindner also headed the union's education and safety department when it was established in 1976.

He was a vice president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and a general council member of the International Transport Workers Federation, the worldwide trade secretariat.

Survivors include his wife Lorraine and four children.

production gains will be limited by higher imports and flat export sales," Baldrige told reporters. "This drag on the economy would be moderated by reducing the budget deficit, lowering barriers (to American exports), and by stronger growth abroad."

During the January-to-March period of this year, imports have risen substantially in telecommunications equipment, industrial machinery, chemicals, footwear and clothing.

The overvalued U.S. dollar makes American products more expensive in other countries and lowers the price of imports, making them more attractive to Americans. The dollar has increased 17 percent since March 1984 and 78 percent from is low point in July 1980.

Oswald observed that this rapid appreciation of the dollar has been "a major factor in America's international decline." He noted that the dollar is now some 80 percent higher against the currencies of major developed countries than five years ago.

"This is no different than an 80 percent tax on exports and an 80 percent price advantage for imports, and is causing U.S. manufacturers to relocate production overseas, further increasing U.S. job losses," he pointed out.

Beside congressional action to correct the dollar exchange rate and update U.S. trade laws, Oswald urged enactment of industry-specific legislation for clothing and textiles, telecommunications, footwear, and other import-battered industries.

Oswald said "the continuing hemorrhaging" of the country's international economic position "clearly points to the failure of the Reagan Administration's policy of benign neglect."

Over the first quarter of the year, the nation's bilateral trade deficits increased 30 percent with Japan, 23 percent with western Europe, and 29 percent with Taiwan when compared with the same period last year.

listeners to tell their senators "by phone, wire or mailgram that our future hangs in the balance" and not to let the budget get "picked apart, piece by piece, by special interest groups."

Merely to hold the GOP ranks together on a largely procedural vote to bring the latest version of the budget resolution before the Senate, Republican leaders had to agree to modifications and promise that further changes would be made. Even then, the margin was a bare 50-49.

After the social security vote, the GOP leadership was working toward a further "compromise" that would hold the increase in military spending below the budget resolution level.

Democrats, meanwhile, were preparing a package of major amendments when the tight rules under which the budget is being debated give them a turn to seek changes.

The House Budget Committee is still in the process of drawing up its version of the budget. And if Congress does finally complete action, it will then be necessary for the various committees to shape programs in their jurisdictions to the new budget ceilings.

There's a theoretical timetable for each stage of the process, but it has seldom been met.

Economic index continues to fall, forecast gloomy

1984. The leading indicators have not risen for three consecutive months since last May.

The new downturn reinforced concerns analysts raised earlier last month when the government reported the economy grew at an anemic 1.3-percent pace in the first period, as measured by real gross national product.

The first-quarter decline compared with a 4.3-percent climb in real GNP in the last three months of 1984.

Seven of the 10 indicators available for March contributed to the decline in the composite index. Led by a slowdown in the formation of new businesses, they included a decline in orders for factory equipment and a similar decline in orders for consumer goods.

Vendor deliveries also speeded up, which shows up as a negative influence by suggesting demand is falling. Raw materials prices went down, also considered a negative for the same reason. The average of 500 common stock prices edged lower and the money supply contracted.

On the positive side were three indicators: an expansion in the length of the average workweek, an increase in the number of building permits, and fewer new claims for unemployment insurance.

However, in early April, the Labor Dept. reported the number of new claims for state unemployment insurance benefits totaled 408,000 for the week ended Apr. 13. The last time the number of new claims rose above the 400,000 mark was a month earlier in the week ended Mar. 9.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Donahue with LID Board Chairman Tom Kahn, center, and Executive Director Arch Puddington at awards luncheon.

Donahue cites labor's role in battle for human rights

New York—American labor's assistance to free trade unions around the world will continue wherever and whenever workers are struggling for their basic human rights, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared in accepting the League for Industrial Democracy's annual award.

Donahue told a luncheon gathering that in every nation in which LID and the U.S. labor movement are helping unions and their members attain and preserve free trade unionism—in Chile, El Salvador, the Philippines, Nicaragua, South Africa—the involvement is for the same reasons.

"Why are we concerned, and why is LID concerned? Because we are members of the only human race there is, and each of us has a responsibility toward every other human being, and especially toward those who, like ourselves, work for a living and who want, like ourselves, a better world and a more rewarding life for all."

At the same time, Donahue said, "we are exercising that responsibility to protect ourselves—because unless all are free, then none can be secure in their freedom."

Personal efforts

The award was made at LID's 89th award presentation. The organization, which seeks to further democracy and trade union rights here and abroad, gives its award annually for a person's contribution to the expansion of worker rights.

Testimonies to Donahue's contributions to the cause of workers around the world came from Service Employees President John Sweeney, former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, and Johanes Maloka, a branch secretary of South Africa's black trade union, the Steel, Engineering & Allied Workers.

Maloka credited the U.S. labor movement for making possible the independent black labor movement's struggle against apartheid, or racial discrimination, in South Africa.

"Democracy—in the world and on the job—and a full understanding of freedom of association not as a frill but as the indispensable base underpinning the human rights are what we seek both here and abroad," Donahue said.

Aiding the oppressed

Helping workers press against governments which seek to restrict or control or crush their trade union organizations has never been a popular pursuit among those whose chief interest is to monopolize power, Donahue noted.

"So I see no reason to think the work we share with LID will be popular in the future," he said.

"But the meatpacker in Iowa, the copper miner in Arizona, and the bus driver in New York remain the people who can, given the opportunity, make their own decisions—thank you very much.

"Unlike their brothers and sisters in Poland, they will press forward to make those decisions and exert their will in a society in which there are no tanks in the streets."

Donahue pledged that American unions will be no less vocal in the future than they have been in the past in demanding that workers have the right to live and grow and pursue their daily interests in a free society.

Previous winners of the LID award have included George Meany, Dunlop, former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall and the late Sen. Henry Jackson (D-Wash.).

Union women mark gains at ICFTU session

Madrid — The number of women in paid employment has increased over the past few decades the world over, and so has women's membership in trade unions. But how are they treated?

The fourth World Women's Conference sponsored here by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions concluded after three days of meetings that progress, while much too slow, is being made toward equality for women.

The movement toward that goal in the United States is being looked upon with hope by women in every nation, AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller reported following the four-day meeting.

Miller, a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, led a 10-member delegation of U.S. women unionists to the conference, and served as a member of the governing presidium. The themes of this year's meeting were "Equality, Employment, Development, Peace, and International Cooperation."

Full agenda

Some 400 women representing labor organizations affiliated with the ICFTU were delegates to the meeting. The agenda focused on speeding the integration of women into trade unions and updating the confederation's Charter of Rights of Working Women.

Delegates approved four major resolutions, including one titled "Women and Work: A Strategy for Employment & Development," which declared that "equal opportunity in employment is a fundamental right for all women." It said "realization of this right can help the world to eliminate the twin scourges of unemployment and poverty."

The conference urged the ICFTU to give special emphasis to the plight of black women in South Africa in its support program to the independent black trade union movement in that country. They are at the bottom rung of the economic ladder both because of the color of their skin and because of their sex, it said.

U.S. delegates besides Miller were AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson from the Government Employees; Flight Attendants President Linda Puchala; Ladies' Garment Workers Vice President Evelyn Dubrow; Pat Stryker of the Teachers; Women's Affairs Director Pat Scarcelli of the Food & Commercial Workers; Dina Beaumont, executive assistant to the Communications Workers President; Auto Workers Vice President Odessa Komer, Irene Carr of the State, County & Municipal Employees, and Gloria Johnson, education and women's affairs director of the Electronic Workers.

Judge finds desk firm abused strikers

Jasper, Ind.—The Furniture Workers gained ground in their three-year battle with Indiana Desk Co. with a ruling that found the company and its hired security guards guilty of assaulting and intimidating UFW strikers.

The decision by a National Labor Relations Board administrative law judge upheld charges filed by the UFW against Indiana Desk and Command Investigations Bureau after Local 334/236 struck the furniture manufacturer in March 1982.

ALJ James T. Youngblood cited the firms for "threatening employees by a display of weapons, attack dogs and a martial arts performance by security guards."

Youngblood also found numerous instances of violent assault and harassment of workers, and that supervisors and guards "threatened to kill" one employee, tried to force a second worker's vehicle off the road, and threatened to run over workers at the carpool area. He also found that a security guard supervisor "attempted to provoke the union's representative into a fight."

Both Indiana Desk and Command Investigations were ordered to post 60-day notices stating they will refrain from further violations of the law.

Union upheld

UFW President Carl Scarbrough said the judge's ruling reaffirmed the union's position.

"Indiana Desk and its security guards were guilty of violent assaults and death threats against our members who had been working hard to come to an agreement with the company through peaceful negotiations," Scarbrough said. "The company's response to negotiation was violence, a clear violation of the law."

However, the judge did not agree with the union's charge that Indiana Desk had refused to bargain in good faith. That decision will be appealed to the full NLRB.

Indiana Desk has been on the AFL-CIO boycott list since May 1982. Some 170 workers were forced to strike after the company refused to bargain. It had stalled negotiations until four days before the contract expired, then proposed taking away pension and insurance plans and the right to grieve on incentive rates.

Production and maintenance employees worked nearly three months without a contract before voting to walk out. The company's bargaining strategy was designed by an Indianapolis management consulting firm and included armed security guards and attack dogs.

UFW members are still manning the picket lines, and the NLRB has ordered the company to recall about 30 union workers. The UFW is now organizing the workers. Scarbrough expressed optimism that "we'll win the war."

Rubber Workers reach tire accords

rich in March, Uniroyal in February, and Goodyear this week maintains current benefit levels without increasing the amounts of the deductibles or the size of copayments. The program requires cost-saving procedures such as second opinions, central distribution of prescriptions, and outpatient care.

Other improvements were made in supplemental unemployment benefits, sickness and accident insurance, life insurance, survivor benefits and other items, Stone said.

URW contracts with the Big Four tire producers expired on Apr. 20 and the members have been working on a day-to-day basis since. Goodyear is the largest employer with 16,000 URW members, followed by Firestone with 8,500, Goodrich with 7,200 and Uniroyal with 4,000. A pattern agreement reached with the Big Four will likely extend to the smaller tire companies, the union said.

Brock calls for better union-employer relations

By David L. Perlman

William E. Brock used his first public appearance as Secretary of Labor to send a message to union-busting employers that the future lies with companies that follow "progressive labor policies."

He urged "less partisan rhetoric" and greater labor-management cooperation toward making American goods more competitive—without wage-cutting.

Brock told a National Press Club audience that American workers "shouldn't have to compete on wages" if the United States stays competitive in productivity and technology.

His nationally broadcast address carved out three basic principles that Brock insisted must be immune from challenge in this or any future Administration.

Labor Sec. William E. Brock sets new course.

Settled issue

Collective bargaining is one such "settled issue," Brock said. He termed it "a fundamental and essential right for working men and women."

There can be no turning back on equal opportunity in the workplace Brock affirmed. That, too, is "a settled issue."

Likewise, he said, America's workplaces must be kept "free from avoidable risks of health and safety." That obligation is "settled policy" even though there remain differences on how best to assure it.

Brock was confirmed by the Senate on Apr. 26, unanimously and with expressions of goodwill from Republicans and Democrats alike. He has been the U.S. trade representative for the past four years. Earlier, he was Republican national chairman after having served as both a senator and congressman from Tennessee.

Brock takes over a Labor Dept. that has been rudderless for most of the past year. Its former secretary, Raymond J. Donovan, faces a criminal trial in New York and had been on leave of absence for some six months before his resignation in March.

During President Reagan's first term, the department's role as an advocate of workers had in many cases been reversed by appointees with anti-union backgrounds who were hostile to programs they were supposed to enforce.

Understanding needed

When the Senate took up Brock's confirmation, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) explained why he welcomed Brock's appointment. "Reasonable people can and will disagree" on issues, Kennedy said. "But before we can begin to debate, we need a new Secretary of Labor who understands the issues and is committed to enforcing the laws he is sworn to administer."

Brock used similar language in his address to the Press Club.

There will continue to be differences between the Administration and its critics, Brock noted. But he looks on politics as "a healthy conflict of ideas." All differences don't have to be papered over. "We don't have to agree; we do have to talk."

Brock reiterated his support for the Administration's proposal for a subminimum youth wage—a position that puts him in conflict with the trade union movement.

It's not "the ultimate solution to the teenage unemployment problem," Brock acknowledged. But he said he's strongly convinced that it is "worth trying."

In this and in other areas of differences, Brock said, persons on each side of the issue should make an effort to understand why those who differ "seem to feel so strongly that we're wrong when we feel with just as much certainty that we're not."

Strong dollar

Brock reiterated his opposition to what he termed "protectionism" but concurred in the viewpoint that there is a limit to what labor and management cooperation can achieve in a market in which the exchange rate of the dollar puts American goods at such a disadvantage.

He said a reduction in the federal deficit to bring down interest rates is an essential part of the solution.

Brock disagreed with labor critics who say existing trade laws aren't being fully enforced, but he acknowledged the imbalance of the present structure. He said he favored new trade talks, but not with the intent of making further U.S. concessions.

"We have nothing more to give" in trade negotiations, Brock said. The United States has already opened its doors to world trade, "but we're the only one that has."

Market access

The bargaining chip, Brock suggested, is that the United States can "take away" access to its home market if other countries don't make needed concessions.

Brock stressed his belief that an array of interrelated measures are needed to make the United States an effective competitor, including upgrading education and training programs, reshaping tax policies and discarding both "sloppy management and unproductive work rules."

He praised a provision in the Auto Workers contract with General Motors that earmarks a nickel an hour for job retraining. That small amount adds up to a $50 million investment, Brock noted.

"Companies with progressive labor policies are showing their competitive strength through increased productivity and better labor-management relations," he said.

"That means a better product at a better price. That means a sound future," he stressed.

Within the Labor Dept., Brock filled a vacancy as deputy under secretary for labor-management relations with a veteran union attorney, Stephen Schlossberg. The post involves encouragement of cooperative union-employer programs as well as overseeing worker protection provisions of various laws.

OSHA chief's stock holdings examined by U.S. ethics office

Conflict-of-interest allegations against OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland continued to mount, and the Office of Government Ethics announced that it has begun a formal "review."

At issue is the link between Rowland's actions as head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and his extensive stock holdings.

The most recent example is Rowland's controversial decision not to adopt a federal standard requiring large farm employers to provide toilets and washing facilities for their field workers. Rowland's holdings include a block of stock in Tenneco, Inc., whose agribusiness subsidiary owns more than 1 million acres of farm land in California and Arizona.

Rowland's financial statement shows him as the owner of stock valued at more than $1 million in chemical, pharmaceutical and other industrial companies that could be affected by OSHA decisions. He has personally participated in OSHA actions affecting companies in which he has investments exceeding $300,000.

House Education & Labor Committee Chairman Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) had asked the General Accounting Office to look into the conflict-of-interest issue, and the GAO in turn referred the matter to the government ethics office.

If a violation of the conflict-of-interest law is found, the ethics office could refer the case to the Justice Dept. for prosecution.

Rowland contends that a waiver granted by former Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan absolves him of strict compliance with the law.

When he took office last year under a recess appointment, which has not yet been confirmed by the Senate, Rowland put his stock holdings in a limited trust. Under its provisions, he would not make buying or selling decisions but the trustee would continue to inform him of his current holdings.

The waiver from Donovan reportedly allows Rowland to participate in broad policy decisions that might affect companies in which he holds a financial interest. But he is not supposed to take part in matters affecting a specific company in which he holds stock.

Among the issues are Rowland's role in OSHA policy regarding formaldehyde, benzene and ethylene oxide—all products made or used by firms in which Rowland holds stock.

An OSHA spokesman told the Washington Post that Rowland saw no conflict when he decided against the field sanitation standards because the decision would have "little or no impact" on the Tenneco stock price. It wouldn't affect the stock price "more than a penny," the agency official was quoted.

Worst foot forward

OSHA's top management has been accused of foot-dragging when it comes to establishing and enforcing occupational safety and health standards.

A group of high-level agency supervisors, attending a recent two-day "retreat" at a Williamsburg, Va., hotel, found the letters KATN prominently posted in their meeting room. The sign was a reminder of the advice from OSHA official James R. Meadows to "kick ass and take names."

Meadows, then a special assistant to OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland but promoted a few days later to the post of deputy administrator, was quoted as saying that OSHA management has to be more aggressive in getting rid of "troublemakers" and "lazy employees." As for civil service regulations, let the victims "hire an attorney and spend the next three years trying to get their jobs back."

Government Employees Local 12, which represents Labor Dept. employees, wasn't amused. It asked William E. Brock, the new Secretary of Labor, to investigate whether Meadows made the remarks attributed to him. If so, Local 12 President Michael Urquhart said, Meadows was "clearly advising other senior OSHA managers to violate the law" and should be removed from office.

Devine gets 'untangled' from OPM's payroll

Donald J. Devine left the payroll of the federal Office of Personnel Management, but he still hopes the Senate will confirm him for a second four-year term as OPM director.

Devine's term as OPM director expired Mar. 25, and his deputy, Loretta Cornelius, became acting director. The first thing she did was to hire Devine to a "temporary" $72,300-a-year job as her special assistant.

His nomination was left dangling when the Senate Governmental Operations Committee couldn't muster a majority for Devine, who had come under sharp attack for his active campaigning for right-wing Republican candidates while administering the career civil service. Devine's office was also the source of a "dirty tricks" memo proposing to set "union against union."

Devine said his resignation was prompted by the need to clarify the "tangled lines of authority" between him and his acting boss.

Schlossberg gets Labor Dept. post

Stephen I. Schlossberg, a labor lawyer and former trade union organizer, has been appointed Deputy Under Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations.

Schlossberg's appointment was the first major personnel action taken by Labor Sec. William E. Brock. The post involves working with cooperative union-employer programs, an area Brock said he hopes to encourage, and administration of worker protection provisions of various laws.

The first reaction came from the anti-union National Right to Work Committee. Its president, Reed Larson, said he was "outraged" and called on Brock to withdraw it.

Since 1981, Schlossberg has been a partner in a Washington labor law firm. Earlier, he had been government affairs director of the Auto Workers after having served as the UAW's general counsel.

For several years in the Kennedy Administration, Schlossberg was special assistant to the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Schlossberg began as an organizer for the Ladies' Garment Workers in 1950 and became the southern organizing director during his four years on the ILGWU staff. He is a graduate of the University of Virginia and its Law School.

Mark Starr dies at 90, ILGWU education head

New York—Mark Starr, retired education director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, died of pneumonia at Boulevard Hospital here Apr. 24. He was 90.

Starr began his career teaching miners in Wales before coming to the United States in 1928. He headed the ILGWU's education department from 1935 until his retirement in 1960.

Starr also served as president of Teachers Local 189 and was an adviser to numerous government education commissions.

Survivors include his wife Helen and one daughter.

Labor boosts Africa aid

Union members have responded generously to labor appeals for help for famine victims in Ethiopia and other drought-stricken parts of Africa.

In a January letter to union presidents, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland announced the African Drought Relief drive to aid the millions of Africans affected by the drought and channel American union assistance overseas. The relief effort was coordinated by the federation's African-American Labor Center. Donations from the AFL-CIO and 17 affiliates totaling $34,000 were presented to the Red Cross in February, and AALC Executive Director Patrick O'Farrell presented labor's "second installment" of $20,000 to CARE.

CARE has operations in 17 African nations and has been aiding victims in Ethiopia since October 1984, when that government agreed that CARE could monitor the distribution of food and supplies, according to CARE President Wallace Campbell. "Unfortunately, the drought in Ethiopia is matched by several other countries where famine is just as severe," he said. Campbell noted that both the AFL and the CIO were original founders of CARE in 1945 and labor has been a close ally since.

In a separate campaign, Postal Service employees have raised nearly $800,000 for famine victims through a combined labor-management mail campaign. Those funds were channeled to the Red Cross for its Ethiopia/Africa relief effort. The first installment of $415,000 was presented in December.

The drive was launched at a November meeting of Postal Workers President Moe Biller, Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto, then-Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger and other representatives from labor and management groups at the U.S. Postal Service.

Coke stockholders pressed on workers' rights policy

Wilmington, Del.—Food unions at the Coca-Cola Co. annual shareholders' meeting called for a company policy resolution to protect human and trade union rights at all its subsidiaries and franchises.

The resolution, introduced by members of the Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility and supported by the North American affiliate of the International Union of Food & Allied Workers Associations (IUF), received 6.4 percent of the shareholders' vote. The company opposed it.

IUF General Sec. Dan Gallin said "Transnationals, such as Coca-Cola, have stringent control over operations of their their franchises and subsidiaries. They should have the same concern for the workers' rights in their plants."

He noted that such companies would "have us believe that franchise operations are independent from headquarters. As long as these companies derive profits from such operations, they must be willing to assume social responsibility for their employees."

Coca-Cola was targeted by the IUF because of trade union rights violations at its bottling plant in Guatemala, where eight union leaders either disappeared or were killed in the late 1970s. That plant reopened in February under a new owner.

The IUF in March had adopted a resolution calling for transnationals to adopt social responsibility clauses patterned after the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration on Human Rights.

The North American affiliates of IUF includes the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, Machinists, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, the Food & Commercial Workers, the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Lazare Teper, 78, dies, economist for ILGWU

New York—Lazare Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers for 43 years until his retirement in 1980, died Apr. 25 at New York Hospital after a long illness.

Teper, who was 78, founded the union's research department in 1937.

He also served as a technical adviser to the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Commerce Dept., as well as a U.S. labor representative in international trade negotiations.

Human relations award

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney and newspaper columnist Art Buchwald were lauded by the National Conference of Christians & Jews for their "distinguished and outstanding contributions to improving human relations." The organization's brotherhood awards noted Sweeney's efforts on behalf of racial equity and the rights of women. Buchwald, known for his humorous columns, was cited for his contributions to worthy causes.

At Wheeling-Pittsburgh

Steelworkers file claim to protect pay, benefits

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers moved quickly to protect the interests of members employed by Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., which filed for bankruptcy in the biggest failure yet in the domestic steel industry.

The union filed a claim Apr. 22 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Erie, Pa., for $570 million to protect wages and benefits of 8,200 active workers and 10,000 pensioners of the company.

Meanwhile, the company's chief labor negotiator, Joseph Scalise, announced that Wheeling-Pittsburgh did not have the money available to meet a $60 million contribution to the USWA pension fund in the fall and would have to terminate the pension plan. The steelmaker said it would also seek to renegotiate its current contract with the union.

In either case, terminating the pension fund or renegotiating the contract, Bankruptcy Court approval would be needed.

If the company ended the $582 million pension fund, the federal government would be saddled with the largest single unfunded pension liability it has ever handled.

In the event of termination of the plan, the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., would be given the job of administering benefit payments. The agency guarantees pension plans against default if an employer has inadequate assets.

Federal backing

The USWA pension fund has an unfunded liability of more than $200 million. While the plan is secured by the federal government, medical benefits and life insurance are not, and the union's filing in Bankruptcy Court seeks to protect workers' interests in those areas.

Wheeling-Pittsburgh's decision to file for bankruptcy came after the Steelworkers refused to go along with what the union described as an inequitable plan to restructure the firm's $514.6 million of total long-term debt. The union's objection was to a demand by the steelmaker's creditors for a lien on the company's $300 million of current assets (accounts receivable and inventories).

In an Apr. 16 letter to all of the company's employees, USWA District 23 Director Paul D. Rusen of the union's Wheeling-Pittsburgh Negotiating Committee explained:

"While we were negotiating sacrifices, they (the lenders) were making demands. The banks want a mortgage on the company's current assets—our only protection if a bankruptcy does occur. Such a mortgage is not a sacrifice—it is a fast shuffle.

"By demanding a lien on assets, the banks were demanding special treatment. . . . The choice was clear. However bad bankruptcy is now, we would be worse off if we tried to postpone it. Permitting the banks to get control of current assets would, in the next recession, guarantee a liquidation."

In a bankruptcy proceeding under federal law, a company tries to work out a payment plan acceptable to creditors. As bargaining agent for the employees, the Steelworkers represent Wheeling-Pittsburgh's largest unsecured creditor.

Demanding bankers

Rusen said he was more upset with the company's financial creditors than with its management. Eleven banks were unwilling to go along with a proposal that asked for deferrals and forgiveness on interest and principal payments this year and next.

Wheeling - Pittsburgh, which operates nine plants in Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, is the largest industrial firm in the United States to fail in the past two years.

The Steelworkers already had helped the company through some difficult times by granting concessions in exchange for stock in the firm. It had agreed to a further $2 hourly cut in wages this year in exchange for stock and at least two seats on the company's board of directors.

In full-page advertisements in several newspapers, including the Wall Street Journal, the union pointed to these sacrifices, but was firm in its resolution that all parties must help on an equitable basis.

Rusen concluded his letter to workers by urging them to "hang tough" and "keep working."

"The union will continue to protect your rights if we all stick together."

N.C. wage floor linked to boost in federal level

Raleigh, N.C. — The North Carolina legislature approved a labor-backed bill that would raise the state minimum wage to match any increase in the federal minimum wage up to $3.60 an hour between now and July 1, 1987.

The bill was described by State AFL-CIO President Christopher Scott as "a reasonable first step" toward a higher state minimum wage. The measure is effective Oct. 1.

Scott said the bill was drafted to keep the issue before the legislature as well as "to send a message to Congress that North Carolina is ready" for an increase in the federal minimum wage, now $3.35 an hour.

The bill ties the state minimum wage increase to the federal increase because "we are painfully aware that it is unlikely this legislature would go ahead of the federal minimum wage," Scott said.

The State AFL-CIO also is pressing for General Assembly enactment of a bill requiring employers to give advance notice of plant closings.

Scott said chances also are good that a "right-to-know" bill will be enacted into law during the current biennial legislative session. Under that measure workers would have the right to know of any dangerous chemicals or substances to which they are exposed on the job or which are being stored in their communities.

The Bottom Line

THE MESSAGE that the AFL-CIO sent to senators at the start of the budget debate was that it is the bottom-line vote that counts.

Votes cast for amendments to remedy some of the more blatant inequities in the budget proposal earn no thanks if the final version adopted makes only cosmetic changes.

The Republican leadership, beaten badly in the first test vote on social security cutbacks, speaks of compromises. But even in the best imaginable scenario for the budget resolution, there would be enormous compromises from the nation's needs.

At a time when unemployment and poverty are at historic heights, when health care and housing needs go unmet, when millions are still hurting from program cuts imposed by four previous Reagan budgets, merely continuing present levels of service would be a mighty compromise.

Yet those with less are again being asked to make new sacrifices.

As the AFL-CIO wrote to senators, the budget package "provides defense increases which are immoderate in the current fiscal context, and it uses the deficit as a pretext to knock down, disable or obliterate the bare remains of programs left from the budget battle of the past four years."

IDEALLY, a range of tax reforms that should be enacted in any event merely on the grounds of fairness would provide the revenue that would enable the United States to meet its domestic needs, its military defense needs, its humanitarian world obligations, and still make a start toward bringing down the deficit.

Realistically, there is one step of tax reform that has broad popular support and would enable Congress to avoid further damage to needed public programs without adding to the budget deficit.

That's a minimum tax on corporate profits. It is incredible that 65 companies with profits totaling almost $50 billion have been able under present tax laws to avoid paying any federal income tax.

The Eternal Flame

THE FLAME of freedom can never be entirely extinguished, as oppressive governments the world over eventually discover.

Poland's rulers learned that lesson anew this past week, when more than 15,000 men and women marched through Warsaw behind the banners of the outlawed Solidarnosc trade union movement.

In Poland, Solidarnosc and the cause of freedom are inexorably linked in the public mind. And so Solidarnosc, long banned, remains a force to be reckoned with.

Its leaders have been jailed, granted amnesty, and jailed again. When needed, new leaders spring up.

May Day, a workers' holiday that has been perverted by Communist states, opens in Warsaw with a courageous priest taking as the text for a sermon the words of the International Labor Organization's convention proclaiming the right of workers everywhere to organize into unions of their choice.

In the modern world, the union banner increasingly is freedom's banner.

Behind the union banner, in South Africa's biggest gold mine, 15,000 black miners risk deportation and dismissal by daring to strike. In a separate incident, police "detain" 30 union supporters demonstrating support for their bargaining committee.

A continent apart, in nations vastly different in proclaimed ideology and economic structure, workers react the same way to the denial of freedom.

In Poland, it's called Solidarnosc.

We know it as solidarity, but in any language it stands for the same thing. It stands for freedom.

Health of farm workers flushed away by OSHA

By Press Associates, Inc.

It seems like one of the toughest tasks in the history of public policy is to toilet-train agribusiness and its conservative political supporters.

Remember that scene at the end of the "Grapes of Wrath" film when the Joad family arrived at a government-sponsored rest camp and discovered the wonder of flushing toilets? Well, the growers put an end to that luxury pretty fast and had those camps shut down.

The more modest goal of migrant workers and their supporters in recent decades has been to win the right to toilets, handwashing facilities and drinking water in the fields.

For 13 years farm workers have been petitioning and suing the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for a field sanitation standard.

They have been given the runaround as agribusiness, bureaucrats and more recently the Reagan Administration blocked action.

The latest shocker occurred Apr. 12 when OSHA chief Robert A. Rowland announced that OSHA would not issue a sanitation regulation. Rowland used essentially a states' rights argument, claiming two-thirds of hired farm workers who would be reached by a federal rule are already covered by state rules, and that matters of public health are traditionally a state responsibility. Rowland also claimed budget stringency, saying OSHA's resources should be used for inspecting high-hazard worksites.

An outrage

Charles Horwitz, who has led the fight by the Migrant Legal Action Program, Inc., on behalf of the National Congress of Hispanic American Citizens and farm worker groups, called Rowland's decision "an outrage."

Horwitz said MLAP agrees with the statement of Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) that the refusal to require workplace toilets and handwashing facilities "is one of the most shameful decisions ever made in the Dept. of Labor."

MLAP noted that most states do not enforce sanitation standards. It also pointed out that two experts hired by OSHA strongly supported a federal standard.

Dr. Eugene Gangarosa of Emory University found that, compared to the general population, farm workers are 7 to 26 times more likely to contract parasitic diseases, 9 to 85 times more likely to suffer from diarrhea, three times more likely to have skin rashes and twice as likely to suffer heat stress.

Overdue

Dr. Charles Levenstein of the American Public Health Association told an OSHA hearing on the issue that the fight for protection against life-threatening diseases and parasites should have been won in America. "In this day and age," he said, "the fight is supposed to be against cancer and heart disease, not hookworm, whipworm, and shigella."

MLAP also has argued that the costs to agribusiness would be relatively insignificant. The industry had gross sales of $260 billion in 1980, MLAP said. The cost to employers to provide toilets, handwashing and drinking water to some 500,000 farm workers under the proposed OSHA rule would have been $14.7 million a year or 55 to 73 cents per worker per day.

Common sense says that healthy workers and field workers toiling under a hot sun who are provided water would be more productive workers. Dr. Levenstein estimated the reduction of infectious diseases under a sanitation rule would increase productivity between $79 million and $120 million a year.

Rowland's action was no surprise to observers in the nation's capital. OSHA has been pretty well gutted during the tenure of ex-Labor Sec. Ray Donovan, who resigned to face larceny and fraud charges in New York. Rowland, a millionaire Texas attorney and former Reagan campaign official, put upward of $1 million in stock in a blind trust. His stock is mainly in companies like Tenneco, Monsanto, Exxon and Manville that would be affected by OSHA regulations.

From Folks Who Gave Us Jim Watt

After Jim Watt, no Reagan appointee could come as a shock, but Dr. Eileen M. Gardner sure was a surprise. She's the high-level appointee to the Department of Education whose views on programs for handicapped Americans caused a flap recently and led to her own resignation.

She resents, for example, special education efforts for handicapped children aided by federal funds. Before her appointment, she wrote in a paper for the Heritage Foundation that such special programs "selfishly drain resources from the normal school population and most probably weaken the quality of teaching."

She also opposes programs that integrate handicapped children into the regular classrooms.

Of the handicapped generally, she wrote for the Heritage Foundation that they risk becoming "ineffective malcontents" if they expect others to "bear their burdens and eliminate their challenges." Nobody has suggested this, nor has any program intended or done it.

One of her other statements was "the handicapped falsely assume that the lottery of life has penalized them at random."

After all this came out at a hearing and met with some heat, Dr. Gardner resigned. End of story? Yes. But it shouldn't be.

Few reporters pointed out that the Reagan government is chock full of folks who think like this one, not necessarily concerning the handicapped, perhaps, but concerning any group that benefits from a federal program.

A lot of these appointees come out of the Heritage Foundation or other groups in the right wing or religious right orbit.

Dr. Gardner, for example, though an appointee to the Department of Education, wrote for the Heritage Foundation, "The proper role of the federal government in education is no role. . . ."

One of the few commentators to see in the Gardner case a broader application to this Administration was Haynes Johnson, who wrote in the Washington Post:

"This kind of appointment reveals a cast of mind that seems pervasive at the top levels of the Administration: that of true believers determined to impose their rigidly held views of God and society on the rest of public life. . . .

"If that's the kind of thinking that gets rewarded with high Administration posts, then we're witnessing nothing less than an attempt to return to the concepts of Social Darwinism and laissez faire in public life.

"Social Darwinism is the discredited cast of mind that permitted the robber barons to celebrate their crushing of the little people by claiming it was all the workings of God's immutable laws. In that reasoning, you measure success by the survival of the fittest. What counts is strength and power. Sink or swim. If you fail, it's your fault. Government and society have no obligation to help those in need or those who are weaker.

"Of course, that kind of political thinking went the way of the dinosaurs, but its reemergence fits in with the cross-currents . . . in Washington. . . ."

As if to underscore the point, a few days after Johnson's comments, yet another Reagan appointee wound up in the news. She had edited a 1982 book that claimed American blacks "insist on preserving their jungle freedoms, their women, their avoidance of personal responsibility and their abhorrence of the work ethic."

The book attacks sociologists who "put blacks on welfare so they can continue their jungle freedoms of leisure time and subsidized procreation."

Other wisdom: Blacks "resent" the school system partly because "they find it humiliating that female teachers should instruct black males."

The Reagan appointee who edited the book is Marianne Hall, chairperson of the federal Copyright Royalty Tribunal, who says of the views expressed: "I'm not qualified to address concerns of a scientific nature like that." Some scientific.

GOP Posts Steady Gains in Sun Belt

Steady and substantial increases in support for the Republican Party, its candidates and its point of view in Sun Belt states are reported in a lengthy Washington Post story.

Gains are not large enough to sustain any theory of a "realignment" making the GOP the nation's majority party. But since the Sun Belt states are those with largest population increases, they are the ones that will gain congressional seats after the 1990 Census, at the expense of more Democratic-leaning areas like the Northeast and the Midwest industrial belt.

State GOP gains reported by the Post show:

- Arizona—After a post-election purge of voter lists last November, Republicans wound up with a plurality among registered voters for the first time in decades—although a very small one.
- Colorado—The Post reports the state GOP has set up a strong registration and get-out-the-vote procedure that gave the party enough strength in both legislative houses to override any veto by Democratic Gov. Lamm, who describes the state GOP operation as "awesome." (Colorado, home of good Reagan friends, the Coors brewing family, was a breeding ground for ultra-conservatives who took high positions in this Administration, among them James Watt and Ann Gorsuch-Burford.)
- Florida—Registered Democrats still outnumber Republicans, but in the past four years new registrations have gone 2-1 for the GOP. And last November, the party picked up six seats in the state legislature plus two "born again" legislative conversions from Democrat to GOP.
- Texas—In addition to a gain of three U.S. House seats last year, the GOP has climbed in statewide surveys to a position just about level with the Democrats in party allegiance. This is a pick-up of more than 13 points in little more than a year and appears to have come largely from ranks of independents. A couple of years ago, non-aligned voters were about 25 percent of the electorate. Now, they're down to 10 percent.
- Louisiana—GOP is still badly outnumbered in voter registration, but is getting lion's share of new registrants. In addition, large numbers now registering independent.
- Alabama—The Democratic margin of allegiance among voters has dropped from 31 to 17 points in only two years, and any recent growth in registration has been for the GOP and independent status. In South Carolina, the Democratic advantage has fallen to only six points from 14 three years ago.

Throughout the Sun Belt—just about everywhere else, too—state Republican parties enjoy an enormous bulge in funding. In South Carolina, the state GOP has a 1985 budget of $350,000; Democrats hope for $140,000 but have to make up a $90,000 debt first. In Alabama, the Democrats' $200,000 spending plan is dwarfed by the GOP's $500,000. In Colorado, it's almost as one-sided: GOP $750,000, Democrats hoping for $300,000.

Sharing the Sacrifices

It is good that President Reagan is calling upon retirees and middle-class and other average Americans to sacrifice to help balance the budget he's sent so wildly out of whack.

After all, a lot of corporate leaders have already set an example for the rest of us to follow.

For example, did you know the chief executive officer of Mobil Oil took a 4.2 percent cut in compensation in 1984? This left his income for the year at only $1,575,000.

Or that AT&T's CEO suffered a 19.2 percent drop in compensation from $1,225,500 in 1983 all the way down to $989,500 last year?

And these are only two examples out of 50 top companies surveyed by USA Today. Six of the top executives of the remaining 48 also took pay cuts, leaving the lowest-paid of them, Donald Lennox of International Harvester, with a 1984 income of only $475,000.

Of course, while pointing to these as examples of sacrifice worthy of emulation, the President might chide some of their fellow top execs for a bit too much self-indulgence and remind them we all have to bite down on the old bullet to cut Reagan's own deficit.

His friends in the corporate world have rewarded themselves most handsomely, in fact. U.S. News and World Report cites median income for board chairmen of major firms of $780,769 which is 15.6 percent over 1983; for presidents a median pay of $581,248 and for vice presidents $402,649, up 11.7 and 16.9 percent.

Four Votes Finally Settle Indiana Race

Out of 233,286 Cast

Well, Democrat Frank McCloskey was sworn in as the re-elected U.S. House member from Indiana's 8th District six months after election day.

In order, McCloskey had appeared election night to be a 72-vote winner over his GOP challenger, Richard McIntyre. Then a counting error discovered a few days later appeared to give McIntyre the victory by 34 votes. Another count enlarged McIntyre's apparent win to a few hundred votes, but there were questions about the conduct of the count. So, a House task force was set up to investigate and supervise yet another count conducted by an outside expert and General Accounting Office auditors.

This final count showed McCloskey the winner by just four votes out of 233,286 votes cast: 116,645-116,641.

House Republicans are in rebellion. They took a walk when McCloskey was finally seated. They have thrown a monkey wrench into House proceedings the past week. They have accused Democrats of "stealing" the seat, but Democrats have plausible responses to challenges raised by the GOP.

Though most Republicans—however angry—have kept a civil tongue, the no-class wing of the party is firing from the mud pit again. Rep. Newt Gingrich (Ga.) is quoted as referring to Speaker O'Neill and other Democratic leaders as "corrupt" and as "thugs." His GOP colleague, Vin Weber (Minn.), refers, according to a news report, to "the slime in the Democratic Party."

It's Happened Before

The Constitution says the U.S. House and Senate shall have the final voice in who gets seated, and the wrangle over the Indiana 8th District House seat while not run of the mill, is not unheard of.

In fact, a similar situation arose in a different Indiana congressional district in 1960, when Rep. Ed Roush (D) at first apparently lost his re-election bid to George Chambers by 12 votes.

An initial recount had Roush the winner . . . by just two votes. Then a follow-up recount supervised by the House itself, which sent General Accounting Office auditors into Indiana, months after the election came up with a 99-vote victory for Roush: 107,357 to 107,258.

In a New Hampshire U.S. Senate race in 1974, Democrat John Durkin lost by 300 votes in the election night count, then won by 10 in a statewide recount and lost by two votes in a second.

The contest went to the Senate Rules Committee and finally to the Senate floor without being resolved. A special election was held in September 1975, 10 months after the first election. This time Durkin won it beyond question with 54 percent.

There was a time when districts were so small and voters so few, because of restrictions, that outright ties for House seats occurred. In Maryland in 1820 Philip Reed and Jeremiah Cosden stalemated at 74 votes each. Fortunately for Reed, he was of the same party as the House Speaker, who got to break the tie and, unsurprisingly, gave Reed the nod.

Council warns economy 'at risk' from impact of Reagan policies

Asks action to ward off new slump

AFL-CIO news

VOL. 30, NO. 19
SATURDAY
MAY 11, 1985

By John M. Barry

The nation's economy has entered a phase of "extreme risk," the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned as it called for congressional action to redress the Reagan Administration's "unbalanced economic policies."

"Signs of an impending downturn are becoming increasingly apparent," the council statement noted. It cited shallow growth of only 1.3 percent in total output for the first quarter of 1985 and a decline in the index of leading economic indicators for March.

"Once again, Administration projections have proven overly optimistic," the council said, adding:

"The economic recovery has run out of steam," while leaving behind record high federal deficits, high interest rates, the worst trade deficits in history and an unemployment rate that has remained stagnant for almost a year.

The statement adopted by the council at its two-day spring meeting in Washington was one of a series focusing on the failures of the Administration's fiscal, economic and social policies. It renewed the federation's call for Congress to restore fairness to the federal budget and to the revenue-raising capacity of the federal tax code. And it urged Federal Reserve Board policies that would lead to lower interest rates and a better trade balance.

At the opening session, the council met with the new Secretary of Labor, William Brock, for what Federation President Lane Kirkland described as a cordial discussion that revolved around employment problems.

Plight of farmers

Another council guest was Cy Carpenter, president of the National Farmers Union, who detailed the plight of family farmers struggling to survive and avoid bankruptcy in the current economic climate. Following a discussion with Carpenter on farmer-labor cooperation, the council approved a statement denouncing the Administration's agriculture policy and outlining a program to strengthen the rural economy and raise the quality of life for farm families.

On international matters, council statements called for U.S. ratification of longstanding conventions of the International Labor Organization, continued sanctions against Poland's repressive government

GOP budget measures hit for inequities

The budget that President Reagan and Senate Republican leaders want Congress to adopt is so blotted with inequities and broken promises that it would undermine confidence in government, the AFL-CIO protested.

An Executive Council statement, adopted as the Senate was nearing a showdown on a budget resolution, demanded an "honest approach" to deficit reduction.

There's no justification for "one standard that rewards the military-industrial complex and the wealthy" while another "destroys programs" essential to workers, retirees, students, farmers and the poor.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland opened a news conference with a blast at the budget package being debated on the Senate floor.

Labor rejects deficit reduction based on cuts in social security and health care, he said, or on elimination of jobs and training programs. The AFL-CIO opposes "strangling our transportation, postal and economic development programs."

Equal sacrifices

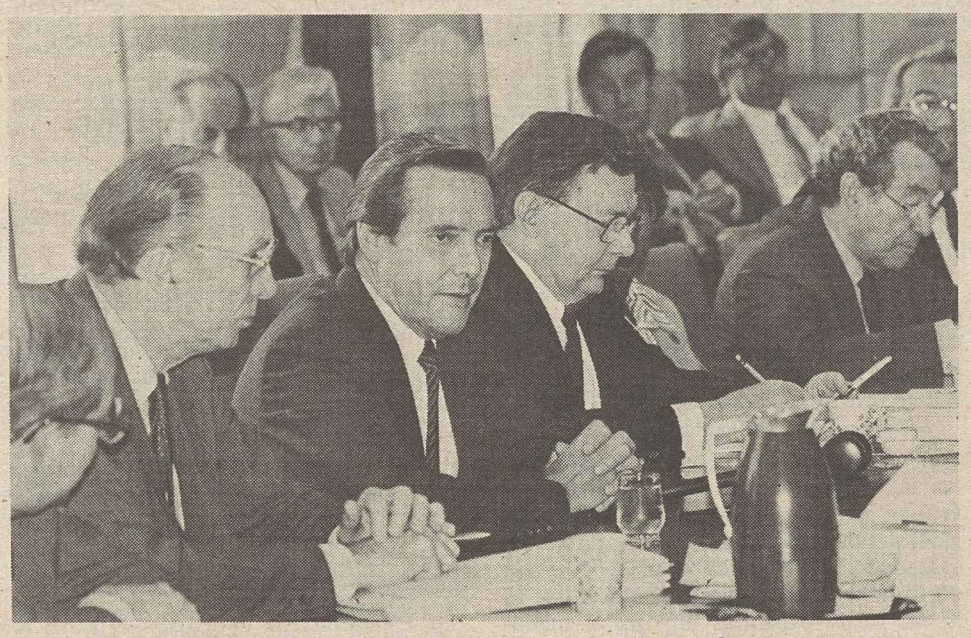
The AFL-CIO supports a strong defense, "as we always have," Kirkland stressed. But it rejects the contention that Congress must "choose between the general welfare and the common defense." He cited the Executive Council assertion that "the Pentagon should not be exempt from spending reductions equal in severity to those forced on domestic programs."



One of the issues before the Senate—and before the House when it takes up a Democratic-sponsored budget resolution—is whether tax reforms should be incorporated in a budget resolution so as to allow restoration of Reagan cuts without enlarging the projected deficit.

Labor's answer was a clearcut "yes."

"We insist that profitable corporations and individuals with large amounts of tax-sheltered income must also make their contribution, and we support the enactment of an effective minimum tax on corporations and wealthy individuals."

It is said that "speedy action on a minimum tax would send a welcome signal to

Tax law changes asked to cool takeover fever

America's economic health is periled by a worsening "epidemic of corporate takeovers," the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

Billions of dollars are being drained from productive uses to finance takeover attempts—and to fend them off. Win or lose, workers and communities are usually left worse off, the AFL-CIO statement noted.

The council urged changes in tax laws that now encourage takeovers and subsidize corporate mergers.

It called for an end to "greenmail"—using corporate funds to buy off raiders by guaranteeing them a big profit on the stock they acquire.

Securities laws should be strengthened to protect the rights of stockholders and mechanisms developed to protect the interests of workers and communities.

Further, the council said, banks and trustees of funds should be barred from investing "in the unsound, speculative instruments of the corporate raider." Through such devices, corporate raiders often end up using a company's own assets to pay for the cost of acquiring it.

Apart from the financing mechanisms, the time and attention devoted to waging and fighting takeover battles is "siphoned off from the task of building better products and providing services at a better price."

Once rare, takeover attempts are now commonplace. "Today's headlines are filled with nonproductive attacks against major profitable companies such as CBS, Crown Zellerbach and Unocal. Next month's list is likely to be even longer," the statement noted.

To avoid a takeover, companies are pressed to "maximize short-term profits at

'We're still free'

R-T-W beaten in New Hampshire

Concord, N.H.—An "educational campaign" by New Hampshire's small but active labor movement helped build a bipartisan coalition that defeated a "right-to-work" bill to scuttle union-shop agreements.

The legislation, which would have made New Hampshire the first northeastern state to succumb to the anti-union virus, passed the House in early April and appeared headed for victory in the heavily Republican Senate.

But it was beaten, 14-10, as eight Republicans joined the state Senate's six Democrats to kill the bill.

The prevailing view expressed in the Senate debate was that labor-management relations in New Hampshire have been generally good and didn't need "fixing."

New Hampshire's state motto is "Live Free or Die." And an elated Harland Eaton, president of the 47,000-member State AFL-CIO, declared after the vote, "We're still free."

The National Right to Work Committee has carried New Hampshire high on its priority list for more than a decade, encouraged by the state's Republican tradition.

GOP domination

After last November's election, the anti-union group had good reason for optimism. Republicans picked up 58 seats in the 400-member House, for a 292-108 margin of control. A gain of three seats gave the Republicans 18-6 domination of the Senate, and the state's Republican governor was easily re-elected.

To add to the pressure, the "right-to-work" campaign carried with it the momentum of an Idaho victory where a Republican legislature had passed a "work" bill over the Democratic governor's veto.

With an assist from the AFL-CIO field staff and unions with relatively large membership in the state, the New Hampshire labor movement set out first to convince union members that the threat to their living standards was real. It wasn't a case of crying wolf.

New Hampshire may be a tourist wonderland, a collection of small towns, but it has long had an industrial base that stems in part from an abundance of water power. The building trades and the shipyard-based metal trades councils are firmly established, the IBEW is a major union in the state, AFSCME represents a sizable group of public employees, and unions representing paperworkers and shoe workers have been important in the state's

Labor scores plan to permit line-item veto

The AFL-CIO made clear its opposition to a constitutional amendment that would allow the President to veto specific items in an appropriations bill while allowing other provisions to become law.

As the Executive Council sees it, that would tilt the existing balance of power between Congress and the White House—unnecessarily and unwisely.

President Reagan has argued for a so-called "line-item veto" as an economy measure. But the council noted that he already has ways to seek to limit spending, and has made use of them. These include veto of the entire appropriations bill with a request that it be reenacted with specified changes, and a proposal to Congress to rescind specific appropriations.

Appropriations bills, like other legislation, usually represents a careful political balance and the process compels the President "to engage in a dialogue with Congress," the council statement noted.

Especially under an administration such as Reagan's, the AFL-CIO suggested, the President "would capriciously use the veto as a weapon of political punishment" or to eliminate provisions he considers "ideologically distasteful."

The solution to budget deficits isn't for Congress to forfeit its constitutional powers, the AFL-CIO stressed.

U.S. sanctions against Poland should remain in place and Poland's external debt should not be rescheduled as long as the Jaruzelski regime continues its war against workers, the AFL-CIO declared.

Citing the continuing repression of leaders of the banned independent trade union, Solidarnosc, the Executive Council said in a statement that at the same time Polish workers are being forced to pay higher prices for basic food items "they are also deprived of the only institution that could defend their interests—Solidarnosc."

As part of its campaign against the independent labor union, the government is bringing to trial on charges of working in illegal trade union structures Solidarnosc leaders Wladyslaw Frasyniuk, Bogdan Lis, and Adam Michnik. At the same time, authorities are attempting to force workers to join government-sponsored unions.

The campaign, according to former Solidarnosc Chairman Lech Walesa, employs "every kind of pressure imaginable, including blackmail and bribery."

Cy Carpenter, president of the National Farmers Union, describes economic crisis facing family farmers as he meets with AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Support pledged in battle to preserve family farms

Family farmers struggling to survive an economic battering will have the AFL-CIO's active support for programs "to strengthen rural America" and provide a fair return for their labor.

An Executive Council statement stressed the "mutual interest" of farmers and workers in bringing down interest rates, preventing a total takeover of farmland by giant agribusiness, and rectifying an "overvalued dollar" that has weakened the export market for U.S. farm products just as it has vastly expanded imports of manufactured goods.

The principal organizations representing family farmers also signalled their interest in strengthening ties with the trade union movement. National Farmers Union President Cy Carpenter met with the AFL-CIO Executive Council at the session which considered the farm policy statement.

A day before the council session opened, the national coordinator for the American Agricultural Movement, David Senter, addressed the weekly meeting of union legislative representatives at the AFL-CIO headquarters.

Serious trouble

Nearly 300,000 family farmers have been forced off the land just in the past four years, the Executive Council noted. Of the remaining 680,000 family-sized farms, an estimated one-third are "in serious trouble" financially.

The council warned that President Reagan's proposed changes in farm policy will lead to "more farm bankruptcies . . . and more domination of agriculture by big business giants."

The Executive Council's statement called for:

- Fair price, production and income policies designed so that the benefits of income-support programs are limited to family farmers.
- A moratorium on farm foreslosures until debt restructuring can take place.
- Curbs on foreign buy-ups of U.S. farmlands and curtailment of commodity speculation.
- Establishment of a federal board to handle foreign sales of U.S. grains.
- Establishment of commodity reserve stockpiles to stabilize prices.
- Health standards for imported foodstuffs equal to those set for domestic products, and labeling as to country of origin.
- Encouragement of farm cooperatives.
- Federal reclamation laws to encourage family ownership and discourage land speculation.
- Assurance of health and safety, housing and sanitary facilities, fair wages and working conditions, and the right to organization and collective bargaining for all farm workers.
- Training and employment assistance for persons displaced from agriculture and programs to meet the needs of rural Americans and migrant workers.

The council also urged a better distribution of the nation's food abundance to needy people at home and abroad.

"Hunger in America is a problem which the Reagan Administration is trying to minimize or ignore," the council charged.

the American people that Congress is serious about fairness in taxes and deficit reduction," the council said.

In response to a news conference question, Kirkland said the AFL-CIO supports both the minimum corporate tax proposal being considered in connection with the budget resolution and comprehensive tax reform. They're not contradictory, he stressed.

In the Senate, Republican Leader Bob Dole (Kan.) was maneuvering to undo some of the amendments the Senate adopted to the budget resolution by substituting a slightly revised budget package.

Earlier, defying the White House, the Senate had passed amendments to preserve cost-of-living adjustments for social security recipients and persons receiving civil service or military pensions.

It voted, 51-48, to hold the rise in military spending to the amount needed to offset inflation next year—substantially below Reagan's budget. And it voted 53-41 to fund Amtrak subsidies at 90 percent of present level. Reagan wants them totally ended.

Majority holds

The Republican leadership was able, however, to get by with only a modest easing of cutbacks in Medicare and Medicaid. And the GOP majority held together to vote down two Democratic alternatives. Both would have closed some corporate loopholes to reduce the revenue deficit.

One Republican-sponsored amendment adopted was a non-binding "sense of the Senate resolution" that laws requiring overtime payments after eight hours a day for work performed on federal procurement or construction contracts be amended to conform to the wage-hour law's requirement for overtime pay only after 40 hours a week. The eight-hour day provisions are part of the Walsh-Healy Act and the Contract Work Hours & Safety Standards Act.

Dole's plan, still being put in final shape, would presumably go back to most of the provisions of the package supported by Reagan, with whatever changes are needed to achieve its passage. Adoption of a substitute would nullify the amendments the Senate has passed.

Joint conference

The next move would be up to the House, and a House-Senate conference would have to reconcile the two measures. After a budget resolution is adopted, Congress is supposed to follow through by "reconciling" legislation and appropriations to conform to its provisions. The congressional budget is not subject to presidential veto.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council statement opposed curtailment of social security cost-of-living adjustments, and backed continued revenue-sharing with states and communities.

It urged Congress "to protect Medicare beneficiaries from greater out-of-pocket expenses for medical care, to remove the cap from Medicaid, to preserve education programs, to protect civil service and postal compensation and retirement programs, and to maintain job training, TVA, Urban Development Action Grants, and other economic development programs."

Report spurs two new programs

Two new AFL-CIO programs designed to move ahead with recommendations of the Executive Council's Committee on the Evolution of Work were announced by Federation President Lane Kirkland during the council's spring meeting in Washington.

In its report issued last February, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," the committee recommended among other things that the AFL-CIO seek to increase membership contacts and improve the communications skills of unionists. To fulfill one of these goals, Kirkland said the federation will initiate a pilot project of direct, personal contacts among trade unionists called "One on One." The project will be started in Georgia, Missouri and Idaho and will include members of any AFL-CIO unions that wish to participate.

The federation also will begin this year to train union activists to deal more effectively with the news media. Kirkland announced that with the aid of members of the Federation of Television & Radio Artists, the AFL-CIO plans to prepare 1,000 union members to act as volunteer spokespersons for the labor movement by the end of 1986.

Kirkland said the objective of the "One-on-One" program is to draw out members' opinions, give them direct information, encourage broader participation and solicit their help. The first training will begin May 28 at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md., and all federation departments will be involved.

"We want to set up and encourage and promote systematic programs whereby local union officers and representatives—stewards and so forth—meet regularly with individual members or in small groups to discuss current issues and problems and promote current objectives," Kirkland told reporters at a news conference.

Following Kirkland's announcement, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue described follow-up meetings relating to the report of the Committee on the Evolution of Work, which he chairs. Donahue reported on exploratory steps to carry out other recommendations of the committee and said leaders of unions not represented on the council will be invited to meet for a discussion of the proposals at the Studies Center in early June.

Rubber Workers settle with Firestone

Akron, Ohio — The Rubber Workers negotiated a tentative agreement with Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. that matches the pattern settlements reached earlier with B.F. Goodrich and Goodyear.

The three-year Firestone package provides for a general wage increase of 43 cents per hour over the term of the contract—25 cents the first year, 10 cents in the second and 8 cents in the third. Cost-of-living adjustments will continue at 1 cent per hour for each rise of .26 in the government's consumer price index.

The accord includes the pattern provisions boosting pension benefits, supplemental unemployment benefits, life insurance and sickness and accident benefits. Firestone workers will also participate in the new medical program that gives them choice between two plans.

The proposed agreement will be voted on by the 8,500 URW members in Firestone's eight plants over the next 10 days, the union said. Those facilities are located in Akron, Albany, Ga.; Bloomington and Decatur, Ill.; Des Moines, Iowa; Noblesville, Ind.; Russellville, Ark., and Oklahoma City, Okla.

Of the "big four" tire makers, only Uniroyal has yet to come to agreement.

Ken Moffett appointed to key post at NABET

Bethesda, Md.—Kenneth E. Moffett has been named assistant to Broadcast Employees & Technicians President Edward M. Lynch. The appointment was approved by NABET's executive council.

Moffett, a former director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, had been with FMCS for 21 years. He later served as executive director of the unaffiliated Major League Baseball Players Association. Before joining FMCS, Moffett was a representative with District 50, which since merged with the Steelworkers.

Council asks steps to avert downturn

and a multi-faceted program to combat apartheid and bring about democratic change in South Africa. These and other council actions are detailed elsewhere in this issue.

In its statement on the economy, the council pointed out that the industrial sector is still suffering from the effects of the 1981-82 recession "and has been drowning under a tidal wave of imports." It said the overvalued American dollar—now 87 percent higher against other major currencies than in July 1980—gives imports "a tremendous price advantage" and has contributed to the nation's record trade deficits of recent years.

Expanding on the trade problem in a separate statement, the council said the Administration's proposal for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations "should not be allowed to take the place of needed efforts to deal with specific domestic trade problems and should not substitute for specific action correcting the imbalance in exchange rates."

If multilateral trade talks do take place, the council said, the United States should seek among other things to include in the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade a social clause "that addresses unfair trade advantages gained through repressive working conditions."

Solutions sought

The statement also called for greater efforts to enforce existing codes and to strengthen GATT safeguards against trade restrictive measures. It said solutions must be found also to "the serious problems faced by U.S. industry in the areas of counterfeiting and intellectual property rights, such as computer programs, films and recordings."

In the light of the severe economic problems facing the nation and the erosion of its basic industry, the council concluded, "U.S. trade and procurement policy must be designed to promote the growth of U.S. employment, higher levels of real income, and a diversified industrial economy," including policies to deal with the overvaluation of the dollar as well as specific sectoral problems.

In response to questions at news conferences during the council meeting, Kirkland noted that the council dealt extensively with trade issues in its discussion with Brock, who held the post of U.S. Trade Representative before his appointment as Labor Secretary. He said Brock was urged specifically to put "some life" back into the trade adjustment assistance program that was designed to provide benefits and retraining for workers who lost their jobs as a result of the rising tide of imports.

Other issues discussed with the Secretary, Kirkland reported, included the minimum wage, the resurrection of homework, revival of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau, and problems growing out of the government's pension insurance programs.

Brock 'responsive'

Brock was "quite responsive" and indicated these were areas he also was concerned with, Kirkland said. He noted, however, that Brock still maintains that the youth subminimum wage ought to be tried on an experimental basis while the AFL-CIO remains firmly opposed to the scheme.

Responding to other questions from reporters, Kirkland said:

- Labor is "disappointed, although not surprised" that the serious and chronic problem of heavy unemployment in the industrial democracies was given little attention at the recent economic summit meeting. Of particular concern were thinly disguised suggestions emanating from the meeting that the undermining of protective labor laws and standards, particularly in Western Europe, "would be a constructive contribution to economic revival."

- In his meetings with local leadership and rank-and-file members he has found them to be "vigorous, determined, not discouraged, deeply concerned about some very serious problems. . . .There's a deep concern with the mess that the country is in—a mess created by national policies—but no loss of spirit or determination on the part of our people."

- President Reagan's recent visit to Belsen and the military cemetery in Bitburg, Germany, that includes graves of some SS troopers was "an effort to gloss over a serious blunder, and I frankly am at a loss to see, with particular reference to Bitburg, any reason that for a moment would justify such an act. It was put forward in the name of reconciliation, but the consequences come close to the reverse effect. . . . As a trade union movement we're very much involved with the German working people. We've been reconciled for years. We have a very close and cordial relationship with the German trade union movement. We felt no overwhelming need for some symbolic act of dubious character."

Federation President Kirkland fields questions at news conference on opening day of council meeting. Information Director Murray Seeger is at right.

Special reports

During the council meeting, Kirkland reported on the first three of this year's series of regional conferences, on the recent ICFTU executive board meeting in Washington, and on his own visit to Germany for the presentation of labor's views by the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (the summit nations).

Kirkland also announced the initiation of two pilot programs to carry out recommendations in the February report of the council's Committee on the Evolution of Work. The chairman of the committee, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, reported on follow-up meetings of the committee itself and of staff representatives to explore proposals for programs to carry forward other recommendations.

The council also heard reports from Donahue on federation finances and matters involving the Article XX Internal Disputes Plan.

Other committee reports were presented by Vice Presidents William H. Wynn on restrictive legislation, John J. Sweeney on health care, Frederick O'Neal on civil rights and Wayne E. Glenn on state and local central bodies. Reports also were given by Vice Presidents Vincent R. Sombrotto on the union-supported campaign for a minimum tax on corporate profits and Murray H. Finley on the Martin Luther King Holiday Fund.

The council approved a quarterly grant to Concerned Seniors for Better Government as well as contributions to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the Committee for National Health Insurance, the Ireland Fund, the National Symphony Orchestra, the Industry-Labor Council of the National Center on Employment of the Handicapped, the Workers' Institute for Safety & Health, People for the American Way and the Economic Policy Institute.

The next meeting of the Executive Council will be held in Pittsburgh, Aug. 13-15.

Death of black African unionist stirs outrage

The AFL-CIO expressed the outrage of American labor over the death of Andries Raditsela, a black trade union official, from head injuries sustained while in the custody of South African police.

Federation President Lane Kirkland cabled a strong protest from the Executive Council to South African Prime Minister P. W. Botha, declaring that the tragedy "fits a pattern that has become all too familiar—the death, under mysterious circumstances, of black South African leaders held under your Preventive Detention laws."

Kirkland recalled that among other opponents of the racist apartheid system who have died while being held under the detention laws was Neil Aggett, who received the George Meany award for human rights in 1982.

Raditsela, 29, was senior shop steward of the Chemical Workers' International Union and vice chairman of the Transvall region of the Federation of South African Trade Unions. His union reported that he was arrested in the black township of Tsakane on Saturday afternoon, May 4, after he was questioned by an armored patrol about the rental car he was driving. While he was showing documentation for the car to police, another patrol vehicle pulled up and a white officer in riot gear walked up and struck Raditsela in the face, the union reported.

Raditsela was dragged to one of the police vehicles, driven away and charged under the Internal Security Act. He was later taken to a hospital in Soweto where he died of head injuries Monday, May 6. Police had withdrawn the charges earlier that day.

News of the tragedy reached the Executive Council the day after it had approved a strong statement calling on the South African government to repeal the Preventive Detention laws, which the council said are used to harass, intimidate and imprison black trade union leaders.

Citing the council's action, Kirkland's cablegram to Botha said South Africa "stands accused of deliberate and consistent disregard of internationally accepted standards of conduct and of perpetually violating the human and trade union rights of black workers and others."

The council's statement also endorsed the call by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions for stiff economic sanctions against South Africa as long as it persists in its policies of oppression. The council called on the U.S. government and other industrial democracies to ban all new investment in South Africa and take these additional steps:

- End all investment guarantees, export credits, and trade promotion with South Africa.

- Stop new loans by the International Monetary Fund, as well as other bank loans, to the South African state and publicly owned companies.

- End sales of Kruggerand gold coins and the purchase of South African coal.

- Punish violators of the United Nations oil embargo against South Africa.

- Embargo the sale of arms to South Africa, especially those used by its military, security, and police forces.

- Compel disinvestment by multinational firms in the agency and high-technology sectors of the South African economy.

- Force disinvestment by all multinational firms that have been identified by the independent black trade union movement as being in violation of internationally accepted labor standards.

"The growing black trade union movement of South Africa remains the best hope for democratic, peaceful change in that tragic country," the council said.

U.S. pressed to ratify key ILO conventions

The AFL-CIO strongly urged the Administration and Congress to begin procedures for the United States to ratify certain key conventions of the International Labor Organization, charging that failure to do so "is a continuing embarrassment to our nation."

Calling especially for ratification of Conventions 87 and 98, which deal respectively with freedom of association and collective bargaining rights, the Executive Council declared there is no justification for withholding U.S. approval.

By delaying ratification, the Soviet Union gains a propaganda advantage to the embarrassment of the free world, the council said.

Federation President Lane Kirkland, at a news conference during the council meeting, charged that the United States has been "absolutely delinquent" in living up to its responsibility with respect to ILO conventions. Of the more than 150 conventions that have been adopted by the ILO, Kirkland noted, the United States has ratified only five or six relating to "rather abstruse aspects of maritime employment."

Although the ILO has no power to force member states to comply with its international conventions, or standards, the reports of its Committee on Application of Conventions have an impact on world public opinion as evidenced by the continuing effort of the Soviet bloc to dismantle the ILO's implementation machinery, the council observed.

When the Solidarnosc independent trade union movement emerged in Poland five years ago, one of its chief demands was that the Polish government abide by convention 87, guaranteeing freedom of association, which Poland had ratified.

"When an ILO Commission of Inquiry found Poland in violation of this convention, Poland withdrew from the ILO," the council observed in a statement. "Yet the United States has so far refused to ratify this very convention."

The council also urged U.S. ratification of Conventions 29 and 105 condemning forced labor and slave labor, respectively.

There is no evidence that ratification of these four conventions would present the U.S. with any constitutional problems or require the modification of existing legislation, the council declared.

L.A. pay equity settlement closes gap for 4,000

Los Angeles—A breakthrough pay equity settlement negotiated by the State, County & Municipal Employees will bring extra salary increases to some 4,000 city workers in clerical and librarian jobs that have been held primarily by women.

The three-year contract, expected to be quickly ratified by the Los Angeles City Council, provides additional raises of 11 to 15 percent to achieve parity with occupations in which men predominate.

The pay equity increase—valued at $12 million—is on top of a 9 percent across-the-board raise negotiated by the union.

With the new agreement, AFSCME is withdrawing the sex discrimination complaint it filed against the city in 1981 with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Both the union and city officials hailed the outcome.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said the agreement, following similar settlements elsewhere, shows that "the momentum in eliminating sex bias from public-sector wage scales is now irreversible."

Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley termed the pay equity settlement a "historic step" that will "send a message to all cities across this country."

Long struggle

Betty Ballard, a 20-year city employee and president of AFSCME Local 3090, described the agreement the result of a "long and hard" struggle against sex-based pay discrimination.

Local 2626 President Harriet Newton said the outcome proved the effectiveness of the collective bargaining process to achieve pay parity for women.

The multi-million dollar equity settlement will be phased in over the contract period in four steps, achieving full parity in July 1987.

Over the contract period, the agreement will bring an average pay equity adjustment of about $6,000 for librarians and about $5,000 for secretaries, clerk typists, stenographers and accounting clerks.

In laying the groundwork for the union's pay claim, AFSCME conducted an extensive analysis of Los Angeles wage scales to document disparities between jobs held largely by women and those filled by men.

Late last year, the Los Angeles City Council voted to begin pay equity negotiations and formal talks got under way in January. The increases will be retroactive to Apr. 1. The two AFSCME locals ratified the agreement nearly unanimously.

The city estimated the cost of the pay equity adjustments at $12 million.

The city's administrative officer, Keith Comrie, said the sex discrimination complaint filed by AFSCME brought the issue to focus and the settlement that was worked out at the bargaining table "was just a matter of fairness."

In the surrounding Los Angeles County government, the Service Employees also have followed the course of filing a complaint with the EEOC and pressing for bargaining table meetings.

One of the early pay equity victories was won by municipal employees in San Jose, Calif., after a nine-day strike.

Legal actions

Lawsuits have been filed by AFSCME and other unions in a number of states and localities. A landmark decision was won by AFSCME in a pay equity suit against Washington state. That ruling has been appealed by the state and a decision by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals is pending.

The federal Civil Rights Commission, in a controversial decision reflecting the views of President Reagan's appointees, has adopted a report rejecting the concept of comparable pay as a civil right.

Union women protest at South African embassy on eve of CLUW conference on problems of working mothers.

CLUW conference explores child-care need posed by record number of working mothers

The number of working mothers in the labor force today has reached record levels, but the responsibility for child care continues to be theirs, the Coalition of Labor Union Women pointed out.

The findings were underscored at CLUW's conference on work and the family in exploring the need for quality child care and meeting other family needs such as elderly care.

The lack of affordable child care serves to keep women who need to work out of the labor force, the participants were told. It also results in increased absenteeism, higher turnover, reduced productivity and heightened family stress.

"Economic reality has created the phenomenon of the two-worker family," CLUW President Joyce Miller noted in opening the conference. "Today, more than ever, women must work to ensure their families survive."

Miller, who is also an AFL-CIO vice president and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, said she is "sick and tired" of hearing working mothers blamed for weakening family structure.

"The labor movement has always been the real pro-family movement in the United States," Miller said.

Reagan cutbacks

"The Reagan Administration is not pro-family," she declared. "This Administration has done more than any other to destroy the American family" by slashing funds for day care, dismantling affirmative action, cutting funds for education, and reducing Medicare and Medicaid.

CLUW member Patricia Dishon, a Steelworker, told participants of entering the workforce in the 1960s at a Baltimore box factory with take home pay of $98 a week. As the cost of day care for her four children was $112 a week, she was forced to turn to family, friends and neighbors to take care of her children.

Today, one of Dishon's daughters has a three-year-old of her own and finds herself in a comparable situation. "She earns a minimum wage. She can't afford a baby sitter, and a day care center would take more than three-quarters of her salary."

Toby McIntosh, a Washington Newspaper Guild member, told participants that his employer wouldn't agree to on-site child care, using the argument that in an urban setting high rents prohibit it.

Participants found that there are two primary vehicles for achieving adequate child care: legislative action and collective bargaining. Progress in both areas, however, appears to be an uphill fight.

Bleak outlook

A panel of legislative representatives responding to the workers' testimony noted that with the budget-cutting mood of Congress, passage of any federal child care legislation looks unlikely in the near future.

Arnold Mayer, legislative director of the Food & Commercial Workers, noted continued right-wing opposition to federally supported child care based on the ridiculous argument that children would be "Sovietized or collectivized."

As far as employers go, a recent study by the Conference Board — a corporate research group — shows only 2,000 of the more than 6 million U.S. companies offer some form of child care assistance.

At workshops, participants shared experiences on unions' progress in securing child care facilities, as well as family-oriented provisions in contracts.

Apart from child care, other solutions discussed included creative leave clauses, "flextime," voucher plans, flexible benefits and job-sharing.

The conference was held in conjunction with the meeting of CLUW's national executive board. Before the conference, eight CLUW members were arrested at the South African embassy in a protest against the country's racist policies.

CWA sets protest of Bell Atlantic's anti-union actions

The Communications Workers initiated a protest campaign against Bell Atlantic Corp. to counter the telephone company's anti-union activities.

The campaign includes intervention in utility commission rate cases, picket line demonstrations and "whatever action is necessary to convince Bell Atlantic that harmonious labor-management relations is the price for future cooperation," said CWA Vice Presidents Morty Bahr of District 1, George Strick of District 2 and William Wallace of District 13 said.

Bell Atlantic has set up unregulated subsidiaries outside of the union contract by taking advantage of a loophole in the AT&T divestiture court order, the vice presidents said. They charged that Company chairman Thomas Bolger reneged on a 1983 pledge not to try "to avoid the union" when hiring permanent workers at the new subsidiary.

Proposed rate increases made by C&P Telephone Co. of the District of Columbia and by Bell of Pennsylvania have been publicly challenged by the CWA as a part of the new campaign. Both companies are part of Bell Atlantic, one of the seven regional Bell companies formed after the divestiture of AT&T.

In both rate increase cases, the CWA vice presidents are questioning whether part of the funds it is seeking in rate hikes may be used to finance the non-union enterprises of the holding company's unregulated subsidiary, Bell Atlanticom.

Bell management has asserted Bell Atlanticom is a new company where "third party representation is unnecessary."

Of the 180,000 CWA members in the three union districts some 75,000 are employed by Bell Atlantic.

Executives get double-digit raises

The average compensation package for the chief executive officers of "blue chip" corporations soared by 22 percent in 1984 to $1.1 million, well above increases paid to workers.

The highest paid corporate executive in 1984 was T. Boone Pickens, Jr., chairman of Mesa Petroleum Co. and a leading corporate raider. He received $22.8 million for his efforts, according to Business Week magazine, which tallied the pay packages provided by 259 firms.

Long-term or deferred income, mainly from stock options, accounted for part of the compensation package. But the top managers averaged an additional 12.7 percent in salaries and bonuses in 1984, the second consecutive year of double digit raises. The corporate average for salaries and bonuses rose to $953,000.

Business Week noted that in order for a corporate chief to make this year's list of the 25 highest paid executives, he would have had to have received at least $2,340,000 in total compensation—the amount paid to John F. Burlingame, vice-chairman of General Electric.

Auto industry executives filled six of the 25 slots on the highest paid list. Chrysler Chairman Lee Iacocca was No. 5 on the list at $5.5 million. Ford Chairman Philip Caldwell, who retired last January was eighth with compensation of $4.1 million.

Healthy sum

David A. Jones, chairman of Humana, Inc., the nation's second largest hospital chain, captured second with compensation of $18.1 million.

Ironically, from the study of 259 firms, Business Week found that four of the 25 highest paid executives also showed up on its list of the top 10 executives who returned their shareholders the least on their investments. Those four were An Wang, chairman of Wang Labs; Harrington Drake, chairman of Dun & Bradstreet; Edson D. deCastro, chairman and president of Data General, and T. Boone Pickens, Jr., of Mesa Petroleum, who ranked first on both lists.

None of the 25 highest paid executives showed up on the list of the top 10 who returned the most to the investors.

Business Week, in the same issue, listed salaries of 78 union officials, noting their pay was only 10 percent of the average corporate executive salary of $953,000.

The top two pay slots were taken by President Jackie Presser and Sec.-Treas. Ray Schoessling (now retired) of the unaffiliated Teamsters who received $534,143 and $206,760 respectively. The addition of these two salaries to the list boosted the average salary level by more than $7,000. At the other end of the scale was Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez who was paid $5,645.

If the annual salaries of all 78 union officials listed in the Business Week survey were added together, the compensation would have totaled only one-third of the pay package provided to Pickens.

Still 7.3 percent

Sag in manufacturing keeps jobless rate up

The unemployment rate remained at a recession-level 7.3 percent in April, reflecting the slowdown in economic growth since last fall and the continuing influx of goods from abroad.

Workers in the manufacturing sector were hurt most by the weakening jobs situation. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported the number of factory jobs fell by 45,000 in April while the service sector picked up 90,000 over the month.

Construction employment advanced by 70,000 over the month after seasonal adjustment and, at 4.7 million, was up by 410,000 over the year, reflecting strength in homebuilding and highway construction.

While the jobless rate stayed stuck at 7.3 percent over the past three months, there has been a cumulative loss of 130,000 jobs in manufacturing industries, BLS reported.

Since July 1981, 665,000 jobs have been wiped out in manufacturing and 165,000 in mining. Over the same period, there have been net gains of 2,944,000 jobs in services, 1,963,000 in trade, and 547,000 in finance.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told reporters that Executive Council members expressed their concerns about the persistent high jobless rate to Labor Sec. William E. Brock.

In previous years, Kirkland said, the current measures of unemployment would be described as recession levels.

"Yet there seems to be no deep sense of concern about that in the Reagan Administration," which tends to regard "a continually increasing level of unemployment as normal."

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that "we have some serious problems, clearly." She said the manufacturing sector was "extremely weak."

Nondurable manufacturing industries have recovered only about two-thirds of the jobs lost during the Reagan Recession of 1981-82, and makers of durable products—those that generally last three years or more—have recovered slightly more, Norwood told the panel.

The largest job loss in manufacturing last month was in the high-technology sector, particularly in electrical and electronic equipment production. Employment in those industries fell to the level of last summer, about 2.3 million, BLS said.

Little change

Since last May, the unemployment rate, while bouncing up and down for several months, has declined only slightly. A year ago, it stood at 7.5 percent. Economists, including Vice Chairman Preston Martin of the Federal Reserve Board, talk openly of a possible "growth recession," when too few jobs are created to prevent the rate from rising.

The BLS report showed a drop of 174,000 jobs in April to 106,945,000. At the same time, the labor force declined by 143,000 after a gain of 428,000 in March.

The number of unemployed workers increased by 31,000 from the previous month to 8.4 million, about the same as February and March.

The true extent of unemployment was actually much wider, the Full Employment Action Council pointed out. FEAC, a coalition of labor, religious, civil rights and youth groups, estimated the nation's "real" unemployment rate in April was 13.2 percent.

The council said that BLS understates the country's real jobless rate by failing to include persons discouraged from looking for work and those forced to work part-time because they cannot find full-time work. There were 5.7 million persons working at those part-time jobs in April and about 1.3 million "discouraged" workers at the end of the first quarter, the council said.

While there was little overall change in April, the rates for both adult men and women rose by one-tenth of 1 percent to 6.3 and 6.8 percent, respectively.

For teenagers, the rate dropped five-tenths of 1 percent to 17.7 percent. The jobless rate for black adults increased one-tenth of 1 percent to 15.3 percent. For black teenagers, the rate was 39 percent, despite a 1.9-percent decline.

Severe impact seen in cutoff of Amtrak funds

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to continue federal subsidies for Amtrak, the passenger railroad system that "can carry more people, more efficiently, in all kinds of weather than any other mode of travel."

A House subcommittee is considering President Reagan's budget proposal to cut off funds for Amtrak, a step that AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said would make the United States less energy sufficient and end up costing the government billions of dollars in extra costs.

Denison wrote Rep. James J. Florio, who heads a House subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation & Tourism, that elimination of federal subsidies would kill off a system that carries 20 million passengers a year and serves 44 states.

More than 25,000 Amtrak employees would be thrown out of work and the federal government would be obligated for up to $2.1 billion in severance pay, Denison noted. The ripple effect would jeopardize a pension system that has only recently been restored to solvency.

Establishment of Amtrak in 1970 represented a recognition by Congress that rail passenger service fills "a critical national need," Denison stressed.

New York union members rally to "clean up" Phelps Dodge, as Steelworkers Sec. Edgar Ball vows the union will keep up the fight.

Steelworkers to continue fight against Phelps Dodge

New York — The Steelworkers will launch a reorganizing drive at Phelps Dodge Corp. if the National Labor Relations Board scraps the union's challenge to a decertification election.

USWA Sec. Edgar Ball made the pledge at a sidewalk rally prior to the opening of the giant copper company's annual meeting of stockholders.

Decertification will signal the end of the strike—"but not the end of the fight," Ball stressed. Ball thought the reorganization drive could be very successful, because "the companies do us a big favor here, they don't treat their employees well. We have reorganized many, many times."

The USWA represents the largest number of some 1,400 members of 13 unions that struck five Phelps Dodge facilities in June 1983. The company tried to keep the Arizona copper plants operating with strikebreakers, but was forced to close its two largest plants in December 1984.

All 13 unions participate in the Phelps Dodge Corporate Campaign Task Force, which got underway last August. Ball said the campaign's two objectives are to pressure Phelps Dodge's major creditors into ending credit for the company and to bring alleged environmental violations at the four Arizona operations to the attention of state and local government. "Our purpose is to cost them as much money as we can, and to make it as hard as we can for them to make money," Ball said.

Phelps Dodge has lost more than $400 million over the past three years.

Last September two insurance companies announced they would no longer extend credit to Phelps Dodge, and the task force stepped up pressure on the company's major bank creditors, particularly Manufacturers Hanover, to cut Phelps Dodge's credit lines.

At the annual meeting, angry union stockholders accused Phelps Dodge of "financial mismanagement and irresponsible environmental practices." Phelps Dodge has shed at least $320 million in assets this year in response to company losses. Scurrying for cash by quick sales of stock will not begin to solve the serious problems of this company," Ball said.

Task force members also pushed to require Phelps Dodge to reduce pollution at the Douglas, Ariz., smelter, although that resolution failed. "Phelps Dodge is the only company in Arizona which refuses to take any steps to stop poisoning Arizona residents," charged Ball.

Brock petitioned to reverse Rowland on field sanitation

A coalition of more than 30 labor, church and civil rights groups petitioned Labor Sec. William E. Brock to override his OSHA chief and issue a field sanitation standard to require that farm employers provide toilets and clean water for their workers.

The petitioners questioned the refusal of Occupational Safety & Health Administration Director Robert A. Rowland to come up with a standard. It said Rowland's determination is "not only contrary to the record developed . . . during the last 13 years, but also casts serious doubts about the department's good faith."

The petition was endorsed by the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. and state central bodies in North Carolina, Texas, Ohio, Oregon and Pennsylvania, as well as by the Farm Workers. Also urging the Labor Secretary to reverse Rowland's action were the U.S. Catholic Conference, United Methodist Church, Episcopal Diocese of New York, OSHA Environmental Network and the Farm Worker Justice Fund.

The petitioners also stressed that Rowland ignored the advice of his professional staff, OSHA medical consultants and the recommendations of medical societies that testified in favor of a federal standard.

They noted also the "appearance of conflict of interest on the part of the current director." Rowland owns stock in Tennaco, Inc., whose agribusiness division could be affected by the decision.

The petition noted that OSHA's own consultants found that only one in four of the nation's agricultural employers provides toilets, drinking water and hand washing facilities for its workers.

Farm workers are 26 times more likely to have parasitic diseases than the general public, 85 times more likely to suffer diarrhea, three times more likely to suffer from chemical exposures and twice as likely to suffer from heat stress. In 1984, there were two instances of farm workers who died of heat stress for lack of water, the petition pointed out.

OSHA has estimated that it would cost the farmers less than $1 per day per worker to provide the sanitation facilities.

Broad NLRB order hits Nebraska packer

Grand Island, Neb.— An administrative law judge of the National Labor Relations Board laid down a sweeping set of remedies for labor law violations committed by a beef packing company here in its attempt to break up a Food & Commercial Workers organizing drive.

Because of the "degree and pervasiveness" of the violations against two UFCW supporters—Patrice Blue and Dennis Nelson—the judge's remedy went far beyond restoring their jobs at Monfort of Colorado, Inc.

Under the judge's order, which still may be appealed by the firm, Monfort must mail copies of a notice to all employees pledging that it will not engage in the illegal activities it resorted to in UFCW Local 22's organizing campaign.

Monfort also must grant UFCW "reasonable access" to bulletin boards, rest areas and other locations for two years to communicate with employees about the union during nonwork hours, permit UFCW representatives to attend any meeting called by the company to discuss union representation with employees, and give the union equal time to address the workers. Monfort's president and owner, Kenneth Monfort, is required to personally read the notice of company violations at meetings of all employees.

These remedies are rarely used by the NLRB and only in cases of severe, repeated violations by a company.

Four-year campaign

The case grew out of charges by the UFCW following its 1981 organizing drive at the Monfort plant. The union lost a representation election that year.

A second election in May 1984 was set aside by an NLRB regional director because of Monfort's labor law violations. A new election has been ordered but no date has yet been set.

The Monfort violations cited by Administrative Law Judge John H. West included illegal threats of plant closings, discipline of UFCW supporters and promising employees a bonus for voting "no union."

UFCW President William H. Wynn hailed the ruling, but warned "despite the preponderance of evidence, Monfort can still delay justice for these workers through repeated appeals of the administrative law judge's ruling."

Nelson, one of the workers whom the company was ordered to rehire, appeared last June before a joint hearing of two House Education & Labor subcommittees investigating delays by the NLRB in handling cases. At the time he testified, Nelson said he was in danger of losing his home through foreclosure because of the delay in his reinstatement.

AFL-CIO honors students for essays on handicapped

The labor movement is proud of its role in helping handicapped and disabled people participate fully in the workforce, but the battle to protect the rights of the handicapped cannot be won alone, AFL-CIO Vice President Alvin Heaps told the winners of the national "Ability Counts" essay contest for high school students.

The essay contest winners and their families were guests of the AFL-CIO at a luncheon held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Heaps, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, pointed out that high unemployment and cuts in government social programs increase the difficulties of handicapped persons trying to compete in the job market.

Employment for the handicapped is "not a dream, but a God-given right," said Heaps, who is president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. He urged the students to remember "the sights and sounds of this important meeting, and the dreams of those who seek opportunity."

Harold Russell, chairman of the President's committee also addressed the luncheon and urged the contest winners to carry forward their concern for handicapped persons. "If our country invests its dollars, talents and resources in its people, we can be the strongest force for good in all the world," Russell promised. Russell, a member of the Meat Cutters and Screen Actors, has appeared in movies and television programs dramatizing the concerns of disabled persons.

Elizabeth Tunney, vice chair of the President's Committee, and Joslyn N. Williams, president of the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO, also attended the awards luncheon.

The five national winners, along with 30 other state winners wrote on the theme "Work Independence for Disabled People."

First place and a $3,000 scholarship went to Emily Goldman of Texas; second place and a $2,500 scholarship to Elizabeth Gaston of West Virginia; third place and a $2,000 scholarship to Kerrin Mohr of Maryland; fourth place and a $1,500 scholarship to Melissa Mayo of Mississippi and fifth place and a $1,000 scholarship to Tammy Rigby of Idaho.

The students' trips to Washington were paid for by the AFL-CIO and its state federations.

Independent role for social security agency endorsed

The Social Security Administration would function most efficiently as an independent, nonpolitical agency, the AFL-CIO said in a statement endorsing legislation being considered by a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

As an independent agency, the statement suggested, the Social Security Administration would not be subject to the frequent administrative and policy shifts it has experienced as a part of the Dept. of Health & Human Services. The AFL-CIO cited "as a painful recent example" the harsh policies adopted to disqualify persons receiving disability benefits.

In a related area, the AFL-CIO statement also urged that the social security trust funds be removed from the unified budget.

Under existing law, the separation is scheduled to take place in the 1992 fiscal year. There is no reason to wait that long, the AFL-CIO stressed in urging that the date of the budget changeover be advanced to fiscal 1987.

Even though social security taxes can only be used for payment of benefits, inclusion of social security payments and revenues in the budget calculations has been used to make the budget deficit appear smaller. Still worse, the statement noted, is the fact that "changes in social security benefits are considered not on their merits but on the basis of their impact on the overall budget deficit."

As for the current pressure to reduce the budget deficit by not paying the full cost-of-living adjustment on social security benefits, the AFL-CIO said, the nation's elderly should not be made the victims of "clever bookkeeping" designed to make the budget look better.

Bipartisan coalition

N.H. Senate defeats 'work' law proposal

history. Unions are part of New Hampshire.

All of these groups, other affiliates, and unions outside the federation took part in a grass-roots lobbying effort that stressed the pattern of generally good labor-management relations and questioned why the "live free" state should bow to outside pressures.

As it had on several previous occasions, the House voted for "right-to-work" despite a bloc of GOP defections and the focus was on the Senate. If the vote had been taken immediately, the anti-union bill might have carried. But in the month between House and Senate actions, the tide clearly shifted.

The Republican majority leader in the Senate, Vesta Roy, announced her opposition to the bill. Republican Gov. John Sununu took no public position on the bill.

The state's biggest circulation and most conservative newspaper, the Manchester Union Leader, termed the measure "union-busting legislation" that would "do nothing to help the working man and woman." Its enactment would make New Hampshire a "laughing stock."

In the state capital, the Concord Monitor said the legislation would weaken unions "for no compelling reason" and would tip the scale of labor-management relations in New Hampshire "back toward the 19th Century."

A Senate committee hearing attracted such a big crowd that it had to be moved from the legislative office building to the hall of the House of Representatives. A 3-2 committee vote sent the bill to the Senate floor.

Bipartisan opposition

During the 40 minutes before the vote, Democrats and Republicans alike spoke up against the anti-union bill.

Sen. James St. Jean, a Manchester Democrat, suggested that the "right-wing ideologues" who drummed up the campaign for a bill that isn't needed and that no one wants should "pack up their carpetbags and move on to somewhere else."

Another Democrat, Sen. Richard Boyer of Nashua, questioned the sincerity of employers who wanted a "right-to-work" law in order to protect workers. He remembers labor, but not any employers, lobbying for a minimum wage and safety in the workplace, Boyer told his colleagues.

Republican Charles Bond of Jefferson said he didn't like to go against his party's national platform which supports right-to-work, but stressed "the collective bargaining process has worked well" to everyone's benefit.

The rejection of the measure was hammered in by voice vote approval of a motion to postpone the House-passed bill indefinitely, a parliamentary device that virtually assures that the issue can't come before the legislature again until the 1987 session.

The state lobbyist for the "right-to-work" organization complained after the vote that senators were "intimidated" into opposing the bill by "labor lobbyists who roamed the halls all session and by the media."

From its Virginia headquarters, the National Right to Work Committee voiced regret at the outcome but said the effort will continue. One of its staff members was quoted as explaining that the "right-to-work" campaign was up against "the extraordinary political machine of the AFL-CIO."

Back in New Hampshire, State AFL-CIO President Eaton chuckled when the comment was relayed to him:

"Political machine? Is that what he said? Well, well."

Tax law changes sought to subdue corporate raiders

the expense of capital investment, research and development. In the long run, this way of doing business is the certain prescription for economic ruin," the AFL-CIO warned.

Whatever the outcome, the targeted company usually winds up burdened with extra debt. "Workers too often finance the costs of the raid by job losses or pay cuts. And consumers end up paying higher prices."

The council acknowledged that there is little chance that this Administration, with its "blind faith" in so-called "free markets," will support the broad array of government actions that should be employed to direct credit to productive uses and to protect workers and consumers.

But there should be "immediate action," the federation urged, to change the laws that encourage "the dangerous speculative excesses that feed the takeover epidemic."

New cutbacks in federal data opposed

Restricting the flow of information from the federal government, as the Administration is proposing to do, would have a serious, destructive impact not only on organizations such as unions that rely on the data to help their members, but on the right of every citizen to be informed, the AFL-CIO warned.

To give the Office of Management & Budget control over what statistics are collected and disseminated would be to close off much needed information about the various facets of American life, Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald observed in his comments on a directive drafted by OMB and published in the Federal Register.

The proposal, which would give the budget office authority over all information-gathering activities by federal agencies, combines with previous actions of the Administration in cutting back federal statistics collection and distribution.

"We believe that many users will be priced out of the market or otherwise shut out of public policy debate by the procedures proposed," Oswald said.

In addition, efforts to turn over federal statistical programs to private industry and to impose full-cost user charges "further endanger the confidence of statistics users that the data they get will be reliable, unbiased, nonpartisan, objective, and easily available at little cost."

"Workers and the labor unions that represent them cannot compete in a market for information available only to those who can afford to pay a price set by profit-seeking organizations," he said.

Under the OMB proposal, federal agencies would have to show that the data they collect are essential to their mission and not likely to be gathered by the private sector, and that their benefits outweigh the collection costs.

Other values

It's not that simple, Oswald suggested.

"No one could object to a rational plan to reduce costs and eliminate duplication in federal statistics programs," he said.

"However, your Mar. 15 draft circular states that 'the value of government information to the government is solely a function of the degree to which the information contributes to achieving agencies' missions.' This is a shortsighted view of the value of information to a broader range of statistics users.

"We need mission-related statistics but we also need statistics which do not necessarily meet a strict definition of mission-related."

In a speech to the Industrial Relations Research Association last December, Oswald cited three basic reasons why wage and industrial statistics are compiled:

- As an aid to facilitate collective bargaining or corporate wage setting,
- As background for public policy decisions involving minimum wages and maximum hours legislation to prevent worker exploitation, guideline mechanisms to deal with inflation, and wage setting for government employees.
- As data for economic research and analysis.

"These data must be collected by government because only government provides the objectivity necessary for the parties' acceptance in collective bargaining and because only government has sufficient influence to secure the cooperation of the various firms and unions in gathering the background information for both public and private decision making," he said.

Of OMB's proposal for more user charges, Oswald warned that public interest in availability of free or low-cost information "would be undermined by reliance on user charges."

A Common Concern

AMERICA'S FAMILY FARMERS are struggling to survive a crisis they did not cause. Thousands are being driven off their land as banks foreclose on overdue loans. High interest rates and tight credit are hitting farm families with tragic results.

Farmers and workers have a common concern, a strong mutual interest in an America where economic growth and social justice have higher priority than more tax loopholes and more benefits for the wealthy and for the big corporations.

We are convinced that a healthy agricultural system based on strong, prosperous family farms is essential to America's economic and social well-being.

One-third of the nation's 680,000 family-sized farms are in serious trouble with financial problems ranging from keeping up interest payments on outstanding loans to insolvency and bankruptcy. Nearly 300,000 have already been forced out of business in the last four years.

Falling farm prices have contributed to the decline in farm income and the drop in the value of landholdings. The overvalued dollar has seriously weakened traditional export markets for America's farm commodities.

AGAINST THAT background, the help-the-rich, pro-business Reagan Administration is calling for an end to basic farm programs without offering any realistic or permanent solutions to the problems of America's farm families. In fact, huge Reagan Administration budget deficits are the biggest factor in producing the high interest rates which so painfully afflict America's farm communities.

U.S. agricultural policy should be based on the principal of a fair return to family farmers for their labor. This means fair price, production, and income policies that enable family farmers to earn a decent living without loading benefits on giant agri-business or tax-shelter operations. The benefits of farm income-support programs should be limited to family farmers.

There must be a moratorium on farm foreclosures until realistic debt restructuring can take place. The Federal Reserve Board should allocate credit to family farmers, and interest rates should be reduced.

America's food abundance must be used wisely and compassionately. Better distribution of the nation's food abundance to needy people at home and abroad is essential. Hunger in America is a problem which the Reagan Administration is trying to minimize or ignore. In spite of the amazing productivity of America's farm families, the fight against hunger and malnutrition in America has suffered severe setbacks under the Reagan Administration.

To the Trenches

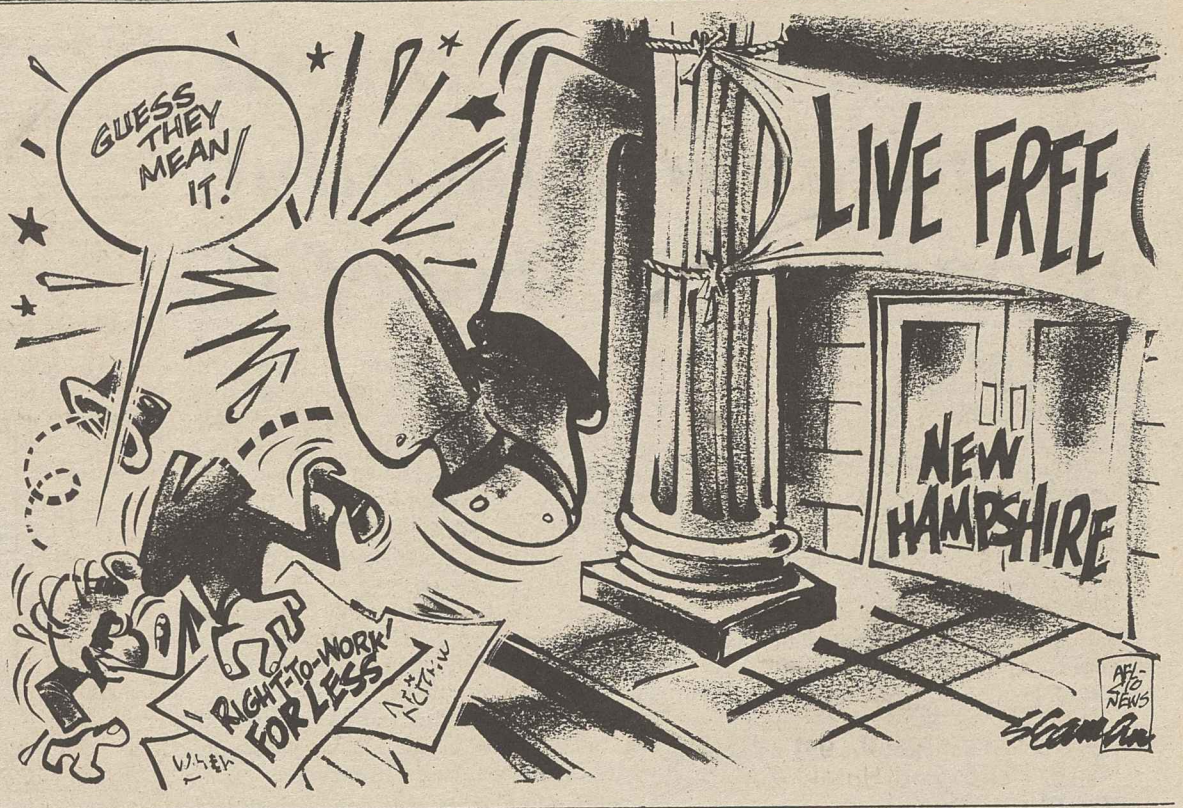
THE COPIER was still reproducing the AFL-CIO Executive Council's statement on corporate takeovers when a news item came in on the wire that couldn't have been more pertinent.



The council statement expressed concern at the impact on the economy of taking billions of dollars out of productive use to pursue or resist corporate raids.

It noted that plant shutdowns and layoffs are frequent by-products. And it warned that companies seeking to avoid takeover are impelled to "maximize short-term profits at the expense of capital investment, research and development."

The news clip dealt with actions taken by the Atlantic Richfield Co., better known as Arco, to fend off corporate raiders.

The company president announced a "financial restructuring" that will involve the layoff of from 4,000 to 5,000 workers. Arco will abandon copper mining, sell off refinery operations, and reduce capital outlays by $800 million. Then it will spend $4 billion to buy back up to 60 million shares of its own stock.

Point made.

Reagan ignores hazards of festering toxic dumps

By Press Associates, Inc.

The 1,200 citizens gathered at Lincoln Park in Jersey City, N.J., recently might have been taken for any typical community rally but for the gas masks, respirators and kerchiefs covering their faces.

The paraphernalia were symbolic of the citizens protest of a nearby landfill, where chemical fires burning for 30 years have drenched the area with toxic fumes.

The residents and workers at a plant adjacent to the toxic dump said the fumes cause nausea, headaches and respiratory problems. One woman, a non-smoker, said her doctor was baffled by her recently diagnosed lung damage.

The Jersey City residents have every right to be angry. Four years ago, the 77-acre landfill was put on the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's national priority list of hazardous waste sites that pose the greatest threat to human health and the environment. The listing made it eligible for cleanup under the federal Superfund program.

Unfortunately, Jersey City is not unique in its long wait for EPA action. The National Campaign Against Toxic Hazards recently reported that 90 percent of the 812 sites now on EPA's priority list will not receive even initial cleanup money from the five-year-old Superfund before it expires in October. The EPA has completed cleanup at only six sites over the period.

Estimating the problem

The EPA estimated that 2,000 out of 22,000 hazardous waste sites to be evaluated for Superfund cleanup money eventually will make the priority list. However, the General Accounting Office estimated that 4,000 out of a total universe of 37,800 sites will make the priority list, and the congressional Office of Technology Assessment estimated that 10,000 toxic waste sites will require cleanup.

Specific studies linking health problems with toxic dumps are few, primarily because the White House Office of Management & Budget consistently vetoed the health assessment program mandated by Congress in the Superfund law until the Environmental Defense Fund began a lawsuit on the issue.

But Dr. Ellen Silbergeld, director of the ecology group's toxic chemical program, said the studies which have been completed found the "health of Americans has been significantly and materially damaged by exposure to hazardous waste."

Health effects

Silbergeld said studies conducted on populations near toxic waste sites in Love Canal, N.Y., San Jose, Calif., and Woburn and Lowell, Mass., have found significant associations between hazardous waste exposure and childhood leukemia, severe birth defects and low birthweight. Other studies suggest abnormally high rates of other cancers, still births and miscarriages, sterility and kidney, liver and central nervous system damage.

The Reagan Administration apparently is unconcerned about the threat to health and the environment from toxic waste dumps. It has proposed a limited reauthorization of about $5 billion for Superfund.

This is despite EPA estimates of an eventual cost of $23 billion for 2,000 sites, GAO estimates of $39 billion for 4,000 sites and OTA estimates of $100 billion for 10,000 sites.

Labor, environmentalists and some members of Congress are pushing for a much stronger Superfund reauthorization. They have urged at least $10 billion to $14 billion in Superfund revenues, raised mostly through some combination of taxes on feedstock, chemical, petroleum and hazardous waste producers, with some additional money from general revenues. Labor also has urged a tax on imported chemicals.

In addition, they have called for the program to be amended to include mandatory cleanup schedules from EPA, effective cleanup standards, public participation and citizen suits, coverage of federal properties, victims' compensation, expanded health studies and effective protections for workers cleaning up toxic waste sites.

Union members retain big advantage in value of pay, fringe benefits

An AFL-CIO analysis of government data on union contract settlements in the first quarter of the year and over the past 12 months concludes that union-represented workers still do much better than non-union workers.

As of the end of March, union members averaged $11.64 an hour compared to $9 for non-union employees, a difference of $2.64 in wages alone.

The spread in total compensation costs —wages and fringe benefits combined— was even greater, $17.64 for union workers compared to $12.11 for non-union workers, or a difference of $5.53 an hour.

Non-union 'dues'

The smaller paycheck is the "dues" the non-union worker must pay, Federation Economist John Zalusky said.

Zalusky's analysis is based on the value of paid leave, retirement plans, insurance, merchandise discounts as well as wages.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that negotiated pay increases under major agreements—those covering 1,000 or more workers—in the first three months of 1985 turned upward, yielding an average first-year wage increase of 2.8 percent compared with 2.3 percent in the previous quarter and an average of 2.4 percent for all 1984 settlements.

Over their full term, the first-quarter contracts provide annual increases of 3 percent, compared with an annual average yield of 1.5 percent for agreements reached in the final quarter of 1984 and 2.4 percent for all major settlements last year.

The BLS report is based on 47 major contracts covering 173,000 workers.

For the 12 months ended in March, BLS found that employer cost for total compensation increased 4.8 percent for all civilian workers. Private sector compensation costs rose 4.4 percent over the period and local government compensation costs increased 6.3 percent.

Breaking out the data to show the union/non-union differential, Zalusky noted that while the rate of increase in total compensation costs for union members—3.5 percent—was less than that for non-represented workers, 4.9 percent, the figures do not tell the whole story.

"Much of what is being negotiated today is not wages," he observed. "Lump-sum payments, employee stock ownership plans, profit-sharing plans, employee job security plans, and other benefits that do not have an easily determined value were negotiated during this period but would not be included in the above values as wages or in some cases, as benefits.

"Direct lump-sum payments were a part of a number of settlements that followed the auto and aerospace patterns. These are not treated as wages in these reports as they do not affect benefits such as paid vacations, pensions and overtime as wages do.

"Yet they are a cash payment that is used as a wage."

Zalusky said the BLS series on settlements "needs to be rethought because it doesn't reflect current bargaining." For this reason, he said, union members are getting more than what the BLS data reflect.

Time factor

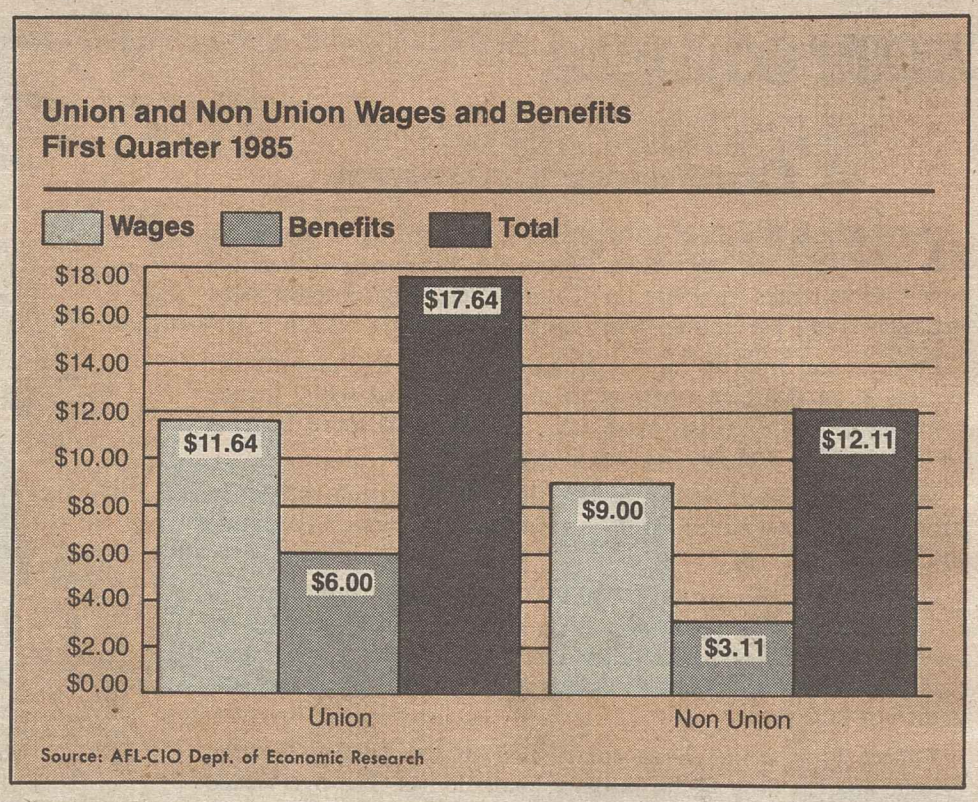
Other factors also account for differing increases in wages and benefit costs between union and non-union workers, he noted.



The average length of union contracts is 30 months, "and that creates a time lag in the ability of unions to renegotiate and react to changes in this economy."

Zalusky noted that settlements seem to have plateaued with fewer contracts resulting in compensation cuts or freezes. Manufacturing settlements seem to be low but stable, while construction and transportation are still troubled areas, he said.

A major problem for both union and non-union workers is that they are not getting their fair share in productivity improvements, Zalusky noted.

"Union workers have been doing better than non-union workers, and are staying ahead of changes in the cost of living. However, non-union workers have not been keeping up even with changes in prices," he said.

While the number of contracts settled in the first quarter of this year was small and covered only 173,000 workers, BLS said that about one million other workers were under major contracts that had expired during the quarter. Either their contracts had not yet been renegotiated or new agreements had not been ratified.

Government pressed to take leading role on pay equity

AFL-CIO unions told a House Post Office & Civil Service subcommittee that the federal government has the responsibility to set the pace in achieving pay equity, and urged Congress to prod the Executive Branch to do so.

Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), who heads the subcommittee, made clear her agreement. Oakar sharply criticized the U.S. Civil Rights Commission's rejection of the concept of pay equity and charged it with urging federal agencies to resist the comparable worth doctrine. She condemned Reagan Administration efforts to undermine "civil rights policies that have been a cornerstone of our nation's commitment to equal rights and opportunity."

AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson said the federal government, in dealing with its own sex-based discrimination, must now "demonstrate the political will to do what is right and eliminate past wrongs."

Key element

Hutchinson, who heads the Women's Dept. of the Government Employees, called the determination of job content "the heart of pay equity."

The relative value of jobs, not the individuals performing them, should be the focus of any pay equity study, she stressed. Hutchinson said the Office of Personnel Management should be represented in any pay study. But "we would strongly protest using OPM to actually conduct the study," she said. Hutchinson recalled OPM's dirty-tricks memo proposing to manipulate a study of pay equity in the federal service in such a way that it "would immediately divide white-collar and blue-collar unions, pitting union against union," and both against what the memo termed "radical feminist groups." Hutchinson urged that federal workers' union representatives be included on the policy committee.

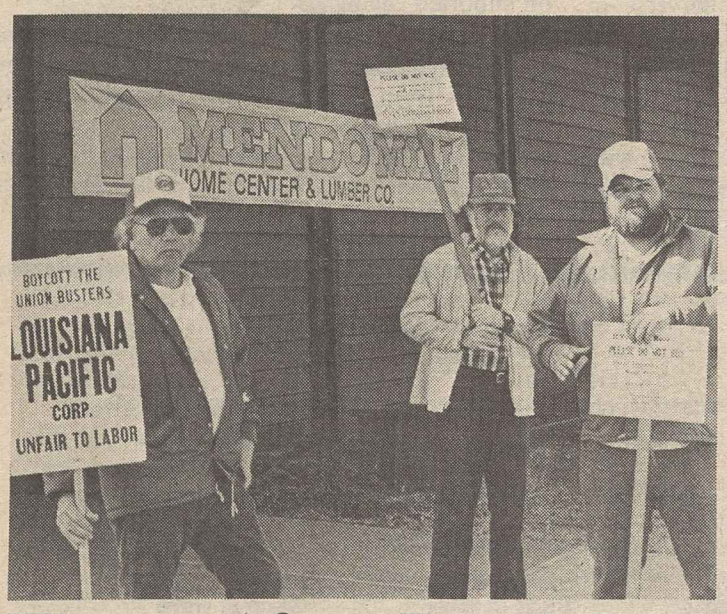
Connie Bryant and Florin Koole, testifying for the Communications Workers, told the subcommittee of CWA's efforts to eliminate sex discrimination at the bargaining table and progress in closing the wage gap. The union's Pay Equity Task Force develops and disseminates information on comparable worth.

Jobs women hold generally pay less than the jobs held by men, Bryant said.

"In some cases, CWA has found that women's jobs are paid less precisely because they are held by women and not because the skills, education or working conditions are any less strenuous, demanding or valuable," she testified.

"Our call for pay equity is no more and no less than our call for a minimum wage, child labor laws, or occupational safety and health provisions. It is, in fact, a call for the end to work place discrimination," she added.

The Service Employees submitted a study of pay differentials in Los Angeles County. It charged the county government with deliberately "maintaining sex and race segregated job classifications" and "discriminating in compensation paid to its female and minority employees." The union has filed a pay equity complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.



Eileen Stein, chair of the National Committee on Pay Equity, called the U.S. Civil Rights Commission "out of step with the rest of the country" on pay equity.

Joe Crosswhite dies, headed Montana Fed

Columbia Falls, Mont.—Joe Crosswhite, a former president of the Montana AFL-CIO, died here on Apr. 27 after a long illness. He was 69.

Crosswhite had been a member of the Operating Engineers since 1940. During the 1960s, he was president of Flathead County AFL-CIO and the Kalispell Building & Construction Trades Council. He served as president of the state federation from 1963 to 1969.

Survivors include his wife Veronica, two sons and five grandchildren.

Boycotting Louisiana-Pacific

Carpenters in Willits, Calif., Portland and Dallas were among thousands of UBC members and supporters who handbilled more than 600 stores nationwide, advising the public not to buy wood products made by Louisiana-Pacific. Some 250,000 leaflets were handed out as the union moved to broaden the boycott and raise the awareness of its nearly two-year-old strike effort. The May 4 handbilling was followed the next day by more than 100 L-P strikers from four Northwestern states attending the annual L-P shareholders' meeting in Grand Junction, Colo., where they introduced resolutions focusing on how the strike is affecting the company.

Shipyard finds friendly crew at OSHA

Safety rules targeted by secret panel

By Arlee C. Green

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration collaborated with representatives of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. in a private task force aimed at scuttling up to 70 percent of the agency's general industry rules covering shipyards, the Steelworkers charged.

The task force was set up after the Virginia-based firm had been cited for 617 violations of existing regulations. Its existence was revealed at a House subcommittee hearing, at which OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland came under fire for his management of the agency. Rowland owns between $15,000 and $50,000 worth of stock in Tenneco, Inc., the parent company of Newport News.

At that hearing, Michael Urquhart, president of the Government Employees Local 12 which represents 4,500 employees at the Labor Dept. including 300 at OSHA, testified that the safety agency's "experts close to the work believe that 60 to 70 percent of the present safety standards covering shipyard workers will be deleted or watered down."

Agency position

Barry White, director of OSHA safety standards, responded to press inquiries the day after the hearing that the agency revision of the shipyard regulations would not cut back any standards.

USWA Safety Director Michael Wright said he suspected that the position announced by White was adopted "in the last couple of days when OSHA discovered that its dealings with the industry were going to become public."

Wright blasted the agency for setting up a secret task force and for denying workers representation on it. He said that although the task force had been in existence for four years, the USWA only learned of its existence in September 1984.

It immediately filed under the Freedom of Information Act for all the OSHA documents relating to the task force. The agency over a period of six months provided documents to the Steelworkers, but declined to give the union any internal memoranda on the subject of the shipyard safety code revisions.

The USWA represents 18,000 workers at Newport News. It was the union's pressure that prompted OSHA to inspect the giant shipyard in 1980. OSHA cited Newport News for 617 safety violations and assessed a record fine of $786,000. Most of the violations were cited under the general industry regulations.

The documents obtained by the Steelworkers under the FOI show that six months after President Reagan took office and three months after he appointed Thorne Auchter to head the safety and health agency, OSHA set up the eight-member shipyard task force made up equally of agency staffers and management personnel from Newport News.

The task force met for the first time in

Democrats' budget draft bars social security cuts

Roll the Union On

Impromptu session is strummed up during the seventh annual Great Labor Song Exchange at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. The three-day program of workshops and song-swapping concluded with a concert featuring union favorites and new songs for working people. Headliners included 81-year-old John Handcox, second from left—who is now credited with writing Roll the Union On—Joe Glazer and others who joined in the pageant of music with a union label. ## Kirkland hails 'fair balance' of House plan

By David L. Perlman

House Democrats have shaped a budget alternative that will preserve full social security benefits, restore many of the program cuts voted by Senate Republicans, and match the dollar amount of "savings" projected by the latest version of the Reagan budget.

It will have labor's support when it comes to the House floor, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a letter to Budget Committee Chairman William H. Gray III (D-Pa.).

Kirkland said the committee acted responsibly in rejecting a Senate-passed budget that would have pushed an estimated 600,000 persons dependent on social security checks over the poverty brink and wiped out "programs that aid and protect middle- and low-income Americans."

Some shortcomings

The House Budget Committee version falls short of desired goals on a number of labor-supported programs. Kirkland expressed the AFL-CIO's dissent from the panel's cutbacks in revenue-sharing and a denial of a "much-deserved" pay raise for federal employees next year.

But he praised the committee's success in achieving "a fair balance in defense and domestic spending reductions." By contrast, the Senate version puts the brunt of deficit reduction on social security and other non-military programs.

The Budget Committee did not propose any revenue increases as part of its resolution. Kirkland strongly urged that House members be given "the opportunity to vote for a minimum tax on those profitable corporations and wealthy individuals whose tax-sheltered income has escaped effective taxation."

He wrote Gray that "such action would send a welcome signal to the American people that Congress is not only attempting

Idaho court suspends state open shop law

Boise—Idaho workers aren't bound by the anti-union "right-to-work" law the legislature enacted earlier this year, a state judge ruled.

The legislation has been petitioned to referendum through signatures collected by union volunteers. It will be on the ballot in next November's elections. The issue that has been before the courts is whether the ban on union shop agreements should take effect before the referendum.

The heavily Republican legislature, which passed the compulsory open shop law in late January over the veto of Democratic Gov. John Evans, had sought to assure this by adding an "emergency" clause to the legislation.

If the clause were valid, the measure would take effect at once.

Without such a clause, a law takes effect after 60 days unless, within that time, it has been petitioned to referendum. In that case, it is stayed until the voters have passed on its merits at the next election.

The Idaho AFL-CIO pointed out that there was no conceivable "emergency" that could justify the legislature's attempt to thwart the referendum process, and

Labor opposes Babson for NLRB seat

The AFL-CIO "cannot support" Marshall Babson or any other management advocate for appointment to the National Labor Relations Board, Federation President Lane Kirkland informed the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

Kirkland's letter to Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) dealt with President Reagan's nominees to fill two long-standing vacancies on the NLRB. The committee is considering—and is expected to routinely approve—the nominations of Babson and Wilford Johansen, who has headed the NLRB's Los Angeles region since 1971.

Babson's nine years of legal practice have been devoted to representing employers in labor relations matters, Kirkland noted.

Labor has no reason to think that Babson is "any better or any worse than the general run of lawyers who seek single-mindedly to advance management interests," Kirkland said. But, he stressed, members of the NLRB "should be distinguished neutrals who enjoy the trust and admiration of employers and employees."

Neutral stance

The quasi-judicial agency was established to adjudicate disputes between management and labor, and its members should not be confirmed "advocates for one side or the other," he said.

Kirkland acknowledged that the Senate as a whole has confirmed other Reagan appointees to the NLRB who also had been management lawyers. But that does not detract from the AFL-CIO's opposition to such appointments, he stressed.

As for Johansen, he has been "a competent and conscientious civil servant" during his 27 years with the agency, Kirkland noted. The AFL-CIO takes serious exception to his handling of a case against the Louisiana-Pacific Corp. during a temporary assignment last year as acting NLRB general counsel.

But "taking his full record into account,

House budget bars slash in social security COLA

to deal with the budget deficit through sacrifice by all Americans but is also serious about fairness in taxes and is willing to make a substantial down payment toward both goals."

Kirkland termed the Republican budget adopted by the Senate "a catalog of broken campaign promises" and noted that the deficit cited as justification for cuts in needed programs more than doubled under President Reagan's Administration.

The alternative approved by the House Budget Committee includes:

- Restoration of cost-of-living protection that the Senate would cut from civil service as well as social security payments.
- Full funding for the Job Corps, which Reagan wanted to eliminate and the Senate would cut 30 percent.
- Continuation of mass transit subsidies the Senate would cut 20 percent.
- Full funding plus an inflation adjustment for Medicaid and no increases in out-of-pocket costs of Medicare—both programs that would be reduced under the Senate Republican version.
- Continuation of postal subsidies for non-profit organizations, to avert the big jump in mailing costs that the Senate resolution would require.
- A smaller cut in Amtrak passenger train subsidies than the Senate proposed.
- A 10 percent cut instead of total elimination of various programs, including the Economic Development Administration.

In only one major labor-supported program, revenue-sharing, was the House cut more severe than the Senate version.

The enormity and the complexity of the defense segment of the budget made exact comparisons difficult. And so did the impact of the Pentagon's announcement that it had "found" some $4 billion dollars in previously appropriated money that it could spend in addition to whatever new money Congress appropriated.

Military spending

As generally described in news accounts, the Senate budget would let new military spending authority rise at the anticipated inflation level, while the House version would hold new spending authority to this year's dollar levels. But even under the House version, the actual dollar amount of defense outlays would continue to rise in response to spending decisions previously made.

Both budgets are commonly described as reducing the deficit by approximately $56 billion in the fiscal year that starts next Oct. 1. In fact, the total deficit would rise by an estimated $174 billion. But if existing programs were all continued at present projections, the estimated deficit would come to about $230 billion.

A corporate minimum tax, strongly backed by labor as a step toward fairness and toward reducing the deficit was not included in the House Budget Committee version, but it will likely be added to the resolution when the House takes up the measure.

Senate Republicans made some modifications in Reagan's original budget proposal—apart from "persuading" him to abandon his pledge not to tamper with social security and to accept a smaller rise in defense spending than he had sought. But in the end, the difference was less than once appeared likely.

Senate GOP leaders used the technique the AFL-CIO had anticipated in a letter to senators on the eve of the budget debate. They allowed moderate Republicans to claim "victory" by winning adoption of amendments to eliminate some of the most unpopular features of the President's budget. Thus the Senate voted to preserve the full social security COLA, and comparable provisions for the various government retirement programs. It held its majority together sufficiently to vote down the major Democratic alternatives.

Repackaging

Then, the GOP leaders scrapped or watered down many of the changes made and came up with a package that more closely resembled the original budget proposal. The changes that were made to it, such as restoration of farm funds, were negotiated with a handful of senators whose votes were essential to passage.

Even so, with four Republicans voting against the budget and only one Democrat favoring it, the Senate vote was 49-49 before Vice President Bush exercized his prerogative of casting the tie-breaking vote.

Magistrate rules against cutoff of disability benefits

New York—The AFL-CIO welcomed the recommendation of a federal magistrate here that the Social Security Administration be enjoined from its practice of disregarding court precedents relating to disability benefit payments, but adopted a wait-and-see attitude.

The magistrate's ruling stems from a class action suit filed last August by the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of all those people in New York state whose claims for disability benefits have been turned down by the SSA since 1981.

The next move is up to Judge Leonard B. Sand of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. If he accepts the magistrate's recommendation, the Social Security Administration could be required to reopen as many as 25,000 cases of people seeking reviews.

Associate Director Larry Smedley of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security observed, however, that the problem of enforcement would still remain.

"The Social Security Administration may well continue to ignore these kinds of lower court rulings pending appeals, denying benefits to thousands of hard-pressed disabled Americans," he said.

The issue grows out of the Reagan Administration's over-zealous efforts to remove from the social security disability rolls beneficiaries that it says are no longer eligible.

Bucking the courts

In a number of cases where beneficiaries have been restored by a U.S. Court of Appeals, the SSA has refused to apply the court's interpretation of the law to subsequent cases arising in the same judicial circuit. Thus, people with similar claims must go to court to preserve their benefits even though the court already ruled on the questions involved.

In the past four years, the SSA has reviewed some 1.2 million cases under a 1980 law and ordered 491,000 people off the rolls. Of this number 214,000 got back their benefits by appealing the cases.

Federal legislation enacted last year greatly restricted the SSA's review program, but did not go as far as organized labor had urged. A House bill would have required the SSA to abide by prior court decisions, but a Senate measure did not contain such a provision. In conference, the Republican-controlled Senate panelists won out, eliminating the House requirement.

Marvin L. Williams to retire, president of Washington Fed

Seattle—Washington State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams will not seek re-election to a fourth term. Williams, who is 63, told the state federation's executive board he plans to retire when his current term expires in January.

Williams first was elected president in 1980. Prior to that, he served 10 consecutive two-year terms as secretary-treasurer.

HRDI explores new ways to meet job training needs

New ways of assisting workers stranded by plant closings and new programs to help overcome job problems facing the disabled were explored during a three-day national staff conference of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute.

HRDI President Alan Kistler's opening remarks stressed the labor movement's continuing commitment to its jobless members. This is being demonstrated on a daily basis by job training programs in which HRDI staff members are working with unions, central bodies and state agencies, he said. Kistler noted also the high degree of success HRDI's handicapped placement specialists have had in programs serving disabled union members.

Houston success

One new project, undertaken in Houston in cooperation with the Texas Employment Commission, has served more than 400 disabled workers since it began in January and has placed 96 in permanent jobs. AFL-CIO Community Services representatives, unions and rehabilitation agencies have helped locate handicapped workers who could be helped through such programs.

Acting Director Michael McMillan and other members of the HRDI staff reported on current activities across the country, funded through the federal Job Training Partnership Act. These include:

- Continuing reemployment programs for dislocated workers in Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas, with new projects planned for New Mexico and New York.
- The use of two mobile vans by the New Mexico program to provide immediate assistance in plant closings or major layoffs in the large but sparsely populated state. HRDI staffers will design job search assistance services tailored to the needs of the displaced workers and help generate community support.
- Surveys to identify dislocated workers as the first step in providing assistance, which have been undertaken by HRDI in cooperation with Steelworkers District 27 in Ohio and state central bodies in Louisiana and Mississippi.
- HRDI support services for labor-involved programs in the Tennessee Valley Authority to prepare construction workers for technological changes in their crafts. The craft-upgrading, including specialized skills involved in robot technology, is administered in Nashville, Tenn., and Muscle Shoals, Ala., by TVA and the Tennessee Valley Trades & Labor Council.
- The labor-operated Rocky Mountain Work Project, which placed 79 percent of its participants in permanent jobs at an average entry wage of about $8 an hour. Despite this record, the project was denied renewal of its federal funding and is winding down its services to dislocated workers in the eight-state region. It has, however, received additional support from the state of Colorado to continue some activities there.

Babson opposed for NLRB seat on management ties

the AFL-CIO does not oppose his nomination," Kirkland said.

Two of the three sitting NLRB members were management attorneys before their appointments—Chairman Donald Dotson and Patricia Diaz Dennis. The third member, Robert Hunter, was chief counsel for the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

Babson, 39, was nominated to fill the vacancy left by Don A. Zimmerman for a term running through Dec. 16, 1989. Johansen would succeed Howard Jenkins, Jr., for a term expiring Aug. 27, 1988.

If both are confirmed, it would be the first time the labor board has been at full five-member strength since the fall of 1983.

Rollcall on Senate budget

The Senate on May 10 adopted a budget resolution that included elimination of the cost-of-living adjustment in social security and federal retirement pensions for next year, along with heavy cuts in other programs. The Senate was divided 49-49, but Vice President Bush cast a tie-breaking vote in favor of the resolution. Votes against passage were in accord with labor's position.

$3 million in back pay

False testimony puts anti-union firm in box

A slip-up by an anti-union company will benefit 60 former employees of a Kansas City, Kan., paper firm, who will divide nearly $3 million in backpay as a result of a National Labor Relations Board decision.

"But the case is indicative of just how bad things have gotten in this country's labor relations," Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn observed.

"In large part, the only reason the workers got a measure of justice was because the company slipped up."

The case goes back to August 1981 when Inland Container Corp., purchased International Paper Co.'s corrugated box manufacturing plant in Kansas City. International ceased operations and laid off all 60 workers at the plant on Aug. 28.

Inland took possession of the plant on Sept. 2 and reopened it two and a half months later. While it hired the supervisory and nonunion clerical employees who had worked at the plant under International, Inland studiously avoided hiring any of the hourly production workers, all members of UPIU Local 522.

Initially, an NLRB administrative law judge took the word of management witnesses who denied that union affiliation was one of the criteria used in screening job applicants. But the truth came out in a separate lawsuit involving age discrimination charges filed by a number of former International employees who were denied jobs at Inland.

Inland's management insisted that age bias had nothing to do with the denial of employment to any applicant. In response to an interrogatory, the company cited four criteria it used to screen prospective employees:

- A preference for high school graduates.
- A preference for two to five years of industrial experience.
- The mandatory exclusion of any employees with previous corrugated box experience.
- An employee's "demonstrated willingness to work in a nonunion environment."

This reference to a "nonunion environment" was Inland's undoing.

Conflicting testimony

The company earlier had insisted at a hearing on unfair labor practice charges that it did not automatically disqualify job applicants on the basis of union support.

When the UPIU brought the conflict in testimony to the attention of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, the court directed the NLRB to reopen the case to consider the union's additional evidence.

Last month, NLRB Administrative Law Judge Gerald Wacknov ruled that the new evidence required a complete reversal of his earlier conclusion that management had told the truth.

Wacknov concluded that the testimony of management's key witnesses was "knowingly false." Adopting the judge's finding that Inland was "motivated by unlawful considerations," the NLRB held Inland to be a successor employer and ordered the company to offer jobs and backpay to the former International employees, if necessary discharging workers now holding their jobs.

The board also ordered Inland to bargain with Local 522.

NLRB Chairman Donald L. Dotson and Members Robert Hunter and Patricia Diaz Dennis signed the board opinion. In a footnote, however, Dotson said he had "reservations" concerning the need for Inland to bargain with the union, but went along with his colleagues "for institutional reasons."

Idaho court stays open shop statute, backs referendum

Judge Robert G. Newhouse of the state's 4th District Court said the unions had raised a serious question.

Idaho's constitution, he said, requires that there be a genuine emergency in order to bypass the usual procedure, "not just wishful thinking" on the part of the legislature.

"The evidence submitted to this court shows that there is a serious question as to whether or not there is an emergency," the judge concluded. And "if there is no emergency, then the legislature improperly enacted this emergency provision."

He granted a preliminary injunction barring the immediate enforcement of the "right-to-work" law. Attorneys for the state legislature can pursue a trial on the merits, in accord with the judge's order. More likely, they can seek to have the Idaho Supreme Court reverse Judge Newhouse and void the injunction.

State AFL-CIO President Jim Kerns said he expects an appeal. But as of now, he stressed, Idaho does not have a "right-to-work" law and workers remain free to negotiate union security.

The referendum in November will be part of an election in which voters will elect members of the legislature as well as the governor.

James Gildea dies, assistant to Meany

Marina Del Rey, Calif.—James C. Gildea, an executive assistant to the late AFL-CIO President George Meany, died Mar. 15 after suffering a heart attack on a flight from Chicago to Los Angeles. Gildea, 62, made his home here.

In a message to Gildea's family, Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue expressed their deep regrets.

A native of Hazleton, Pa., Gildea began his labor career as a member of the Textile Workers and the Retail Clerks. He joined a CIO staff in 1941. After military service, he served as assistant to the CIO secretary-treasurer and later as assistant to the secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

In 1958, he became a special assistant to Meany and in 1969 executive assistant to the federation president.

In 1973 Gildea joined the U.S. Postal Service, where he became Assistant Postmaster General for labor relations. Earlier this year, he transferred to Inglewood, Calif., as sectional center manager/postmaster.

Survivors include his wife Mary Helen and three children. His son Michael is a staff representative with the federation's Dept. of Legislation.

AFL-CIO President Kirkland observes bricklaying skills of trainee at Weber Basin Job Corps Conservation Center near Ogden, Utah.

Trainees hail labor's pledge to fight gutting of Job Corps

Ogden, Utah—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the federation will "fight to keep the Job Corps programs operating," despite the Reagan Administration's efforts to eliminate them.

Kirkland's pledge came during a 2½-hour tour of the nearby Weber Basin Job Corps Conservation Center. His words of encouragement were met with a standing ovation from the center's 210 students who were well aware of the efforts to close the nation's 107 Job Corps centers.

The Reagan Administration's fiscal 1986 budget package called for elimination of the Job Corps. The Republican-controlled Senate partially complied by voting a 30 percent slash in Job Corps funds in the fiscal 1986 budget package it approved by a 50-49 vote. The Democartic-controlled House is expected to vote full funding for the program, which was initiated 20 years ago as part of President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society agenda.

The Weber Basin Job Corps Center is one of a number operated by the building trades affiliates of the AFL-CIO. Represented at this center are the Bricklayers, Carpenters, Painters, Plasterers, and Operating Engineers. Students and instructors from the Clearfield Job Corps Center in Clearfield, Utah, which is operated by the Auto Workers, were also on hand for Kirkland's tour.

Paying its way

At a press briefing, Kirkland pointed out that the Job Corps more than pays its way. He cited findings of a 1982 study that for every tax dollar spent on the hard-core disadvantaged youths enrolled in Job Corps skills training, $1.46 was returned in the form of tax revenues from the graduates' higher earnings, decreases in welfare costs and a reduction in crime.

The seven unions represented at Weber Basin and Clearfield along with the National Maritime Union have been with the program since the beginning and now train more than 6,000 youths each year in building trades, clerical and automotive skills.

Kirkland's visit to Weber Basin came during a side trip from the AFL-CIO regional conference in Salt Lake City. He had lunch with Job Corps Student Council President Rhett Runkle, Vice President Patricia Brown and Center Director Ted Larsen.

The sentiments of the Job Corps students, who are mainly high school dropouts and often from broken homes, were contained in a button presented to Kirkland on his arrival. It said simply, "We are family."

National award

The AFL-CIO leader also received the national "Job Corps Works" award in recognition of his support for the program.

On the same day of Kirkland's visit, Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) released in Washington the findings of a half dozen federal studies of the Job Corps that had been ordered by the Reagan Administration. Most of them had never been made public before, Obey pointed out.

"These studies tell us a good deal about the Job Corps, but a whole lot more about the way budget decisions are being made in this Administration," Obey said, noting that the attempt by the Administration to discredit the Job Corps program has backfired. All six studies strengthened the evidence in support of full funding for the program.

"In a year in which the President is asking for $15 billion in increased government spending and $30 billion is being transferred from domestic purposes to spending on defense and foreign affairs, Congress is being asked to eliminate a program which the Administration's internal reviews show is both working and saving tax dollars," Obey said, adding:

"Even if there were agreement with the Administration's view that billions of dollars should be transferred from domestic programs to spending on defense and foreign military support, the Job Corps is not a domestic program that any fair or right-minded person would choose for reduction."

Connecticut rejects 'con-con' edict

The Connecticut senate, by a bipartisan 23-13 vote, defeated a resolution petitioning for a national convention to initiate a balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Vice President Bush, Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole and other leading Republicans were among those who phoned GOP state senators urging support for the resolution.

Their efforts were in vain, despite the GOP's big majorities in both houses of the legislature. On the senate vote, 13 Republicans joined 10 Democrats in voting against a constitutional convention, with 11 Republicans and two Democrats supporting the move.

The state's labor movement, part of the coalition of organizations fighting "con-con," hailed the outcome. State AFL-CIO President John J. Driscoll noted that all Connecticut license plates carry the words, "the Constitution state." Connecticut's verdict, he said, is that the Constitution should not be recklessly tampered with.

Despite the heavy pressures from right-wing groups and the Reagan Administration, the Democratic and Republican leaders of both houses of the legislature had declared their opposition to the constitutional convention proposal. In the debate on the senate floor, one amendment supporter argued in vain that the issue was one of support for President Reagan's policies.

Thirty-two states have adopted constitutional convention calls, mostly in the 1970s when the move wasn't taken seriously. Proponents had hoped that the Republican capture of both houses of the Connecticut legislature last November would make that state the 33rd.

In California, a committee of the state assembly that had been considered favorable to con-con voted after hearings to reject a constitutional convention resolution. California is another state that has been on the right wing's target list of states.

One byproduct of the Connecticut action was to ease pressure on Congress to initiate a constitutional convention to head off the danger of a runaway constitutional convention that might seek an array of drastic changes in American government.

Sadness in South Africa

Mourners carry the casket of South African black trade unionist Andries Raditsela, who died last week of injuries he suffered while detained by South African police. More than 25,000 persons marched in the funeral procession in Tsakane, S.A. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland cabled South African Prime Minister P. W. Botha charging that Raditsela's death fits a familiar pattern of black leaders dying while they are held under that country's preventive detention laws. The Executive Council called on the Botha regime to repeal the repressive laws and end apartheid.

Council statement modifies policy on internal disputes

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its spring meeting in Washington adopted a statement on the application of the Article XX Internal Disputes Plan under state laws that provide for exclusive representation of public employees.

In presenting the statement as a recommendation of the council's Article XX Review Committee, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said it results from extensive discussion of problems relating to internal disputes in the public sector. The object is to achieve a better resolution of such disputes, Donahue said.

The statement modifies the long-standing Massillon doctrine, so-named after a 1964 dispute involving representation of workers at the Massillon State Hospital in Ohio. The council's interpretation at the time was that where laws, regulations or practice restricted unions in the public sector to representation of their "members only," and no broader collective bargaining relationship could be established, affiliates in such situations were entitled to protection of the Internal Disputes Plan as to the employees they represented.

Revised laws

The new council statement takes into account the spread in recent years of state laws that establish collective bargaining rights for public employees.

Text of the council's statements:

"Pursuant to its authority stated in Article XX, Section 13 of the AFL-CIO Constitution, the Executive Council has determined that the following modifications to the doctrine concerning the status of 'members only' relationships stated in the Massillon Hospital Case (No. 64-84) will advance the policies and purposes of that Article and should therefore be adopted.

"1. The Article XX Appeals Committee is authorized and directed: (a) to review the state laws providing for collective bargaining in the public sector presently in force to determine which of these laws incorporate a sufficient number of the essential features common to the Railway Labor Act, the National Labor Relations Act and the Federal Labor Relations Act to warrant application of the Article XX rule on the right of affiliates to seek exclusive representation presently followed in the federal and private sectors and to publish a list of such state laws on or before June 30, 1985; and (b) to conduct such a review of each state collective bargaining law enacted subsequent to June 30, 1985, and to determine within 30 days of its date of enactment whether that state law meets the criteria stated above and should therefore be added to the list of such state laws.

"2. It shall not be a violation of Article XX for an affiliate to attempt to secure exclusive recognition in an appropriate bargaining unit of public employees governed by a state law contained on the list referred to in the foregoing paragraph even though one or more affiliates have a 'members only' relationship covering employees in that unit unless that relationship is in a local government bargaining unit and has been granted special protection by such state law.

"3. This statement is not intended to affect either Article XX cases involving state or local government employees not covered by a collective bargaining law contained on the list referred to in Paragraph 1 above or Article XX cases growing out of organizing efforts initiated on or before June 30, 1985."

'McCarthy-like crusade'

OSHA officials focus of harassment probe

Top officials of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration were wrestled to the congressional carpet over their aggressive new policy of attacking, not workplace hazards, but the agency's employees.

The House Post Office & Civil Service Subcommittee on Investigations questioned OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland, his top deputy, James R. Meadows, and health standards director Dr. Leonard Vance about a reported "kick-ass-and-take-names" policy, about politically motivated personnel actions and about efforts to get "communists" out of the agency.

Subcommittee Chairman Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.) questioned Meadows about an anonymous memorandum charging that Meadows had told OSHA managers at a conference to "kick ass and take names" as a means of getting rid of those regarded as malcontents. As for civil service rules, the memorandum quoted Meadows as saying the victims could "hire an attorney and spend the next three years trying to get their jobs back."

Sikorski said he had called the hearing because "I am concerned by what appears from the news reports to be an almost McCarthy-like crusade for political conformity" within the agency. He said OSHA workers had told his staff they were "eager," but afraid to testify about the problems at the agency.

AFGE testifies

Michael Urquhart, president of Government Employees Local 12 which represents 4,500 Labor Dept. employees including 300 at OSHA, told the subcommittee, "We have witnessed the systematic dismantling of a once proud and effective regulatory agency" under the Reagan Administration.

"We have seen the agency's top scientists and physicians forced to resign, or shunted aside. We have seen attempts to intimidate scientists and career staff to dissuade them from carrying out their duties in a responsible, professional manner," Urquhart said.

He charged that in at least seven instances OSHA employees were punitively transferred, demoted, or fired because they favored stronger enforcement. Rowland denied that the new managerial policy aimed at intimidating the workers.

Rowland introduced a memorandum dated Apr. 29 which said OSHA "absolutely support(s) the prohibitions regarding any actions by management officials which may be intended to harass, intimidate, or interfere with the right of employees." Sikorski pointed out, however, that the administrator's memo did not reach OSHA managers until May 3, after the subcommittee had scheduled its oversight hearing.

Leaked comments

Citing confidential sources, Sikorski charged Rowland with having stated in a meeting with Under Sec. Ford B. Ford and other Labor Dept. officials that "OSHA is full of communists and I am going to root them out and cut their nuts off." Rowland denied having made the statement, but admitted he had heard others say it and he may have said, "Yeah, you're right."

The subcommittee also questioned Rowland about the termination of services of Dr. Dyann Waugh, an occupational health physician who had been under contract with the agency. Her contract was ended two weeks after she co-authored a memo protesting Rowland's plan not to issue a field sanitation standard to protect the nation's farm workers.

Dr. Leonard Vance, director of OSHA health standards, was questioned about an Aug. 12, 1982, staff memorandum which said he had termed language in the preamble to the proposed revision of the lead standard "communistic" and said the wording sounded as if the writer, Patricia Stewart, had been "trained in Moscow."

Sikorski said additional hearings are planned to take further testimony from agency managers and from Sec. of Labor William E. Brock, who was asked by AFGE Local 12 to investigate the allegations against Meadows.

Virginia shipyard finds friendly crew

June 1981. It evidently planned a quick revamping of the codes relating to shipyards and aimed toward a final draft of the new regulations by October 1981.

The Maritime Standards Task Force, as it was called, did provide Auchter with a report in 1982 which recommended that up to 70 percent of the general standards be dropped. The industry members of the panel wanted 70 percent of the rules not to apply to shipyards, while the staffers were looking to eliminate 20 percent.

Auchter, who left the OSHA post last year, took a keen interest in the proposed revisions, and in early 1983 he toured the 3½-mile-long Newport News facility. Shortly afterward, Edward Campbell, president and chief executive officer of Newport News, wrote to Auchter to reinforce the offer made by two other company officials "to provide whatever assistance we can to you and your staff in getting those standards published and adopted."

In April 1983, Auchter wrote to task force member Charles Klein, the company's director of safety, saying, "I will make every effort to assure that these new understandings on all our parts get translated into more appropriate and realistic safety and health standards for your industry."

In an August 1984 memo, Basil Needham, OSHA's director of maritime safety standards, recommended to White that the proposals made by the Newport News representatives on the task force to cut the regulations by 70 percent "be used as a base. By doing so, we are satisfying the vast majority of the industry. I strongly feel that the way I am proceeding is best for your office, OSHA, (former) Sec. (Raymond J.) Donovan, and the industry as a whole."

At issue is how many of the general industry rules will be eliminated from inclusion in the final shipyard codes. Also at issue is the allocation of staff and resources to accomplish the revision of the shipyard codes, an action that was requested by the industry, Wright said.

The OSHA proposed to revise the shipyard regulations is twofold. First, the agency is working on a long-term revision of the three main codes relating to shipyards. A second draft of the revisions of five of the 11 subsections of those codes is now being mailed to representatives of industry and labor, according to White.

Second, OSHA is attempting to provide an interim measure that will list those general industry regulations to be applied to the shipbuilding industry. White said a first draft of the interim rule was sent out recently for comment.

The decision not to include workers or their representatives on the task force apparently was Auchter's, White said. Questioned whether it was proper for the agency to set up a task force with representatives of the industry it regulates while excluding the workers OSHA is mandated to protect, White said, "It was an unusual way to proceed."

Petition drive backed on Mengele

The International Labor Communications Association is cooperating with a petition drive for intensified U.S. government efforts to bring Nazi war criminal Josef Mengele to justice.

The campaign by C.A.N.D.L.E.S.—Children of Auschwitz Nazi's Deadly Lab Experiments Survivors—aims at obtaining at least one million signatures to present President Reagan on July 4. The organization will ask Reagan to press those countries suspected of harboring Mengele to hand him over to the proper authorities for trial.

Mengele was responsible for "medical experiments" on helpless children, including twins, at Auschwitz. There is evidence he may be in Paraguay.

Labor song swap blends oldies, new goodies

By Candice Johnson

The audience at the finale of the seventh annual Great Labor Song Exchange hoped to hear "Solidarity Forever" and "Union Maid," and it wasn't disappointed. But the crowd of more than 200 people also heard a new generation of labor songs, today's music with a union label.

The concert was the highlight of a three-day program of workshops and song-swapping for 50 musicians, artists and labor historians from all parts of the country. Sponsored by the Labor Heritage Foundation, the exchange was held at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md., and provided an opportunity for union performers to share songs, ideas and enthusiasm.

Conference participants discussed the problems of promoting labor music and overcoming the notion that union songs are "an archaic art form." Among the suggestions were personalizing well-known songs and tailoring them to the workplace and using the style of music that best fits the membership, be it jazz, blue grass or rock and roll. Satire and parody, especially when based on actual workplace experiences, were viewed as effective tools in getting across the union message.

Heroes, heroines

In one workshop, Tom Juravich and Alice Hoffman of Pennsylvania State University's Dept. of Labor Studies presented stories of union men and women as "unsung heroes and heroines," while a later session was devoted to labor theater.

The ties between labor and civil rights songs of the South were explored by James Orange of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and John Handcox, an organizer for the Southern Tenant Farmers Union in Arkansas during the 1930s.

Handcox, 81, wrote dozens of poems and songs during the tenant farmers' campaign, including one of the most popular labor songs ever, "Roll the Union On."

Handcox was never credited for writing the piece until recently, when his work was recognized by folk singer Pete Seeger and labor performer Joe Glazer.

Seeger called "Roll the Union On" one of the greatest picket-line songs ever and raised the funds for Handcox's trip to the song exchange. Handcox, a member of the Carpenters, still sings occasionally at fund raisers and hopes his music makes a difference. "If my songs help make this a better world to live in, I think I did a lot," he said.

The three-day session was punctuated by impromptu song fests, and evenings were spent in informal singing sessions and practice for the final concert.

Right-to-know blues

The two-hour program combined old favorites with new pieces on current issues. There were songs from Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34's strike against Yale University as well as a plea for "a cure for the right-to-know blues" by Paul Landbergis. The Flight Attendants performed a musical skit on workplace problems 30,000 feet up, and Mary Trevor and Jeanne Mackey said what workers want in "Don't want no handouts."

Operating Engineers elect Dugan to succeed Turner

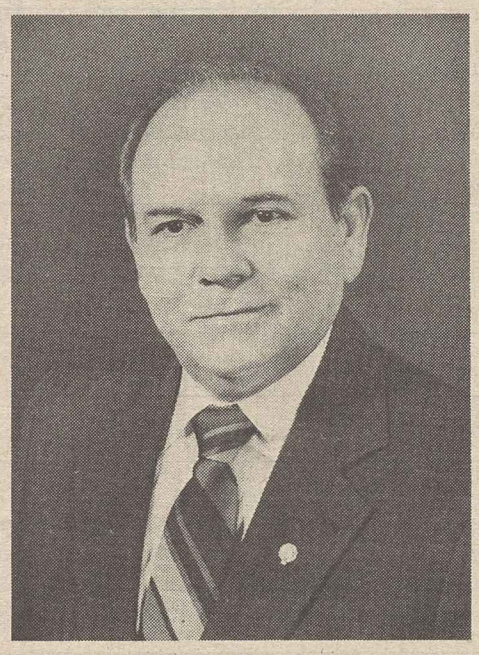
J. C. Turner will retire May 31 as president of the Operating Engineers and become president emeritus, a non-salaried position, the IUOE announced.

Larry L. Dugan, Jr., sixth vice president and an assistant to Turner since 1979, was elected by the union's executive board to succeed Turner on June 1. His term will run through Jan. 1, 1989. The next union election will be in 1988.

Turner was first elected president of IUOE in 1975, after three years as secretary-treasurer and 16 years as a vice president. He was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in May 1977, following the resignation of the late Hunter P. Wharton, who had been IUOE's president.

Turner has been a member of Washington's IUOE Local 77 since 1934. During the 1940s he was the local's organizer and business representative. He served as business manager from 1950 to 1971 when he was appointed legislative director of the international union.

He is a member of the executive boards of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Industrial Union Dept., as well as chairman of the federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health.



Active in political and civic affairs, Turner is a member of the Democratic National Committee and had been a delegate to several national conventions. He also served on the first District of Columbia city council.

Turner also is a trustee of the National Urban League and Catholic University and treasurer of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

Dugan, 55, joined IUOE Local 428 in Phoenix in 1948 and served as a representative, organizer, executive board member, financial secretary and business manager until becoming an IUOE vice president and assistant to the president in 1979.

He held a number of elected offices in the Phoenix Building & Construction Trades Council, the Arizona Conference of Building Trades Councils, the Arizona AFL-CIO and Centarl Arizona AFL-CIO.

Dugan is chairman of the IUOE National Impasse Settlement Board and a member of the Associated General Contractors basic trades committee.

Uniroyal agrees to URW pattern pact

Akron, Ohio—The Rubber Workers reached a tentative agreement with Uniroyal, Inc., that matches the industry pattern, thus concluding this year's bargaining with the Big Four tiremakers.

The agreement, subject to ratification within the next two weeks, covers some 4,200 workers at seven plants. Those plants are in Eau Claire, Wis.; Mishawaka, Ind.; Naugatuck, Conn. (two plants); Painesville and Port Clinton, Ohio, and Opelika, Ala.

The package matches the industry pattern in that it provides for wage increases totaling 43 cents an hour over the term—25 cents the first year, 10 cents the second year and 8 cents the third year.

Also matched was the increase in monthly pension benefits of $3.50 per year of service along with an increase for current retirees of 50 cents per month per year of service. The health care cost containment program, initiated last September, was included in the package.

URW members have ratified the new contract with B. F. Goodrich, while settlements with Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., and Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. are still being voted on. At Goodrich's Akron plant, URW members voted down a proposal by management that they pass up the raise of 43 cents an hour in exchange for a promise by the company not to close the plant during the life of the contract.

IUE seeks broad range of gains at General Electric

New York—The Electronic Workers expect "a good settlement package" with "a broad range of contract improvements" from this year's bargaining with General Electric, IUE President William H. Bywater stressed as negotiations on a national agreement got under way here.

Bywater, who is chairman of the 13-union GE-Westinghouse coordinated bargaining steering committee, emphasized early retirement and other pension improvements among the union's bargaining goals as well as wage increases.

"The job security provisions of the current contract must be improved," he said adding that union security and improbed insurance coverage also top the list.

The IUE represents about 50,000 GE employees nationwide while the other 12 unions on the coordinated bargaining committee represent about 30,000. The IUE national contract expires on June 30.

Unions participating in the GE bargaining besides the IUE include the Steelworkers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Machinists, Auto Workers, Carpenters, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Allied Industrial Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters and United Electrical Workers.

Most of the same unions also coordinate their bargaining with Westinghouse Electric Corp. The IUE represents about 6,000 Westinghouse workers whose contracts expire July 21.

Drive picks up to plug corporate tax loopholes

A labor-supported grassroots campaign is helping significantly to build pressure on Congress to enact a fair-share corporation tax that would help significantly to reduce the deficit and fund needed programs the Reagan Administration wants to end.

That's the conclusion of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., which is playing a major coordinating role in the campaign, on the basis of reports on the first month's activities.

The campaign got underway with news conferences in 35 cities on Apr. 15, the deadline for filing income taxes. At post offices that day, tax filers found volunteers—many of them off-duty union postal workers—circulating petitions from Citizens Organized to Restore an Effective Corporate Tax, their coalition of more than 30 public-interest groups, unions and other community-based organizations.

The petition drive has the strong endorsement of the AFL-CIO, and while the PED is coordinating much of labor's participation, the campaign has enlisted support across the union spectrum. A number of AFL-CIO central bodies are pressing the effort at state and community levels.

Federation President Lane Kirkland, in a statement of support for the petition drive, said citizens across the nation "are appalled by the widespread practice of tax avoidance." He urged members of all AFL-CIO unions to help build the pressure on Congress for a fair-share tax that will prevent giant corporations from escaping their responsibilities to the nation.

The petition, reproduced on this page for tearout and copying for use by union members, expressed outrage that corporate tax loopholes allow firms with billions in profits to escape taxation, while other taxpayers pay their full share.

Tens of thousands of signatures were obtained on the campaign's opening day and the various cooperating groups have accumulated others that are being turned over to the coalition.

Instead of taking a breather during the summer months, the campaign is being intensified. The goal now is to collect one million signatures by Labor Day to send a message to Congress and the Administration that Americans want tax fairness.

Along the way, there will be a series of attention-getting events. One project in the planning stage involves Fourth of July protests targeting those companies with the most notorious record of tax avoidance.

The coalition is also broadening the network of cooperating organizations, and local coordinators have been scheduling petition circulations at shopping centers and public gatherings. The various groups are also planning direct follow-up contacts with members of Congress on their home-district visits.

The PED's interim report said the news conferences launching the project, as well as the petition-gathering activities that followed, have been a major factor in the growing focus in Congress on a corporate minimum tax.

"It is more than coincidence that the momentum behind corporate minimum tax proposals has picked up on Capitol Hill over the past several weeks," the PED report observed.

CITIZENS PETITION
To Restore the Corporate Tax

We, the undersigned taxpayers, pay our fair share of taxes and more. It's time for our largest and most profitable corporations to pay their fair share too.

As people who pay our taxes, we are outraged by the $90 billion in corporate tax loopholes which allow General Electric, W.R. Grace & Co., and hundreds of other corporate tax avoiders to pay little or nothing in taxes.

When federal deficits are a problem, handouts to corporations are NOT the answer. By putting corporations back on the tax rolls, we can reduce the federal deficit and actually cut taxes for middle- and low-income taxpayers.

In the interest of fairness to all taxpayers, we hereby petition the Congress of the United States to repeal these special interest loopholes and restore the corporate tax.

Courage and Mischief

THERE IS good news and bad news in the continuing battle to prevent the Constitution of the United States from being desecrated by a mischievous amendment to require a balanced federal budget, regardless of the nation's need or the condition of the economy.

The good news comes from Connecticut, where a heavily Republican state senate rejected a resolution petitioning for a national constitutional convention to initiate such an amendment. And that despite a full-court lobbying press by the Reagan Administration, including calls by Vice President Bush to Republican state senators. In California, too, a committee of the state assembly has blocked, at least for now, a similar resolution.

The bad news comes from the U.S. Senate, where a 5-0 vote by a Judiciary subcommittee signaled a clear and present danger that lack of political courage will cause Congress to initiate a balanced budget amendment that would be unworkable at best and devastating to the economy at worst.

IT WAS PERHAPS not surprising that a Senate Judiciary subcommittee headed by Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) approved the balanced budget amendment offered by the chairman of the full committee, Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

The amendment is, after all, part of the credo of the Republican Party's right wing. It has allowed President Reagan and his supporters in Congress to duck their responsibility for the huge growth in the federal deficit under their stewardship.

More surprising is the fact that the amendment was reported out of subcommittee by a 5-0 vote. This is the sort of "pass-the-buck" philosophy that has led so many state legislatures to vote to convene a constitutional convention that would bypass Congress and initiate a balanced budget amendment directly.

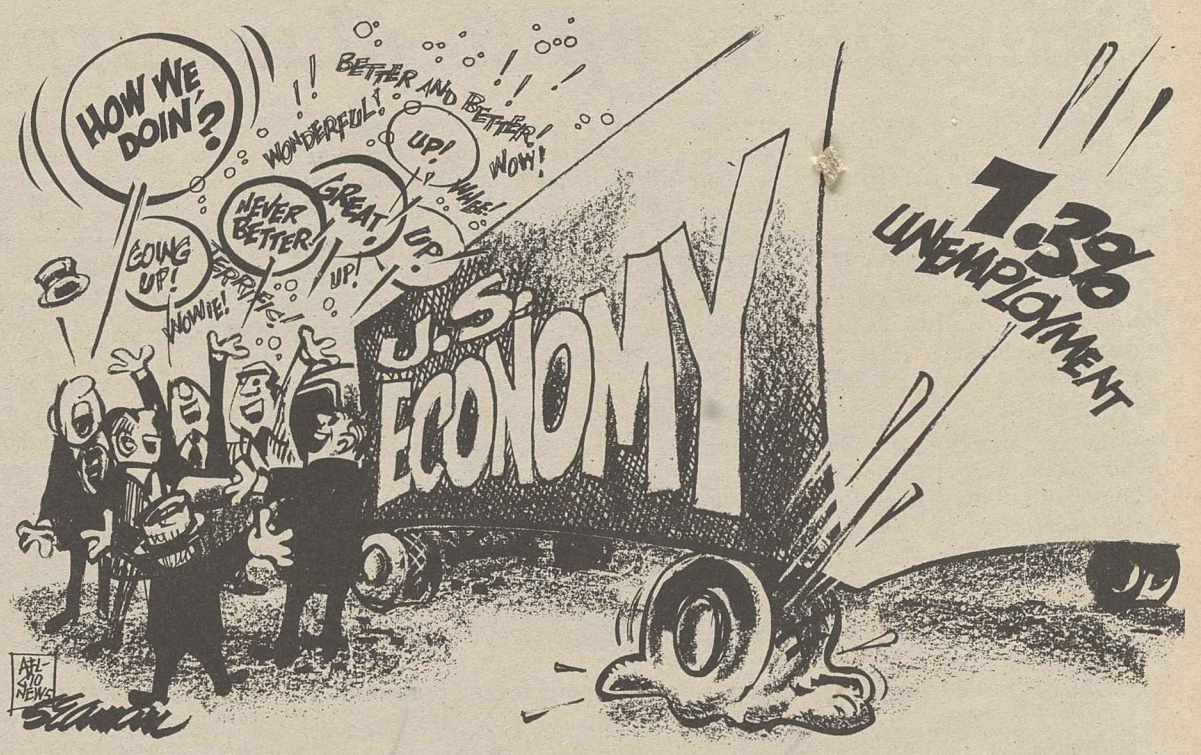
Along the way, otherwise responsible legislators of both parties have chosen to leave it to someone else to stop the momentum. In Congress, senators have counted on the House to block action, and it is to that body's credit that it has thus far done so. But it is indefensible that such an unsound and undemocratic proposition should advance even to the brink of acceptance.

ON THE SURFACE, the amendment approved by the Senate subcommittee leaves an escape hatch. Congress could approve specific outlays that exceed anticipated revenues by a three-fifths vote of the total membership of the House and the Senate. Clearly, the effect of such a rule would be to enshrine the power of a minority to veto the judgment of a majority.

President Reagan could, of course, propose to Congress a balanced budget, and it would be instructive if he did so.

Would such a budget decimate the military defenses of the United States? Or would the President's proposals dismantle entirely programs that both parties and the American people clearly support? If social security payments are threatened with cuts under the budget adopted by the Senate, what could we expect under the balanced budget straitjacket?

In Connecticut, recognizing a clear and present danger, members of both parties had the political courage to stand up for principle—and the Constitution.



Members of Congress should do no less.

A Cause for Us All

THE PETITION for corporate tax reform on the facing page is intended to be clipped out and used by any willing union member who does not already have petitions to circulate.

The decline of the corporate tax as a source of revenue has been a major factor in the growth of the federal deficit. The restoration of that tax can be a significant step toward reducing the deficit and meeting the nation's needs.

The public sector unions which have done so much to focus attention on the problem have performed a national service. But the cause is one for the entire trade union movement to embrace. It stands for fairness and it affects every American taxpayer.

Reagan's memory short on 'vital' role of Job Corps

By Press Associates, Inc.

At a celebration marking the 20th anniversary of the Job Corps youth training program last September, President Reagan sent a warmly worded telegram, calling it a "vital program in keeping with the American spirit of helping others to reach their full potential—a spirit that has sustained our nation from its very founding." The November elections were six weeks away.

In February, the re-elected President sent Congress a budget proposing a new round of large cuts in domestic spending, including the termination of the Job Corps and nearly a score of other programs. The Job Corps received $617 million this year.

In April, this program Reagan had called "vital" just seven months earlier had become, in the President's words, one of "those programs whose costs outweigh the benefits." Continuing, he said, "It's estimated that each job created through the program costs the taxpayers $15,200. That's almost equal to sending a student to Harvard for one year."

Reagan evidently pulled his $15,200 figure from David Stockman's Office of Management & Budget (OMB), an agency which has become notorious for putting a price on everything and a value on nothing. But in this case, even the quoted price was seriously misleading.

Real cost

Actually, while an individual Job Corps training "slot" costs $15,200 a year, several individuals may occupy that slot during the course of a year. Thus the real cost is the one used by the Labor Dept. in last year's budget submission—$5,252 per trainee.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) accused OMB of "using false data and improper conclusions" regarding the Job Corps. Hatch, who used to view the program skeptically as an offspring of the 1960s Great Society, now is among its vocal supporters, as are other congressional conservatives. Hatch has seen it work in his state, turning the "hard-core" jobless into productive and tax-paying citizens.

Hatch, who chairs the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, also was impressed by a long-range study by Mathematica Police Research, Inc., which showed that for every $1 spent on the Job Corps there was a $1.46 return to society in terms of increased employment, reduced welfare payments and less crime.

Job Corps trainee Sandra Williams, 19, interviewed by the New York Times in a training center in Washington, D.C., said, "It's really straightened me out to be here." Without the program, "I'd either be in jail or out hustling," said Williams, who is learning building matenance.

Success rate

Refuting OMB statistical manipulations which tried to show a low success rate, Job Corps officials put the fiscal year 1984 success rate above 75 percent. More than 60 percent of its 98,809 trainees last year found jobs or entered the military while another 15 percent went on to further education or training.

The Job Corps is the only federal training program targeted specifically at young people facing a lifetime of poverty and despair. Four out of five of its enrollees have not finished high school; 38 percent have arrest records; 91 percent meet the government's definition of "economically disadvantaged." Removed from their disruptive environments, these young people learn discipline as well as job skills in 107 residential centers throughout the country.

Trade unions have been involved in the program from the beginning. Today thousands of union members are Job Corps graduates employed as painters, plasterers, cement masons, carpenters, bricklayers, operating engineers, clerks, cooks, auto mechanics, and railway and airline clerks.

With youth unemployment about 18 percent and the black youth jobless rate over 40 percent, the loss of the Job Corps would be a national disgrace.

Sandinista police turn back union marchers with force, demanding that they have a permit to march.

Nicaraguan unions hit disruption of May Day march by Sandinistas

Managua—The independent Confederation of Labor Unity (CUS) called on the Sandinista government to halt its "unjustified aggressions" against free trade unions in Nicaragua following a union May Day protest against government economic policies and repressive actions.

In a letter to President Daniel Ortega, the CUS leadership charged that "shameful and aggressive actions" by the Sandinista police were used to break up the union demonstration.

"We felt, Mr. President," the letter said, "that after the victory of the Nicaraguan people over the Somoza dictatorship, the working class would have a right to engage in public demonstrations and to celebrate its International Labor Day or any other event without any obstacles or intervention on the part of the government or its forces.

"However, CUS continues to be subject to a discriminatory treatment on the part of the authorities from the Ministry of Labor and the judicial system through a systematic rejection of recognition to the labor unions recently organized by CUS, through annulment of the pertinent legal status to other existing unions, the unjustified imprisonment of some of our leaders, the raiding and occupation of our central union headquarters by the Sandinista police, and a great number of other actions against CUS and its leaders."

What precipitated the protest letter was a clash between the police and some 450 workers represented by CUS and the Confederation of Nicaraguan Workers, another independent union, during the May 1 demonstration.

No permit

After attending a mass said by Cardinal-designate Miguel Obando y Bravo at El Calvario church here, the workers were stopped by police as they tried to march to the spot where CUS Sec.-Gen. Luis Medrano Flores was assassinated by Somozan troops in 1978. Fighting broke out as police challenged the demonstrators for having no march permit. CUS and CTN leaders responded that they had never needed a permit before.

"This is an example of the Nicaraguan government's attitude toward labor," William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development said in Washington.

Following the mass, CUS and CTN members began to form in front of the church for the planned march to Medrano's gravesite. Shortly after the march got under way, 40 armed Sandinista police confronted the union members and ordered them to return to the church.

After 10 minutes of shouting back and forth, the police lined up and began to push the marchers back. Some hurled plastic bags filled with water, sticks, and fruit at the police who nonetheless managed to drive the marchers back some 30 yards before the group halted.

Suddenly, a government truck filled with young "turbas," or Sandinista sympathizers, pulled up behind the police. The turbas jumped from the vehicle, approached the unionists, and began to engage them in a running verbal battle.

"Communismo, no, Democracia, Si!" the union members called out in reply.

The police eventually separated the two groups and pushed the union members back to the church where the protest continued for at least another hour.

CTN leader Carlos Huembes said he felt the government's charge of marching without a permit was trumped up. The unions had never before had to ask permission to march on May Day, he said.

Texas UFW wins fight for jobless aid law

Austin, Tex.—The Farm Workers spearheaded the winning drive for a new Texas law that extends unemployment compensation coverage to the state's 150,000 farm workers.

Gov. Mark White (D) signed the bill into law earlier this month, ending a 50-year exclusion that denied farm workers jobless benefit protection.

"Farm workers are some of the poorest paid workers in Texas," said Rebecca Flores Harrington, Texas director of the UFW. "They have been historically excluded from all the forms of job protection the rest of the industrial workers take for granted. With this bill, they will be entitled to the same protection as other workers from an unforeseen job termination."

The Farm Workers' efforts were augmented by those of the Texas AFL-CIO and the Texas Conference of Churches.

Harrington noted that the UFW's lobbying actions included giving every state legislator a green pepper with a note attached pointing out that farm workers pick the foods everyone eats.

Court decision

Major impetus for enactment of a just law came from a decision by State District Court Judge Harley Clark on a class-action suit filed by the UFW. Judge Clark ruled that the exclusion of farm workers under the Texas Unemployment Compensation Act was unconstitutional. The court ordered the Texas Employment Commission to pay benefits to farm workers.

While the state law for industrial workers covered those employers who paid more than $1,500 a quarter in wages, the provision for farm workers covered only those employers paying wages of more than $20,000 a quarter. It was this double standard the judge ruled unconstitutional.

The signing of the new law was the second significant victory for the UFW in the past nine months. The legislature last year approved a bill that brought the farm workers under the state workers' compensation law from which they had been excluded for 70 years. That bill was approved after the exclusion was held unconstitutional in a decision also issued by Judge Clark of Austin.

Accords set with 3 airlines, deadline nears in United talks

The Machinists ratified new contracts with Eastern Airlines and USAir and the Transport Workers reached a tentative agreement with American Airlines.

Meanwhile, ALPA and United Airlines resumed talks as a May 17 strike deadline neared.

The central issue is United's proposed tiated new contracts with the Machinists two-tiered pay scale that would reduce salaries of new pilots from existing rates. ALPA represents 4,900 United pilots.

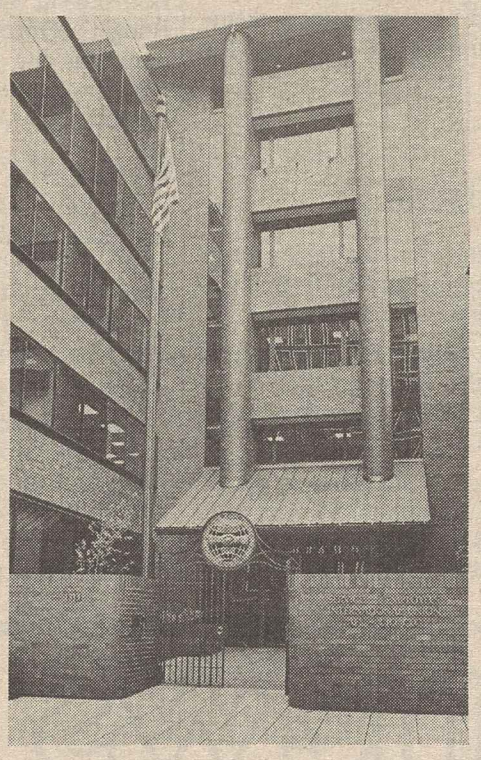
United, which led the airline industry in revenues last year, has already nego- and the Flight Attendants.

"The AFL-CIO strongly supports your determination to secure a fair contract with United Airlines, and stands ready to assist you in your struggle if you are unable to achieve justice at the bargaining table," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a telegram to ALPA's negotiators.

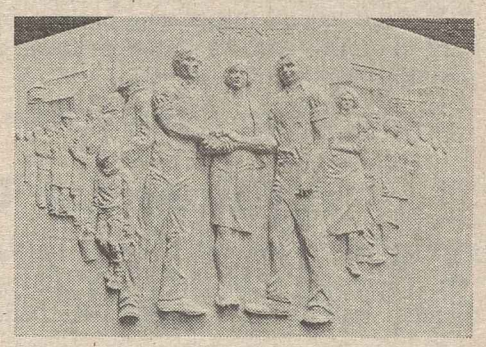
The Eastern pact, approved by 61 percent of those voting on it, restores an 18-percent wage cut in effect since last year when workers made the concession to help the financially troubled union.

Five percent of the cut will be restored retroactive to Feb. 1, and 4 percent will be restored retroactive to Apr. 1. The remainder will be paid back on a quarterly basis through the life of the contract as productivity gains are registered.

On Feb. 1, 1986, the 12,000 IAM mechanics at Eastern will get a 6-percent wage hike. Additional increases of 4 percent and 3 percent will be given in January 1987 and July 1987, respectively.



Eastern still is negotiating with the Transport Workers, which represents flight attendants. The Air Line Pilots ratified a new contract in March. The carrier's creditors had pressed it to reach new agreements with all three unions by May 15.



The IAM's three-year package provides USAir's 2,140 mechanics and ground workers a pay increase of 9.9 percent over the term of the contract, while setting a lower rate for new hires during the first five years.

New rates

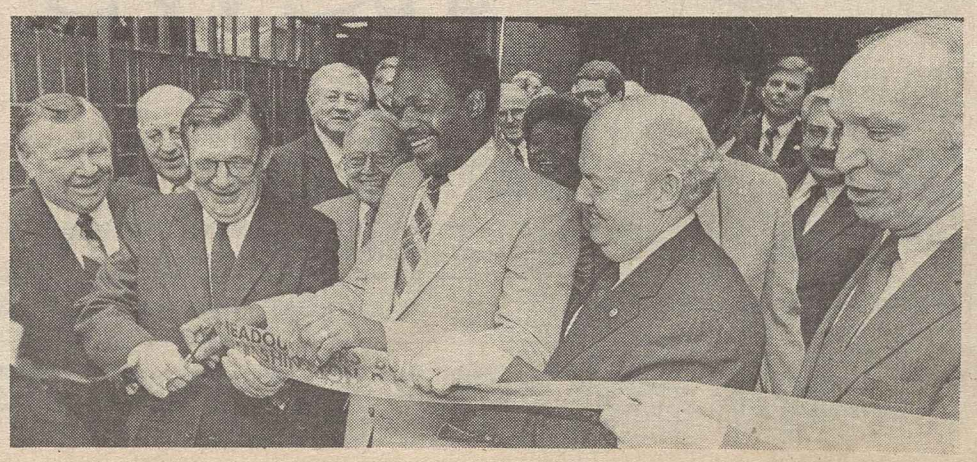
Top hourly rates for mechanics will go from $16.65 under the previous agreement to $18.30 in January 1987. Utility workers' rates are raised from $11.92 to $13.10, while stock clerks' pay goes up from $13.79 to $15.17 per hour. The scale for new hires is 18 to 25 percent lower than the starting rates under the last contract, but the top rate is reached in five years.



The TWU agreement with American Airlines covers nearly 12,000 ground workers. TWU Vice President Ed Koziatek said that the terms of the proposed package, which was unanimously recommended for membership approval by the bargaining committee, are being explained in unit meetings. Ratification procedures should be completed by around May 18, Koziatek said.

Reagan scheme for cut-rate youth wage protested

Federation cites need for higher minimum

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to reject the Reagan Administration's proposal for a subminimum youth wage and focus instead on providing a more adequate pay floor for workers of all ages.

Today's $3.35-an-hour wage is already subminimum, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison testified at Senate hearings. It would have to rise above $4 an hour just to restore the buying power eroded since the last minimum wage increase was enacted.

Under the Administration proposal, employers would be able to hire teenagers at $2.50 an hour in the summer, and could continue to hire students year-round at the low student rate that is now in effect.

Denison told the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee that the AFL-CIO opposes the Administration bill and other subminimum youth proposals because it:

- Discriminates against young workers.

Young workers, students demand equal pay

A drenching rain couldn't dampen the enthusiasm of high school students meeting on the steps of the Labor Dept. building in Washington to demonstrate against the Reagan Administration's plan to pay teenagers less than the minimum wage.

Nearly 1,000 young people braved the weather to demand "equal pay for equal work" from Labor Dept. officials and Congress. The White House has proposed that employers be allowed to pay 16-19-year-olds $2.50 an hour for summer jobs, instead of the $3.35 an hour minimum wage.

The rally was organized by the Coalition for Youth, Jobs & Fair Wages, representing 40 youth groups including Frontlash, the AFL-CIO youth organization. Bus loads of teenagers came from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other East Coast cities for the protest. One group traveled all night from North Carolina.

Sluggish economy threat to jobs

ALPA President Henry Duffy holds a picket-line press conference on United Airlines strike in Washington, while striking pilots serve a spaghetti dinner at their union hall to senior citizens stranded in San Francisco.

Striking pilots ground 85% of United flights

Union solidarity was running strong as the Air Line Pilots' strike against United Airlines entered its second week.

The two sides resumed negotiations after the start of the May 17 walkout, but failed to resolve differences over a company demand to sharply lower pay of new pilots.

With 96 percent of the 5,200 United pilots honoring the union's picket lines, the nation's largest carrier had to cut its flight schedule by 85 percent. Of the carrier's normal load of 1,580 daily flights,

Budget conflicts facing House-Senate conferees

By David L. Perlman

A House-Senate conference will determine whether social security recipients get a cost-of-living increase or the Pentagon gets more next year.

It will seek to resolve also differences between heavy slashes made by the Senate in a range of domestic programs and a House-passed budget that avoids meat-ax cuts and in most cases holds spending to present levels.

The Democratic House will send to the conference table a delegation bolstered by decisive votes rejecting social scurity cuts and refusing to exempt the huge military budget from the restraints placed on domestic programs.

They will face Republican-led Senate negotiators seeking to defend a patchwork budget compromise that squeezed through only by a tie-breaking vote cast by Vice President Bush.

By contrast, the House approved intact, by a convincing 258-170 vote, the blueprint shaped by Democratic members of its Budget Committee. It was praised by the AFL-CIO as a responsible approach that "strikes a fair balance" between defense and domestic needs.

On the way to passage, the House decisively defeated alternative budget proposals that would have eliminated or reduced cost-of-living adjustments in social security benefits and federal pensions. It also rejected higher ceilings for new military spending. Despite the fact that the budgeted amount for defense is held at current levels, carryover funding will al-

Growth rate sags to .7% in first quarter

By James M. Shevis

Sluggish growth in the American economy of only seven-tenths of 1 percent for the first quarter of the year is a clear sign that the country is headed for trouble, the AFL-CIO warned.

"This slow growth will cause even more unemployment," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said. "A sustained growth of 3 to 4 percent is needed to prevent joblessness from getting worse."

Unemployment, now at 7.3 percent, has remained near that high level for the past year after improving somewhat from the Reagan Recession of 1981-82.

The Commerce Dept. originally estimated that "real" gross national product (GNP) grew at a 1.3-percent annual rate during the January-March period. That preliminary report gave way to an even slower rate of growth, however, as more figures came in.

Real GNP is the measure of production of all goods and services in the economy adjusted for inflation and seasonal variations.

Import surge

The small first-quarter growth in the economy was strongly influenced by the nation's continuing trade deficits. Exports dipped at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.3 percent during the quarter as imports surged 11.3 percent.

The January-March rise in real GNP compared with a 4.3-percent rate of increase in the fourth quarter of 1984 and a gain of 6.8 percent recorded for all of last year.

The gloomy first-quarter figures rein-

Tough U.S. sanctions asked to shift South Africa's path

A tough U.S. sanctions policy would go a long way toward bringing pressure to bear on the South African government to change its racist practice of apartheid, the AFL-CIO declared as Congress turned to legislation aimed at hastening dismantlement of the system.

South Africa's official policy of racial segregation along with other infringements of freedom, such as preventive detention laws, effectively deny blacks the basic tools needed to organize and control their own institutions, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing.

Donahue said that democratic institutions represent "the best alternative to the bloody resoluion of conflict." He warned that "if violent revolution comes to South Africa, there will be no winners, only unimaginable suffering."

Donahue's appearance before the Senate panel came as the House opened debate on a bill that would impose economic

Plant closing legislation backed as 'first step'

Workers and communities should be entitled by law to advance notice of plant closings and an opportunity to explore alternatives, Auto Workers President Owen Bieber insisted at House hearings.

Bieber supported as a "first step" the bipartisan bill introduced by Representatives William D. Ford (D-Mich.) and Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.). The measure would require firms to provide at least a 90-day notice of a plant closing or a permanent layoff of 50 or more workers.

Employers could shorten the notification period by persuading the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service that "unavoidable business considerations" require a shorter notice.

The bill would also set up a bipartisan national commission to develop programs to avert shutdowns and assist dislocated workers. Where workers are represented by a union, the employer would be required to explore alternatives that might save the jobs.

Two subcommittees of the House Education & Labor Committee are holding joint hearings on the Ford-Conte bill, which is a modified version of labor-supported bills introduced in previous years. Rep. William D. Clay (D-Mo.), who heads the Labor-Management Relations subcommittee, said the legislation "does not go nearly as far as I think is needed" but could command broad support in Congress. In the last Congress, Clay's subcommittee approved a bill requiring six to 12 months notice of a plant closing but it didn't get to a vote in the House.

Disruption widespread

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison reiterated the federation's support for the measure in a letter to Clay, noting that no section of the nation and no industry has been immune to the disruption of plant closings.

It has hit the Sunbelt as well as older industrial areas, Denison noted. He cited steel, auto, glass, rubber, clothing textiles, machine tools, electronics—even computers — as industries that have had shutdowns.

"The entire fabric of the U.S. economy is being affected," Denison said, and the impact is "devastating" to workers involved.

Despite the bipartisan sponsorship, both the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers testified in opposition to the bill.

The Chamber protested that the advance notice requirement would amount to "usurping management's prerogatives" to make business decisions. And the NAM suggested that plant closings would be so difficult to achieve that businesses would tend to continue operating inefficient plants instead of taking measures to become more competitive.

Bieber warned the House panels that the problem of plant closings is not going away and that decisions "made behind closed corporate boardroom doors," without public scrutiny, carry enormous economic and social impact on workers and their communities. Of some 5 million jobs permanently lost in the past five years, half were the result of plant closings, he noted.

Preventive law needed

Legislation is needed, Bieber urged, to prevent companies from shutting down "in the dead of night—giving little or no notice and refusing to discuss their decision with the union."

Bieber cited as an example the plight of employees of the Ferro Mfg. Corp. in Mount Pleasant, Mich., who were put on a short-term layoff for a normal inventory period. But starting that night and into the weekend, trucks secretly loaded machinery and stripped the plant of all its heavy equipment.

"This is just one example of the irresponsible and callous company action that workers are confronted with," Bieber testified.

House panel faults OSHA

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration is failing in its duty to protect workers employed at hazardous waste sites, the House Government Operations Committee found.

Its report, unanimously adopted, was based on hearings by a subcommittee headed by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.). It called on OSHA to move promptly to develop a new standard for toxic cleanups and to give priority to enforcing existing standards at cleanup sites.

"OSHA's record of enforcement in the hazardous waste industry can only be described as dismal," Frank reported. He pointed to "a Catch 22 system under which OSHA targets its inspections toward industries and employers with poor health and safety records. Because few toxic waste sites have been inspected in the past, this industry has no record on which OSHA can base future targeting of inspections."

The committee report also criticized OSHA for limiting its right-to-know hazard communication standard to manufacturing industries.

"Clearly, hazardous waste workers have an urgent need for such information because everything they are required to handle is potentially dangerous," Frank stressed.

Federal laxity called peril to toxic cleanup workers

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to protect workers engaged in hazardous waste cleanup operations and assailed inaction by the Reagan Administration despite the requirements of the 1980 Superfund law.

The federation asked legislation to direct the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to issue a comprehensive permanent standard and to provide interim coverage for these workers until a standard is adopted.

AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner, chairman of the federation's standing committee on occupational safety and health, told the House Education & Labor Subcommittee on Health & Safety that the "greatest need is for a set of comprehensive standards governing toxic waste sites."

Turner said an effective OSHA program to protect workers who are cleaning up the nation's toxic waste dumps should include continuous training, engineering controls, work practice rules on cleanup operations, medical monitoring on a regular basis, exposure monitoring and effective right-to-know rules.

At issue is the safety of up to one million workers, Turner said, as the cleanup of toxic wastes has become a growth industry. Turner, who is president of the Operating Engineers, said that "the magnitude of the problem is mind-boggling and the dimensions of the workers' safety and health problems are directly proportional to the magnitude of the toxic waste problem."

Lacklustre effort

Turner noted that the Environmental Protection Agency has estimated that there are between 16,000 and 22,000 abandoned toxic waste sites in the United States and some 2,000 of them present an immediate danger to the public. Of these 2,000, only six have been cleaned up under the federal Superfund law.

Superfund authorization expires in September and Congress is considering reauthorizing legislation as well as funding levels needed to increase the attack on these toxic sites.

Margaret Seminario, the federation's industrial hygienist, urged congressional action to assure that OSHA acts to develop comprehensive permanent standards within a specified time period to protect workers at toxic waste sites.

To protect workers in the interim, Seminario said legislative action is needed to codify OSHA's ability to take enforcement action through its general duty clause and to "provide guidelines that should be used as an interim standard pending the promulgation of a comprehensive standard."

Seminario's testimony was presented to the subcommittee by Jim Ellenberger of the federation's social security department.

Fire Fighters concerns

Richard M. Duffy, director of health and safety for the Fire Fighters, testified to the union's concern for the lack of health and safety protections afforded fire fighters responding to fires at hazardous waste sites—regardless of whether the site falls under the jurisdiction of the Superfund program.

IAFF members have suffered reactions from exposure to chemical wastes, Duffy testified.

The union worked with the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health following an explosion and fire at the Bern Color Co., in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., in January 1984, he said.

NIOSH analyzed the protective clothing worn by fire fighters in extinguishing the blaze at the plant which stored large numbers of chemicals used in producing dyes.

It found that many of the garments were perforated by acid burns and contaminated with chemicals. It would have been more expensive to decontaminate the clothing than to replace it, Duffy said.

It is these types of incidents that point out the need for "extensive research to be performed in the area of developing chemical protective clothing, decontamination procedures, combustion byproducts, and acute and chronic medical surveillance programs and adequate training for fire fighters," Duffy said.

Court to review state ban on firms flouting labor law

The Supreme Court will review a labor-supported Wisconsin law that bars firms that have a record of federal labor law violations from doing business with the state.

The Wisconsin law, enacted in 1981, disqualifies firms that have been found guilty of violations of the National Labor Relations Act three or more times during a five-year period, or in contempt of court for not having complied with NLRB orders. The penalty is disqualification for three years.

A company disqualified from state contracts because of its bad labor law record, Gould, Inc., argued successfully in federal district court and before the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Wisconsin had legislated in an area pre-empted by federal labor law. One of the company's arguments, accepted by the appellate court, was that the purpose of the National Labor Relations Act is remedial, not punitive, and that Wisconsin could not go beyond the federal regulatory agency to impose a punishment.

In challenging that decision and seeking Supreme Court review, Wisconsin Attorney Gen. Bronson LaFollette argued that Wisconsin has the same right as any other purchaser of goods and services to choose the companies with which it will do business.

The state's position, he said, is that it can "elect not to deal with law violators, be they organized crime, tax delinquents, or NLRA recidivists."

In another action, the Supreme Court refused to review and thus made final court rulings barring Taca International Airlines from moving its pilot base to El Salvador—thus running out on its long-standing bargaining relationship with the Air Line Pilots.

The airline, while chartered in El Salvador, has been based in New Orleans since 1949 and was once owned by TWA. The ALPA, which represents Taca's 44 pilots, both American and Salvadoran, charged the airline with seeking to use a provision of El Salvador's constitution as a union-busting tool.

Under the court order now in effect, the airline is barred from relocating the pilot base, unilaterally changing terms of employment, recruiting replacement pilots, or otherwise interfering with the pilots' choice of ALPA as bargaining agent.

Mel Barisic dies at 63, retired NMU official

New Suffolk, N.Y.—Mel Barisic, who retired as secretary-treasurer of the National Maritime Union in 1978, died May 9 after a heart attack at his home here. He was 63.

Barisic joined the NMU in 1942. He held a number of official positions with the union before he was elected secretary-treasurer in 1973.

Federation files plea to restore hearing rule

The hearing conservation amendment to the federal occupational noise standard should be reinstated, the AFL-CIO urged in a brief filed with the 4th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

The federation charged that a three-judge panel of the appeals court erred in concluding that the hearing conservation amendment impermissibly regulates non-occupational noise.

The court panel struck down the amendment last November in a precedent-setting ruling that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration exceeded its authority because the amendment's requirements are triggered whenever an employee suffers a "standard threshold shift" loss in hearing, even though such a loss may have occurred from non-occupational noise. A "standard threshold shift" in hearing ability is measured from a baseline hearing capability and represents a hearing loss of 10 decibels.

The federation's brief pointed out that OSHA has determined that workers who have already suffered a hearing loss of at least 10 decibels face even greater risks from continued exposure to high levels of workplace noise that workers whose hearing has not been impaired.

In supporting OSHA's request for a full court rehearing of the case, the AFL-CIO stressed that the "sole purpose of the hearing conservation amendment . . . is to protect workers from the hazard that is posed by workplace noise at levels of 85 dB or greater—levels which OSHA found to pose significant risk of material impairment."

The brief charged that the court panel, in striking down the entire amendment when it objected to only one part, erred in its reasoning as "nothing in the amendment has the purpose or effect of regulating conditions outside the workplace."

Import relief needed

Trade panel affirms shoe industry's plight

By Arlee C. Green

The International Trade Commission in a unanimous ruling found that the American shoe industry and its workers have been injured by the deluge of footwear imports that in March had captured more than 80 percent of the domestic market.

The ITC said it will recommend remedies next month and President Reagan will then have 60 days in which to accept, reject or modify those remedies.

"It is good news for American shoe workers that the (ITC) has recognized that the flood of imported footwear is seriously injuring our country's domestic shoe industry, and that the opportunity for effective relief measures presents itself," Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn and Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley said in a joint statement.

Quotas sought

"We are hopeful that the ITC will now recommend the five-year worldwide shoe quota we seek to help the industry and its workers survive," the statement said. The implementing of quotas would give the industry "a chance to regain its competitive strength . . . and provide many new job opportunities."

The commission's decision came just five weeks after industry, labor and congressional leaders testified in favor of quotas.

The 5-0 decision reverses the ITC's 1984 finding when it determined the industry had not been injured despite numerous plant closings. Since that time, Congress modified sections of the trade laws to clarify that plant closings specifically are to be taken into consideration in determining whether a domestic industry has been injured by imports.

Commission Chairman Paula Stern said that because of heightened plant closures, increased unemployment and diminishing profits, increased imports threaten the industry with serious injury.

Market share

The Footwear Trade Action Coalition, comprised of ACTWU, UFCW and the Footwear Industries of America, is seeking quotas which will limit imports to 55.2 percent of the U.S. market. Legislation which has been introduced in the House and Senate would write a comparable quota into law.

"We are asking for sensible controls on import levels that have gone berserk," Finley had testified at the ITC hearing last month.

George Langstaff, president of FIA, noted in expressing his relief at the ITC's ruling, that imports have risen another 13 percent so far this year. "Clearly the industry has met or exceeded all of the criteria that Congress established in setting up injury provisions for domestic industries," he said.

In March, imports captured 80.2 percent of the market and domestic footwear production dropped 25 percent below last year's severely depressed levels. Fifteen more shoe plants have closed this year, on top of the 105 closed last year. More than 13,400 shoe workers were put out of work in 1984.

House committees vote bills to strengthen civil rights law

Two House committees approved bills intended to repair the damage done to various civil rights legislation by last year's Supreme Court decision in a case involving sex discrimination in colleges helped by federal funds.

Civil rights groups and the AFL-CIO have pressed for legislation that would make clear the intent of Congress that the ban on discrimination applies to all phases of a federally aided program or activity, not just the segment directly using federal money. The Administration has argued for a more limited remedy.

Technically, the Supreme Court's February 1984 ruling in the Grove City College case involved only the interpretation of Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, which bars sex discrimination by educational institutions receiving federal assistance.

But the court's reasoning, civil rights groups stress, could be applied just as readily to various other anti-discrimination laws. Thus both the Education & Labor Committee bill and the Judiciary Committee approved legislation that would apply to laws banning discrimination on the basis of age, race or handicap as well as to the education law.

Differences between the two committee versions will confront the House when it takes up the measure. The Judiciary Committee version is closer to the standard urged by the civil rights coalition. In the highly controversial area of abortion restrictions, the two versions differ with the House version considered more restrictive.

In the last Congress, the civil rights restoration bill passed the House with strong bipartisan support but was blocked in the Senate.

sanctions against the Pretoria government. The House is expected to take up the measure again soon after its Memorial Day recess.

In testifying in support of a companion bill in the Senate, Donahue said the AFL-CIO favors the sanctions but was concerned about the failure of the bills to address the havoc wrought among South African black trade unionists by "preventive detention laws" under which many have been held without charges.

"It is not enough to bring external pressure to bear on the South African government," Donahue said. "Change must come from within. But such change will not come unless the democratic forces within South Africa—preeminently the black trade union movement—are able to organize and effectively represent the will of the majority.

"It is therefore imperative that we do all we can to remove the coercive impediments to their exercise of freedom of association.

"Measures by the Congress aimed at eliminating the preventive detention laws would be a powerful encouragement to those who are fighting on the front lines of freedom in South Africa."

The House bill, whose chief sponsor is Rep. William H. Gray III (D-Pa.), would ban loans to the South African government, prohibit any new investment in South Africa, ban the importation of South African gold krugerrands, and ban the sale of computers and parts to the South African government and corporations.

The measure permits the President, with congressional approval, to waive certain sanctions if the South African government has taken definite steps to dismantle its system of apartheid.

As of last September, U.S. banks had a total of $343 million in loans outstanding to the South African government. Currently, 26 of the nation's 100 largest banks have policies prohibiting loans to the South African public sector.

Donahue applauded the "intent, spirit and actions" of the anti-apartheid bill being considered by the Senate committee. The measure is sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and others.

Labor's position

The proposed sanctions are consonant with the positions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions on South Africa's repression of blacks, he said.

But the ICFTU and the AFL-CIO would impose additional sanctions, including an arms embargo, an end to new International Monetary Fund loans, and forced disinvestment in South Africa by all multinational companies that the independent South African black trade union movement identified as being in violation of internationally accepted labor standards.

Donahue warned against delays and loopholes that might permit South Africa to "escape the full effect of sanctions by piecemeal measures that stretch out for years the complete elimination of the apartheid system."

Black unionists, political leaders face treason trial

Johannesburg—The South African government slapped trumped up charges of treason against 16 black South African political and trade union leaders, most of them held for months under so-called preventive detention laws.

Among those charged are President Thozamille Gqweta of the South African Allied Workers Union, and Isaac Ngcobo, Sam Kikine and Sisa Ngikelana, officials of the same union.

The four unionists were among 21 black labor leaders detained without charges by the government last December.

Worldwide protest

Their arrest set off widespread protests in American cities and elsewhere, drawing the condemnation of the world's free trade unions, including the AFL-CIO and other affiliates of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

The 16 defendants are charged with advocating programs "with the overall object of creating a climate favorable . . . for bringing about a revolution," including organizing meetings "at which bellicose songs were sung, slogans chanted and speeches made."

The trial of the 15 men and one woman—all leading figures in the anti-apartheid movement—is expected to last 18 months. Treason in South Africa is punishable by hanging.

Exchanging views

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland fields questions from Liz Hrenda at a regional meeting of union members in Harrisburg, Pa. Hrenda is a past president of the Harrisburg chapter of the Coalition of Labor Union Women. Satellite meetings were also held in Johnstown, Pa., and Wilmington, Del., with the main regional conference in Cherry Hill, N.J., covering five mid-Atlantic states and the District of Columbia. Kirkland spoke on a variety of worker issues, including imports, the Reagan budget and protection of life-support benefits.

Frontlash Chairman Jessica Smith spurs protest of Reagan's subminimum wage proposal.

Youth rally demands equal pay

stressed that young people "want the opportunity to acquire jobs and skills for a better future" and a subminimum wage cannot provide those opportunities. He called the lower wage "a subminimum idea" and urged Congress to "support young people today to make America better tomorrow."

Morton pointed out that the fast food industry would be the real winner if a subminimum wage were established, because the industry would gain nearly $4 billion in three years, "while we struggle along for $2.50 an hour."

He called on the demonstrating youths to continue the fight in their home cities to "stop wage discrimination in any form." The crowd roared in agreement and took up the chant, "We deserve a break today, equal work for equal pay." Balloons were released that read "jobs and fair wages."

Other speakers—high school students from up and down the East Coast—pointed out the potential for employers to abuse the measure by firing older workers and hiring teens at $2.50 an hour. They warned that a subminimum wage now could lead to permanently lowered wages.

Speaking out

The young people were eager to speak against the measure. Yvette Rodriguez of Staten Island said a subminimum wage would be unfair because "we have to work just as hard and we should be paid the same." Rodriguez, who works at a fast food restaurant, noted the inconsistencies in Reagan's programs:

"They tell us we have to earn more money and pay our way through school, but then they want to cut our salaries."

James Atkinson of New York City said that at age 18 many young people are out of school supporting families. "They have the same responsibilities as older people, but they will make less, and that's not right."

The youth coalition sought a meeting with Labor Sec. William Brock who later indicated he would meet with the group to discuss "alternative proposals." The coalition plans to present Brock with petitions opposing the "burger bill" stuffed in a giant hamburger.

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee has taken up the issue and heard AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison's testimony opposing the subminimum wage earlier this week.

Higher floor under wages held overdue

- Does not create new jobs.
- Displaces older workers.

Various subsidies and tax inducements to persuade employers to hire disadvantaged young people haven't reduced youth unemployment, Denison stressed.

As for the argument that it will help reduce the high rate of teenage unemployment, especially among blacks, Denison termed the legislation "the wrong way to deal with the real problems of young people in terms of their needs for education, training and employment."

The "right approach," he urged, is to expand opportunities for disadvantaged youth with school-and-work programs. He cited apprenticeship outreach and Job Corps programs which unions have actively supported—but which the Administration has or is trying to eliminate. The AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute is working with unions to develop local programs to help minority youth, Denison noted.

Flawed reasoning

If reduced wages were the answer to high unemployment, he said, the "logical extension" of such flawed reasoning would be to set up a high minimum wage for white males over 20, since their unemployment rate is the lowest. Then there could be a somewhat lower minimum for white women, a still lower wage floor for Hispanics, and a bottom rate for black teenagers.

NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks reiterated his organization's opposition to a subminimum youth rate in a statement issued as the Senate hearings got under way.

The Administration is proposing a three-year trial of a youth subminimum wage. Labor Sec. William Brock testified that he couldn't say with certainty that a youth rate would increase the number of jobs. But "the idea deserves to be tested," he argued.

Denison noted that since the teenage population is dropping, youth unemployment also will be decreasing in the years ahead. That would make an experiment with a youth subminimum look successful even though it does "nothing more than cutting the wages of these young workers," Denison suggested.

Real need

He urged Congress to address the "real need" to increase the earnings of some 6 million workers employed at or near the present $3.35 minimum.

At a news conference, House Education & Labor Committee Chairman Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) served notice that the Administration will meet with a cold reception in his panel. Chicago Mayor Harold Washington joined Hawkins in attacking the subminimum plan and disassociated himself from other black mayors who have endorsed it.

Later, at a hearing called by the panel's Employment Opportunities subcommittee, Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees and economist Sar Levitan challenged the contention that a subminimum wage will expand job opportunities.

Hardships seen from closing local social security offices

The Reagan Administration's scheme to close more than half of the Social Security Administration's 1,340 offices and cut the agency's staff by more than 17,000 workers will cause extreme hardships for many elderly people, the Government Employees warned at congressional hearings.

AFGE, which represents some 70,000 SSA field office workers, urged the Senate Appropriations Committee to block the shutdowns.

Gayla Reiter, an 18-year employee of SSA and president of AFGE Local 3172 in San Francisco, told the panel that the closing of 770 offices "will not result in any appreciable savings to the taxpayer, but it will be very costly in terms of our agency's ability to provide good service."

Reiter pointed out that "not only will the elderly, disabled and disadvantaged suffer the hardship of traveling long distances to get to social security offices, their ability to resolve problems by phone would be taken away as well because all Teleservice centers would be closed too."

The Administration's campaign to shut down SSA field offices gets its impetus from the 1984 Grace Commission report that recommended the closing of some 843 field offices, along with 33 teleservice centers and all 3,476 contact and resident stations, Reiter testified.

Gayla Reiter

Early this year, SSA issued a directive that district or branch offices with fewer than 10 employees be either closed or downgraded to resident stations—one or two person operations that are not open full time.

Offices with fewer than 16 workers are also listed as probable candidates for elimination as are offices with less than 25 employees, if they are within 25 miles of a regional center.

Rep. Edward Roybal (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, earlier this year released a list of nearly 800 SSA offices that could close under the agency's directive.

The Administration's claims that it can make the cutbacks over a five-year period without reducing service or laying off workers was branded by Reiter as "baloney."

'Life blood'

She stressed that the President's budget for SSA "strikes at the very life blood of federal employees." Reiter said the union has seen "conscientious employees leaving our agency with 15-25 years of service who no longer are able to endure the deplorable working conditions combined with the unjust and unfair treatment. Their experience and expertise are not readily replaced."

Reiter cited SSA's track record of spending less than 2 percent of its budget on administration, while maintaining a payment accuracy rate of 99.6 percent.

She said that Rep. Roybal had decried the proposed cutbacks in noting that, "If a 20-percent reduction in staff results in just a 2-percent increase in the overpayment rate, there would be a $3.75-billion increase in overpayments in 1986 alone. That's 150 percent of the total amount needed to administer all of the social security programs last year."

Reiter said that cuts of some 3,000 SSA workers already made by the Administration caused backlogs in processing of claims resulting in longer delays for the elderly and increased pressure on the workers.

Senate reforms urged in scrutiny of nominations

The AFL-CIO and other concerned groups are urging the Senate Judiciary Committee to set up more rigorous screening procedures for judicial nominations, many of which are for lifetime appointments.

Labor's concern was expressed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in a letter to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

Kirkland said the need for a more careful scrutiny of nominees was made clear by the belated disclosures involving Marianne Mele Hall, whose nomination to a lifetime post as chairman of the Copyright Tribunal was routinely approved by the committee and confirmed by the Senate.

Hall subsequently resgined after it was disclosed that a book she co-authored contained blatantly offensive language about blacks.

The NAACP Legal Defense & Education Fund and other organizations have proposed a two-step procedural reform: that there be at least a 30-day interval between the date a nomination is submitted to the Senate and the confirmation hearing, and that both the majority and minority members of the committee have sufficient staff investigators for a thorough scrutiny.

Unions, which are closely regulated by federal law, share this "concern about the patent inadequacy of the current judicial screening system," Kirkland wrote Thurmond.

Brock keeps Labor Dept. offices open

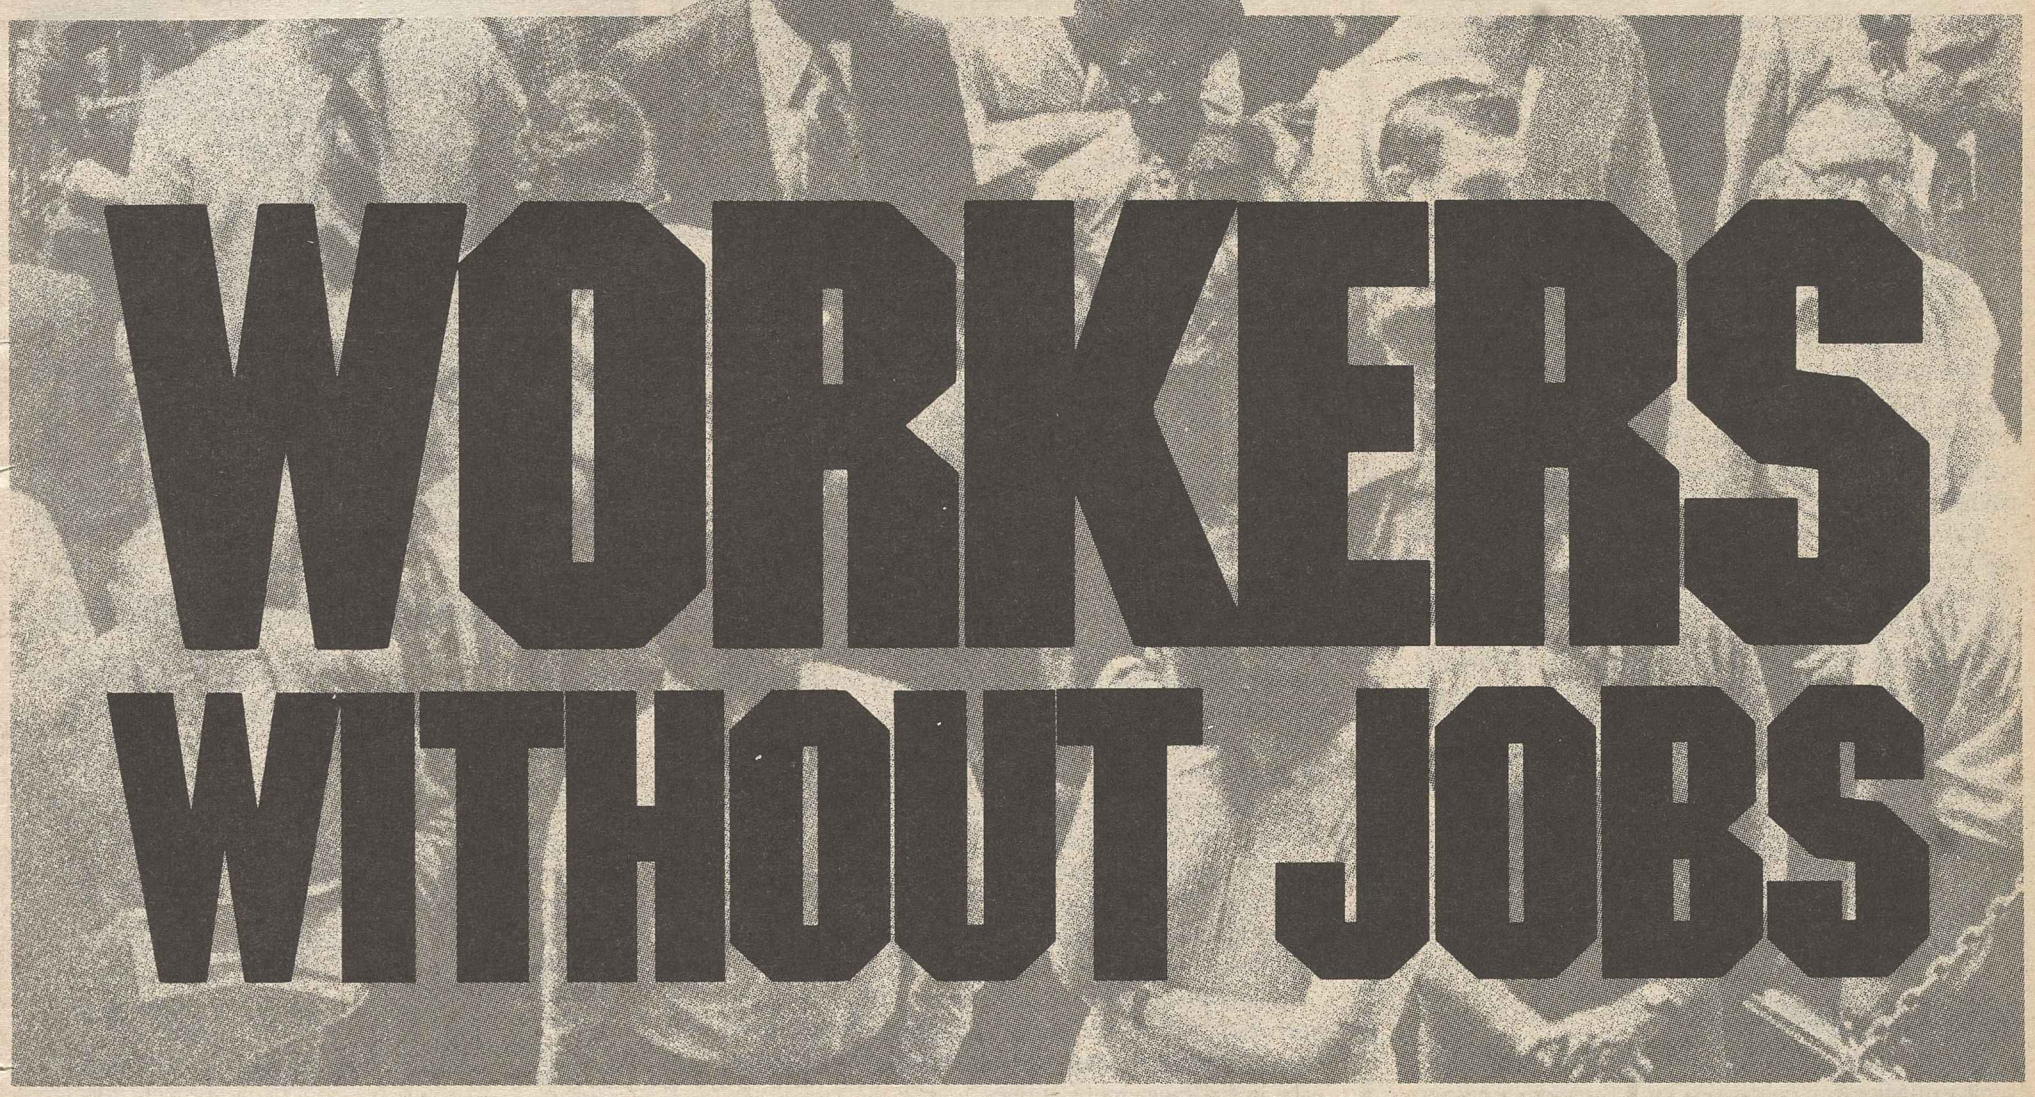
The Labor Dept. will keep all 10 of its regional offices in operation next year, dropping plans to eliminate Boston, Kansas City and Seattle as regional centers.

Labor Sec. William E. Brock, responding to widespread protests, reversed the budget decision and said he had concluded "after a thorough review" that the closings were "not justifiable."



The Government Employees, which, along with state and local central bodies in the regions affected, had strongly protested the closings, welcomed the reversal —and especially Brock's explanation.

The budget explanation for the planned shutdowns was that it would save $10 million and eliminate an estimated 196 jobs.

But Brock said that "after a thorough review," he had concluded that "in terms of costs versus benefits, such a closure is not justifiable."

The services and enforcement activities provided by the regional centers — "on employment standards, worker safety and occupational health among others"—are too vital to the public to be cut back, Brock concluded.

WORKERS WITHOUT JOBS

By Markley Roberts

Suppose you take the population of New York City, Chicago, and Los Angeles. That's about 13 million people.

Then add in the population of Atlanta, New Orleans, Pittsburgh and Boston. That's another 2 million, raising the grand total to 15 million.

Now imagine those 15 million people — who might include you — without jobs or working part-time because there are no full-time jobs.

This gives you some idea of the real size of America's big, forgotten, ignored economic problem — persistent, high unemployment in the midst of relative affluence.

It's much too easy to forget, to ignore America's unemployed men and women. They seldom demonstrate in front of TV cameras. They are not filling our newspapers with protests against economic policies which wrongly use unemployment to fight inflation.

If you have a job yourself, if you have a regular income to support yourself and your family, if you are worrying about your mortgage payments and the children's dental bills, it's hard, isn't it, to think about 15 million fellow Americans with lost jobs and lost income.

If there were a flood or natural disaster that wiped out the economic livelihoods of millions of people, we might be more sympathetic.

If we lived in an unemployment disaster community like Waterloo, Iowa, or the Texas Golden Triangle or Gary, Ind., or Butte, Mont., we would be very sympathetic — and we might worry about our own jobs and income.

But if you spread 15 million workers who need jobs or full-time earnings across the U.S.A., they seem to disappear among the 115 million people in the labor force. They become less visible, less demanding of our attention, less a challenge to the nation's conscience. They are more easy to forget and to ignore.

Markley Roberts is an economist in the AFL-CIO Department of Economic Research. Information on various high unemployment areas came from AFL-CIO state and local central bodies and Community Services representatives.

UNEMPLOYMENT CRISIS

But unemployment is still high.

In spite of two so-called recovery years in 1983 and 1984 — following the two Reagan recession disaster years of 1981 and 1982 — unemployment is still at persistent, painful, high, disaster levels in 1985.

Unemployment has stuck at these high levels since May 1984. The April 1985 unemployment rate of 7.3 percent — after two years of "recovery" — was higher than the highest unemployment in three of the eight post-World War II recessions.

Workers without jobs numbered 8.4 million in April 1985, according to official statistics on unemployment.

But the official statistics understate the real crisis impact of unemployment.

To get a more realistic view, we must add 1.3 million "discouraged workers" who have dropped out of the labor force because they can't find jobs that don't exist. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports "discouraged workers" on a quarterly basis, but does not include them in official unemployment.

We must also add in 5.7 million part-time workers who want full-time jobs and full-time paychecks but can find only part-time jobs. These "involuntary part-time" workers represent "underemployment" or "partial unemployment."

But these numbers don't give you the full extent of human suffering and social costs associated with unemployment.

In fact, that 15 million-plus total for the unemployed is a snapshot picture, a partial report on unemployment. If we look at a moving picture, we find many more millions of American workers and their families have suffered lost jobs, lost income, lost security, and lost dignity during the last four years.

Jobseekers still outnumber available jobs by 10 to 1, up from a 5-to-1 ratio in the late 1970s and a 2-to-1 ratio in the 1960s.

In 1981 there were 23 million workers who suffered unemployment at some point during the year — 20 percent of all persons in the labor force during 1981.

In 1982 more than 26 million workers — 22 percent of all persons in the labor force — were hit by unemployment some time during the year.

In 1983 there were 24 million workers with a period of joblessness, 20 percent of all persons who worked or looked for work during the year.

The official figures for 1984 won't be available until late in 1985, but it is likely that 1984 will show 22 to 24 million workers hit by unemployment during the year.

And the record for 1985 won't be much better.

HEALTH AND SOCIAL COSTS

But these numbers don't show the full extent of human suffering and social costs associated with unemployment.

Unemployment is a killer.

In the work of Professor Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University School of Hygiene and Public Health, we have measures of the impact of unemployment on health and social breakdown.

Prof. Brenner found that a 1 percent sustained rise in unemployment was responsible for 4.1 percent more suicides, 3.4 percent more state mental hospital admissions, 4 percent more prison admissions, 5.7 percent more homicides, 1.9 percent more deaths from cirrhosis of the liver, cardiovascular or kidney disease five years later.

The Joint Economic Committee pointed out that these figures understate the eventual total long-term impact of a 1 percent rise in unemployment. This understatement is particularly significant for cardiovascular, renal and cirrhosis diseases which typically require many years to be even diagnosed.

Furthermore, these figures understate the negative health impact of unemployment because they include only liver or heart disease deaths. They do not count persons treated for these diseases when the disease did not result in death.

These shocking results were presented in another manner by Prof. Brenner. He found that a sustained 1.4 percent increase in unemployment was directly responsible for 51,570 deaths, including 26,440 heart disease deaths, 1,740 homicides, and 1,540 suicides. This rise in unemployment was also directly responsible for 7,660 additional state prison admissions and 5,520 state mental hospital admissions.

ECONOMIC COSTS

Unemployment is costly.

Waste of human and material resources on a stupendous scale occurs when millions of Americans can't find jobs.

For every 1 percent of unemployment, America loses at least $100 billion in unproduced goods and services, and the federal treasury loses $30 billion in lost tax revenue and extra welfare and unemployment compensation payments.

Sickness and death resulting from unemployment have big economic costs as well as human costs and personal tragedy.

Lost income is one measure of the economic costs of sickness and death resulting from unemployment. Direct medical costs for unemployment-related sickness should also be included.

In the case of prison and mental hospital admissions, a similar process can be used to count lost or foregone income due to incarceration or hospitalization plus direct outlays for prison or patient maintenance.

Prof. Brenner found a total economic loss of $6.6 billion due to the 1.4 percent rise in unemployment sustained from 1960 to 1975. This included losses of $1.4 billion associated with health and circulatory disease deaths, $434 million associated with homicides, $82 million associated with suicides, $82 million associated with mental hospital admissions, and $210 million associated with prison admissions.

Of course, these dollar amounts didn't include millions of dollars spent for admissions to federal prison and mental institutions and they didn't include billions of dollars spent for unemployment insurance and welfare payments to help jobless workers and their families.

A key finding of Prof. Brenner's recent research is that the adverse health and mortality effects of unemployment don't show up until three to five years after the recession low point, and it often takes up to 10 years or longer for the full negative health and mortality effects.

We know there are a lot more economic costs to workers and their families.

For example, many workers without jobs can't keep up mortgage payments and lose their homes. In late 1984 there were 62,500 mortgage foreclosures. Even in a two-earner family one person losing a job often leaves family income too low to meet mortgage payments.

And loss of job-related health benefits can devastate a family hit by serious health problems.

MICHIGAN FINDINGS

Dr. Jeanne Prial Gordus and Sean McAlinden of the University of Michigan confirmed Prof. Brenner's findings, reviewed other studies, and added further dimensions to studies of the very serious effects of high unemployment on physical and mental health and social breakdown.

In the 1984 Gordus report to the Joint Economic Committee, these findings were established:

- The suicide rate for adult males is positively and significantly correlated with cyclical unemployment.
- Death rates for men aged 45 to 64 years from cerebrovascular and cardiovascular disease peak slightly more than a year after the unemployment rate peaks.
- The unemployment rate is positively and significantly associated with mental hospital admissions and imprisonment after an appropriate lag.
- Life events (like death of a spouse and divorce) and stress associated with negative life events are predictors of subsequent illness.
- Life events are positively correlated with the unemployment rate.
- Job loss is strongly associated with depression, anxiety, aggression, insomnia, loss of self-esteem, and marital problems.
- Spouses of unemployed workers show psychiatric symptoms subsequent to job loss somewhat later than those reported by the unemployed partner.
- In a situation where many people have been laid off, increased job responsibilities for those who remain employed are positively associated with gastrointestinal problems, increased hypertension, more frequent illness, increased anxiety, and insomnia.

Thus, the Gordus report conclusions confirm the finding that "external economic forces are influential in altering health and behavior.

"We believe, based on the data presented, that rises in unemployment act to reduce social support, self-esteem, and resistance to disease for the unemployed, their families, members of the communities and, often, those remaining in a highly stressed workplace.

"We favor strongly those arguments that identify economic deprivation and some psychological and physiological responses as strong aggravators of the stress imposed by unemployment and economic change.

"Moreover, as the unemployment rate rises higher, those laid off are increasingly those of higher socioeconomic status and have more to lose. Despite higher initial levels of resources, these individuals are very likely to suffer from economic adversity during prolonged unemployment. This economic deprivation may continue as the newly unemployed lose occupational status by skidding down through the labor market.

"The evidence we have analyzed overwhelmingly supports the contention that the unemployment rate is the most powerful external variable explaining the difference in findings among studies.

"Those studies undertaken at times when unemployment ranged around 4 percent and where respondents became reemployed within 15-20 weeks, show few negative outcomes. In contrast, research undertaken when rates of unemployment were high, and when reemployment took 10 months or more, shows more negative results for individuals."

GARY-EAST CHICAGO, IND.

In January 1984 there were 49,000 jobs in the steel mills of Gary and East Chicago in Northwest Indiana. At the end of the year in December there were only 38,300 of these jobs left, a loss of almost 11,000 jobs in one year.

Unemployment in the Northwest Indiana counties of Lake and Porter is up over 16 percent — so one of every six workers is without a job. And only one of every four jobless workers in Indiana gets unemployment compensation benefits.

Job search programs for displaced workers are overloaded. At one point last year Inland Steel Co. estimated that more than 16,000 people were eligible for job search help but only 760 people could be helped with the money available.

The food stamp program of Lake County is overloaded. And Lake County is having so much trouble meeting its obligations to the townships which administer relief to the poor and needy that the county has issued more than $30 million of relief and welfare bonds. This is exhausting the county's bonding authority.

The county's financial squeeze is aggravated by the plant closings which have cut the assessed value of the county by 10 percent in the last two years.

Thousands of unemployed workers and their families in Northwest Indiana are getting health care services under various local programs. The Gary Community Mental Health Center is administering one major program which recognizes the stress and anxiety of people who lose their jobs. Unemployment is causing serious physical damage as well as damage to mental and emotional health, according to Gary mental health center experts.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.

Lost jobs, business bankruptcies, declining school population, and high unemployment are a few of the key indicators of the weakened economy of Charleston, W. Va.

In 1979, two-thirds of AFL-CIO building and construction trades workers in the area were employed. In 1984, two-thirds were unemployed.

Over the past five years, the number of non-farm jobs in the greater Charleston area — including Kanawha and Putnam counties — has gone down by 10 percent, from 130,100 to 117,900. Unemployment in this coal area has gone up by almost 100 percent, from 5,100 to 10,100 jobless workers. Only 31 percent of West Virginia's unemployed workers are getting unemployment compensation benefits.

The Full Employment Action Council estimates "real" unemployment in the Charleston metropolitan area — including discouraged and underemployed workers — at 28 percent, far above the horrendous official unemployment rate of 15 percent.

Business bankruptcies were up to 484 in 1984. Well-established downtown department stores, restaurants, and specialty shops have closed their doors. Traffic in downtown Charleston is down so much that one lane of traffic has been diverted to free, on-street parking.

There are fewer children in Kanawha county schools. Over the past five years the number of school children has dropped from 43,000 to 38,000.

Mortgage defaults have gone up and home construction has gone down. Home construction permits in 1984 were 50 percent below the 1979 level.

BEAUMONT/PORT ARTHUR/ ORANGE, TEX.

Oil refinery layoffs and shutdowns and job losses in shipbuilding and off-shore drilling have brought disaster to the "golden triangle" of Beaumont, Port Arthur, and Orange, Tex.

In December 1981 there were 39,000 jobs in this area. Since that time there has been a 32 percent job loss, a drop of 12,600 jobs.

Personal bankruptcies have gone up in the area and the number of homes for sale doubled in 1984.

There are 2,700 workers in the area who are currently getting unemployment compensation benefits, but there are many thousands more whose unemployment benefits have run out. Only 25 percent of jobless workers in Texas are now getting unemployment compensation.

The John Gray Institute of Lamar University in Beaumont estimates unemployment at 19 percent in Port Arthur, 17 percent in Orange, and 11 percent in Beaumont.

The AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute is operating a "displaced worker" assistance program in the "golden triangle" jointly with the Texas Employment Commission. HRDI is working with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Electrical Workers, and Office & Professional Employees to plan services for Texaco refinery workers and other area workers laid off earlier this year.

SOCIAL COSTS OF ECONOMIC CHANGE

"In conclusion," the Gordus reports states, "the evidence for a social causation approach to the connections between macroeconomic change and social pathologies is particularly strong in periods of high unemployment. The data support the argument that these high rates of unemployment provoke very serious consequences in terms of mortality, illness, and social deviance."

The findings of Prof. Brenner and the findings of the Gordus report indicate that national economic policy has big and serious implications for life, death, sickness and health, crime, divorce and child abuse, alcoholism and drug abuse, juvenile delinquency, and other characteristics of social breakdown.

"In recent years," the Gordus report notes, "the national economic experience has been one of increasingly severe swings in activity, highlighted by the almost unprecedented decline of major basic industries and the rise of new nontraditional types of economic endeavor.

"This pattern of radical economic change has resulted and will continue to result in the traumatic displacement and uprooting of hundreds of thousands of Americans and their families.

"For many, the personal struggle to adapt to a new set of social and economic circumstances that may bring about substantial hardship, without the promise of sufficient outside help, may prove overwhelming, and even dangerous to life itself.

"That is why an increased knowledge, not only of the extent of this ongoing loss of national well-being, but also of the process through which it comes about, is necessary and crucial if policymakers can take steps to ensure that the social costs of the coming of the post-industrial society do not exceed its potential benefits."

HIDDEN SCARS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The International Labor Organization's 1985 Encyclopedia of Health and Safety deals with mental and physical health problems of unemployment in a number of articles.

"Unemployment leaves scars which remain even after reemployment in terms of irreparable damage to self-confidence and self-esteem," the encyclopedia concludes.

In a general overview of the health effects of unemployment, the ILO encyclopedia notes that much of the human response to unemployment is hidden and even goes unrecognized when it surfaces in the form of long-lasting physical and mental disorders.

The longer that unemployment continues, the more likely the unemployed worker is to develop passive or anti-social behavior, with sickness as a frequent unconscious way of justifying unemployment, especially for those, the majority, who blame themselves for being out of work.

Unemployment produces insecurity and anxiety and a sense of powerlessness. In a money-for-work society, a person's job all too often defines a person's existence, identity, social status, and self-esteem.

One major tragedy of unemployment is that individual workers tend to blame themselves for unemployment. Workers who lose their jobs often feel a sense of personal inadequacy, guilt, and grief, blaming themselves instead of blaming their employers for the layoff, instead of blaming the economic policies of government policymakers, instead of blaming the lack of rational economic policy to prevent widespread job loss.

Communities hit by major layoffs and plant closings are part of the devastation from unemployment.

The crisis may stem from recession and depressed markets. It may be the result of a flood of imports or a loss of export markets due to an overvalued dollar. It may reflect changing demand for energy sources like coal or oil. It may reflect changing technology or a shifting structure of demand. It may reflect American business firms' search for cheap labor overseas.

Whatever the cause, for every production job that disappears, there are another two or three service jobs in the community that are adversely affected. So job losses ripple out through a local community.

Loss of significant portions of the community's tax base occurs when plants shut down and workers move away. This loss of resources weakens the community's ability to attract new residents and new employers.

BUTTE/ANACONDA, MONT.

The mining towns of Anaconda and Butte reflect decay and transition in the entire Montana economy. Thousands of displaced workers have dropped out of the state's labor force. Official statistics don't reflect large pockets of serious unemployment.

During the years 1979 through 1983, Montana lost 9,600 jobs in mining, manufacturing, and contract construction and gained 3,100 jobs in the service sector.

The lost jobs paid $10.65 to $14.61 an hour. The new jobs pay an average of $6.67 an hour. More and more women are the "breadwinners" in families of jobless copper mine and smelter workers.

When Anaconda Copper Company closed down its Anaconda smelter, city officials estimated 80 percent of all jobs in the area were indirectly affected by loss of 1,000 smelter jobs. Laid-off workers first used up savings and sold personal possessions before turning to social service agencies for help.

In Butte, 2,800 mining jobs have been lost over the past five years and service sector jobs have increased by 2,000. In the Butte-Silver Bow area, city and county tax revenues have dropped 25 to 50 percent.

Are there jobs on the land for displaced workers? A 1984 survey of Montana's farmers and ranchers found that 45 percent think they will be out of business within five years under current economic conditions.

MOBILE, ALA.

One of eight workers in Mobile, Ala., is without a job, according to official statistics. But a more realistic estimate which includes "hidden unemployment" would find one of every five workers unemployed.

Conservative official statistics report more than 30,000 workers to be unemployed, and 7,000 of these have used up all their unemployment compensation benefits. Only 27 percent of Alabama's jobless workers now get unemployment compensation.

One result of high and persistent unemployment in Mobile is a 200 percent increase in requests to local United Way agencies for help to needy families and individuals. Catholic social services and the Salvation Army, for example, helped more than 51,000 families and individuals in 1984. More than 24,000 households were getting food stamps in October 1984.

A "loaves and fishes" kitchen served an average of 214 people a day in 1984, a 22 percent increase over 1983. Food banks distributed 1.3 million pounds of food in 1984, an 80 percent increase over the previous year. Food stamps worth $3.7 million went to 24,000 households in 1984.

The Red Cross in Mobile started a newspaper column in 1984 to bring together needy people with social service organizations and individuals who can help them. Voluntary charities don't have the resources to deal with hundreds of needy people described in the Red Cross column.

WATERLOO, IOWA

The crisis in America's farm belt has hit Waterloo hard. High interest rates and tight credit are pushing more and more farmers off the land.

One of every seven workers in the Waterloo-Cedar Falls area is without a job. Only one of three jobless workers in Iowa is getting unemployment insurance benefits. Local union officials say official unemployment statistics fall far short of the tragic realities of unemployment.

Farm equipment makers like the John Deere company have laid off thousands of workers, including more than 6,000 in the Waterloo-Black Hawk County area.

Few jobs are left at the Rath meatpacking plant which once employed more than 1,500 workers. Rath is now fighting for its life through "the perils of Pauline" in bankruptcy proceedings as workers and the community try to keep the company operating and to save jobs.

The machinist and auto unions in this area have lost thousands of members. Carpenters, electrical workers, ironworkers, plumbers, and sheet metal workers unions have more members out-of-area and out-of-state than remaining in the area.

One Iowa labor official sees a "concerted, orchestrated effort to weaken the unions and phase them out here." This view was supported by a Waterloo newspaper story that "the relative absence of organized labor" was a key factor in attracting new industry.

To help the jobless, the needy, the hungry, local community action projects are providing food, fuel, shelter, and clothing. The Cedar Valley Food Bank helped 4,300 households with 12,500 people and provided food for 159,000 meals in the last half of 1984. Operation Threshold channeled $1.8 million in energy aid to 6,200 low-income households last year during the cold winter months.

With no hope of finding a job in the local community, unemployed workers often uproot themselves and their families and roam the nation in search of a job elsewhere, leaving behind the old, the disabled, the less mobile, who find themselves living in decaying ghost towns.

Both the people who leave and the people who stay suffer psychological and social stress as they lose contact with friends and relatives and familiar social support systems.

In the boxes with this article, you will find brief accounts of some of the nation's hardest hit communities. Each of these communities has its own special history and its own special problems.

But don't forget there are a lot more than these six communities with very serious unemployment problems. The U.S. Dept. of Labor has classified more than 1,800 communities as "labor surplus areas" with unemployment over 10 percent.

All too many communities are in crisis.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE UNEMPLOYED

Who are the unemployed?

One of every 15 workers is officially without a job in early 1985, according to the monthly report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics — an official unemployment rate of 7.3 percent in April 1985.

But one of every eight workers — 12.9 percent — was suffering from job loss or lost earnings as a result of the widespread impact of unemployment. This perspective takes into account discouraged workers and involuntary part-time workers.

Men aged 20 years and over are 44 percent of the jobless total.

Women aged 20 years and over are 38 percent.

Young people aged 16 to 19 years are 18 percent of the unemployed.

Most jobless workers are white — 74 percent. Of the 8.4 million workers officially unemployed, 6.3 million are white.

Black workers unemployed numbered 1.9 million in early 1985, about 22 percent of total official unemployment.

Hispanic origin workers without jobs numbered 750,000, about 9 percent of total official unemployment, which indicates some overlap with other categories.

Black, Hispanic, and teenage workers have particularly high unemployment. For blacks, the jobless rate was 15 percent. For Hispanics, the jobless rate was 10 percent. For white workers, the jobless rate was 6.2 percent. For all teenagers, the unemployment rate was 18 percent, but for black teenagers the unemployment rate was 42 percent.

Over the course of a year, one-third of black men and one-fourth of black women experience at least one spell of unemployment. By contrast, only one-sixth of white workers experienced a spell of unemployment, according to the BLS work experience report for 1983.

By industry, unemployment is worst in construction, mining, and agriculture. By occupation, unemployment is worst among construction laborers and skilled construction trades workers. Factory workers, machine operators and assemblers also have high rates of unemployment.

Teenagers, blacks, and women suffer particularly from the "partial unemployment" of involuntary, part-time work schedules. This "partial unemployment" — concentrated more and more in the service-producing sector of the U.S. economy — is sensitive to the ups and downs of the business cycle.

DISCOURAGED WORKERS

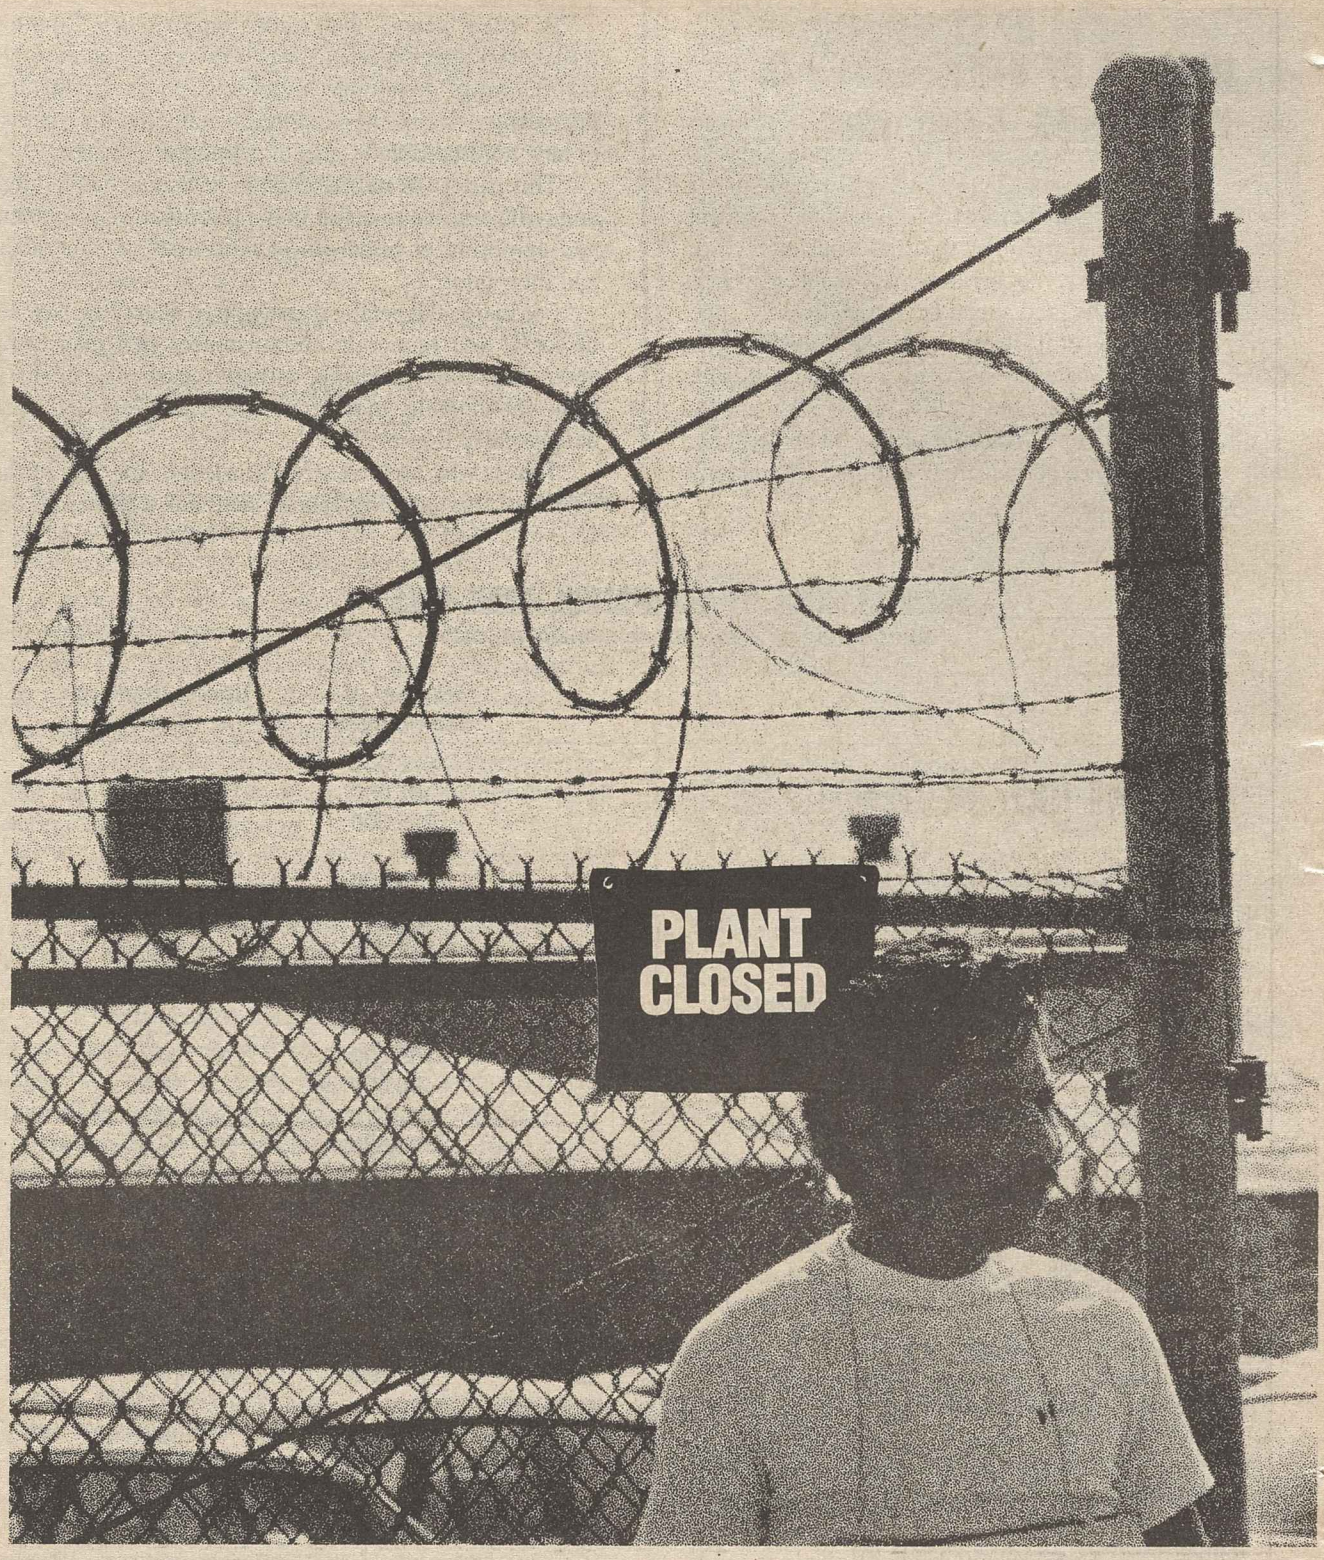
Is it any wonder that long-term jobless workers get discouraged and stop looking for a job?



In Gary, there are 96 industrial workers seeking work for each available job. In Toledo, Ohio, the ratio is 138 to 1. And in Youngstown, Ohio, the ratio is 171 to 1, according to a 1984 Labor Dept. report.

These situations help to explain the "discouraged worker" who wants a job now but is not looking for work because he (or more likely, she) believes there is no job available in the worker's line of work or in the community.

In 1984 the number of discouraged workers averaged 1.3 million, nearly 40 percent more than at the beginning of the 1980s. Two-thirds of all discouraged workers are women. Only among discouraged teenagers do males outnumber females.

Whites made up 64 percent of all discouraged workers in 1984 and blacks were 32 percent. Hispanics (overlapping with the other categories) were 7 percent of discouraged workers.

Young people aged 16 to 24 years make up about a third of discouraged workers. Fifty-five percent are aged 25 to 59 years and workers 60 and over make up about 14 percent of all discouraged workers.

One of every seven workers displaced from a job held three years or more — and one of every four displaced women workers — dropped out of the labor force. A quarter of those who did continue to look for work were still jobless three years later, according to a 1985 Bureau of Labor Statistics report on displaced workers.

Discouraging? Of course.

PLANT CLOSINGS, DISLOCATED WORKERS

Plant closings and major layoffs continue to displace thousands of workers and hit some local communities with particularly high unemployment.

The 1985 BLS study found that 11.5 million workers lost their jobs during the five years January 1979 to January 1984 as the result of plant shutdowns, the moving of a plant or company, slack work, or the abolishing of a position or shift.

To get workers with a relatively stable work history, the BLS study focused only on workers with a minimum of three years on the job.

Of the 5.1 million "dislocated workers" permanently displaced from their jobs, 40 percent were still without jobs in January 1984.

Of the 3.1 million workers who found jobs, nearly half were earning less than in their former jobs even though in many cases years had passed. Two-thirds of those with lower earnings had taken pay cuts of 20 percent or more.

The older the displaced worker, the less likely the worker was to be reemployed.

The reasons for large-scale job loss and high, local community unemployment vary. Some communities are hit by plant shutdowns and mass layoffs. Others are in areas of long-term structural distress.

Local crisis areas also are the result of adverse effects from trade, inner-city deterioration, farm economy troubles, and mine shutdowns in remote mining communities.

Private charities in these areas are often overwhelmed and simply cannot meet human needs. In these areas of high unemployment, workers and their families are particularly injured by federal budget cutbacks and restrictions in unemployment insurance benefits and eligibility as well as cuts in food stamps, welfare, and health programs.

The boxes that appear with this article describe specific examples of local problems in several hard-hit communities.

AUTO INDUSTRY LAYOFFS

A 1985 report on workers laid off by General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler indicates some of the serious problem faced by these workers.

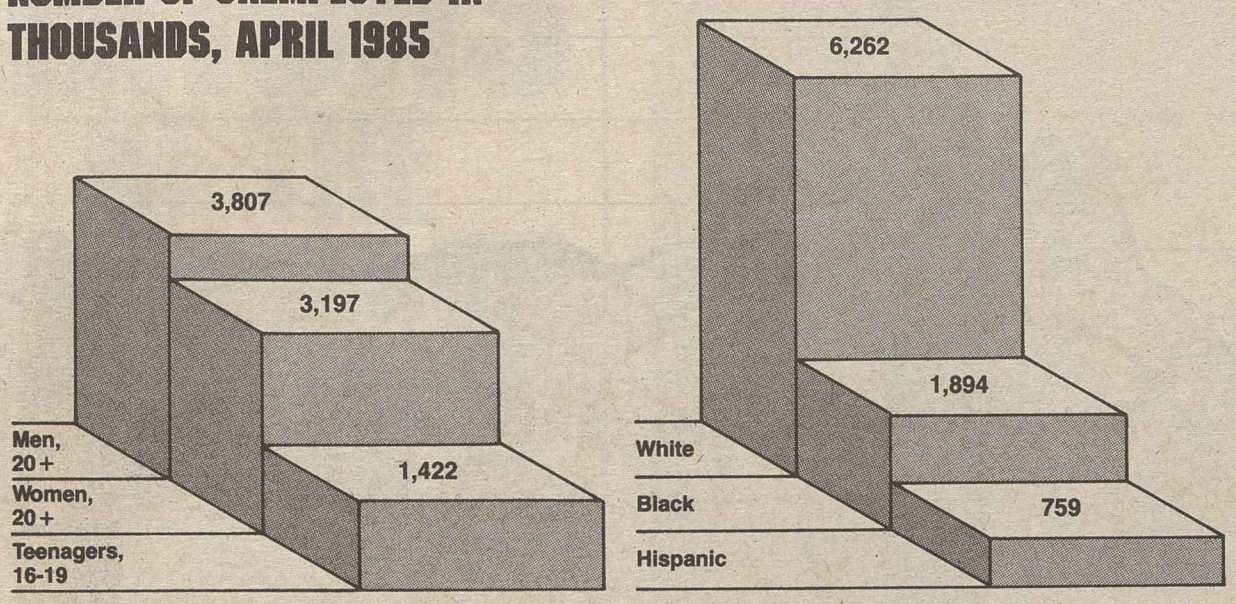
The report by the Social Welfare Research Institute of Boston College found the average length of each auto worker's longest layoff period was 66 weeks, with one of five of these workers suffering unemployment for periods of two or more years.

Of the low-seniority workers (one to five years on the job), 38 percent held no job of any kind from 1979 to the time they were interviewed in 1984.

By the last month of layoff, personal income of these auto workers had fallen 61 percent — from an average of $336 to $132 a week — and 68 percent said they were prepared to accept any job.

Seventy percent of the workers spent one-third or more of their savings while on layoff; 43 percent used up all their savings; and 23 percent missed mortgage payments or rent payments as a result of layoff.

Seventy-five percent looked for work during layoff, but only 21 percent were able to find a job at some time during their layoff. Those who found jobs had been laid off an average of two years. Their income had dropped 90 percent. The jobs they found were part-time, paid an average of $5.62, and generally paid no benefits.



One of every four laid-off auto workers lost all family health care insurance as a result of layoff. And one of every six workers who did not seek medical care during the layoff period did not do so because of financial hardship.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Long-term unemployment is a serious problem for millions of workers who have lost eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits.

In early 1985, the average duration of joblessness was 16 weeks. But 2.4 million workers or 28 percent of all officially unemployed workers had been out of work for 15 weeks or more. And 1.3 million workers or 16 percent of the officially jobless had been out of work for 27 weeks or more.

In 1984 a monthly average of 8.5 million workers were officially unemployed, but only 2.9 million of these unemployed were getting unemployment insurance (UI) benefits of any kind.

In other words, UI benefits went to only one of every three workers who are counted as officially unemployed and to none of the discouraged workers.

By contrast, in 1975 and 1976, during the worst previous recession since World War II, three of every four jobless workers were getting UI benefits.

Unfortunately, Federal Supplemental Compensation for hundreds of thousands of long-term jobless workers was cut off on Mar. 31, 1985.

Since other extended benefits beyond regular UI benefits are "triggered" only by the insured unemployment rate — which is far below the official total unemployment rate — millions of long-term unemployed workers are going without UI assistance.

Other federal actions in recent years, particularly high interest rates charged to states borrowing from the federal UI trust fund, have forced many states to tighten eligibility rules, shorten duration of payments, and cut the size of the payments.

Fewer jobless workers are getting UI benefits. Benefits don't last as long. And UI payments are far less adequate to meet basic needs than ever before.

The nation's unemployment insurance system certainly needs an overhaul with strengthened financing, a decent level of benefits, and adequate protection for the long-term jobless.

The basic position of the AFL-CIO calls for:

- Federal minimum benefit standards.
- Removal of harsh eligibility and disqualification provisions.
- Increased benefit amounts and duration periods.
- A permanent program of federal supplemental benefits.
- Elimination of triggers, or at least use of the total unemployment rate as the basis for triggering.
- Establishing a system of reinsurance.
- A taxable wage base at least 65 percent of the average annual wage.
- Flexibility in repayment of loans to state UI trust funds during recessions and periods of high unemployment.
- Elimination of the regressive system of experience-rating.

HEALTH CARE FOR THE JOBLESS

Most workers and their families lose health care protection when the worker loses his or her job. The situation gets worse the longer the worker is without a job.

In most states, Medicaid asset tests are so restrictive that jobless workers must sell their cars and most of their personal belongings to qualify. As a result, very few families of the unemployed can resort to Medicaid as a health care option.

In 1984, the House of Representatives passed a bill providing some health care for jobless workers and their families, but the Reagan Administration opposed the bill, and the Senate refused to pass it.

The U.S.A. is the only industrialized country in the world — with the exception of South Africa — that denies access to health care to workers and their families when the workers are unemployed. With more than 8 million American workers still unemployed, there is a continuing need for such a program.

AFL-CIO PROGRAM

There are no simple and easy solutions to the difficult problems of job creation in a high unemployment economy. Faster economic growth is necessary. Both private sector and public sector actions are necessary. Much can be done through collective bargaining. But the federal government has a key role.

The AFL-CIO over the years has spelled out a comprehensive set of programs to attack the nation's problem of high unemployment:

- National economic policies aimed at full employment, in line with the mandate of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Economic Growth Act.
- To reduce the job deficit, the central focus of the nation's fiscal, monetary, trade, employment and training

WORKERS SUFFERING JOB AND INCOME LOSS

April 1985

Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics

policies must aim at reducing the present unacceptable unemployment levels.

■ To encourage economic growth, the Federal Reserve Board should strive to lower interest rates rather than single-mindedly targeting the rate of growth of the money supply.

■ To protect jobless workers and their families, Congress should enact a permanent unemployment insurance program for long-term unemployed workers. In addition, Congress should enact special legislation to provide unemployed workers with health care protection and mortgage and rental relief.

■ To meet the special problems of workers and communities affected by plant closures, Congress should enact plant closing legislation. Advance notice will help workers plan for alternative means of dealing with the threat, and appropriate compensation would cushion the impact.

■ Job creating community development with federal funds to put jobless workers directly on local government payrolls.

■ Accelerated public works as an investment in the infrastructure to raise the nation's productivity.

■ Human resource and productivity development through better education, training, retraining, upgrading, and upward mobility opportunities for all workers, both employed and unemployed.

■ To prepare displaced workers and young people for jobs, retain and strengthen national job-training programs; provide training opportunities for displaced workers, and help young people in the existing Job Corps centers and in a new youth employment program.

■ Anti-discrimination protections to help women, black, Hispanic, and other minority workers.

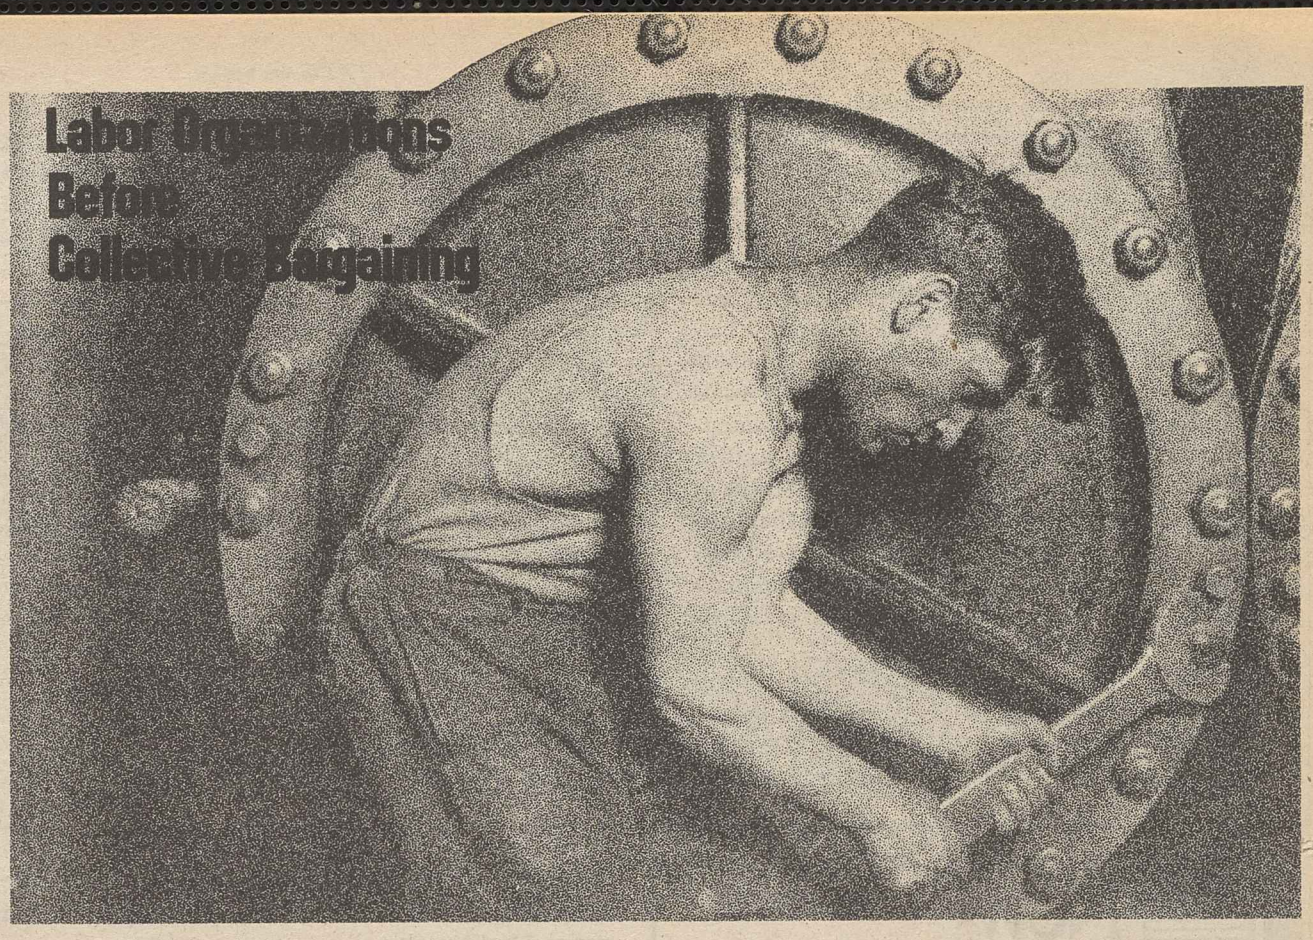
■ Shorter workweek, reduced workhours per year and higher overtime penalties to open up more job opportunities.

■ Better matching of workers and jobs.

■ Day care for children of working parents.

■ Sanctions and enforcement to stop hiring of illegal workers competing with U.S. citizens for jobs.

■ Minimizing, cushioning and humanizing the adverse effects of industrial, occupational, and technological change.



■ Realistic trade policy and rational industrial policy to achieve job-creating economic growth with balance and diversity, international competitiveness, national security, and rising living standards.

Some of the AFL-CIO proposals have no cost impact on the federal budget. Some have added costs that would bring substantial savings over the years. Programs that invest in people and jobs help workers realize their full potential. They also help lower long-term costs of unemployment and poverty.

Continuing high unemployment weakens America's economic strength. And high unemployment threatens the stability of the nation's economic, social, and political institutions.

The AFL-CIO will continue to support policies and programs that will improve the health and diversity of the American economy and assure job opportunities and a rising standard of living for all Americans.

UNIONS OF THE PAST

By James L. Medoff and Nina A. Mendelson

After the Wagner Act was passed in 1935, direct organizing of workers was common. Unions like the Steelworkers and the Auto Workers were able to gain membership simply through offering the service of collective bargaining. Before this period, however, unions varied in type, recruitment method, and offerings. One relatively common type of labor organization which preceded the traditional trade union was the "benevolent association," or "brotherhood." These groups were based on mutual aid and insurance, either alone or coupled with "protective" issues (wages, hours, and bargaining in general).

In the late 1800s, particularly toward the end of the century when economic conditions were unstable, benevolent functions of labor organizations became more important, both as services themselves and as a mechanism for maintaining stability and building the strength of the unions. While there was a burst of enthusiasm for unionism between 1830 and 1880, it lacked staying power; benevolent associations seemed to retain their members into the late 1800s, however, and they often developed into effective bargaining agents.

Benevolent associations, first, offered the worker significantly useful services. They were often organized around the workplace or around a craft, like the Cigar Makers or the Carpenters, and offered benefits that were often otherwise beyond the reach of the worker. For example, death benefits were offered—the Iron Molders set up a system of death benefits in 1859, as did the Granite Cutters in 1873, including payments to the wife and family after the burial of the members. The death and permanent disability benefit was a major rallying point for the Railway Carmen, which began forming in 1888, for many of their members lacked the wherewithal to pay for funerals, or for their families to survive after their deaths. As late as 1943, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers set up their own insurance fund which was cheaper and better administered than many private insurance funds. Though non-members could not use this insurance, the fund was important in keeping union membership stable.

The above-mentioned were all union- (or association-) administered funds; they were paid for through dues and initiation fees and managed by the union. Some craft associations offered tool insurance, and the Sailors guaranteed tobacco while one was in the hospital. "Taking care of our brothers" and maintaining the quality of the craft were common themes of benevolent associations like the Carpenters and the Machinists. Though some unions did begin bargaining for insurance and pension provisions toward the end of the 19th Century, benevolent associations generally administered or organized their own funds.

In addition to constituting a service in themselves, benevolent-type services were important in building up the membership of labor associations which later became unions. For example, the Railway Carmen began forming lodges in 1888, organizing along railroad lines. The first objective of the group, stated at the 1888 convention [of seven lodges] was to "spread the Brotherhood and gain numeric strength before seeking to solve the problems of the car repairmen." They organized mainly around death and disability benefits and the need for dialogue about the quality of the craft and cooperation in work. They were also concerned with safety, and in 1892, they successfully lobbied Congress for regulation. However, it wasn't until 1892-3 that the Railway Carmen felt they were sufficiently large and powerful to effectively consider issues of wages, hours, and grievances. Even after this point, these matters were dealt with largely by the locals (with support from the national). Though the national union was oriented towards issues of wages and hours, the locals retained significant autonomy; sick benefits, for example, remained their exclusive provision.

The California School Employees Association also organized around mutual aid; in 1927, it was a group of seven janitors interested in setting up a pension plan. The organization grew school by school statewide, and the union formed around the structure of this mutual aid association.

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen began in 1873 as a benevolent association; it offered sick and accident insurance as well as death and disability insurance. In 1885, it began acting as a labor union, concerning itself with protective issues. The benevolent functions, however, were instrumental in keeping the number of members high when the union was not successful in its bargaining. Helen Marot of the AF of L observed in 1914 that "the large membership of the [railway] brotherhoods is unquestionably due to the insurance features of the organization, rather than to the collective bargaining. . . ." Mutual aid and insurance services were the central incentives to join these groups.

A benevolent association constituted a structure which could easily become a union at this time, especially since members were bonded to the association through the dues and benefits system, and lines of communication were set up. Even when an association had assumed the function of bargaining, as the Carpenters did, one could potentially join for the benevolent functions. For example, the Grand Division of the Order of Railway Conductors maintained a voluntary mutual insurance association into the 1900s even after they began bargaining, and as earlier noted, the lodges of the railroad organizations maintained a good deal of autonomy.

Organized labor was relatively unsuccessful before 1935 in bargaining for higher wages and fewer hours, probably largely because employers had more latitude in their dealings with unions. Employers were not required to recognize unions or bargain with them, though a union could strike for recognition. Therefore, labor organizations in the 19th and early 20th centuries often encountered membership problems simply because it was difficult for them to be effective as bargaining agents; they had to be especially enticing and active to attract members. Workers considered union membership not worth the dues, and some members of purely protective unions (no "benevolent" functions) feared for their jobs in times of scarce employment.

Thus, mutual-aid-type benefits played an important part in keeping membership in a union in addition to their role in the organization of labor associations. Even when a union was unsuccessful in raising wages or shortening hours, death and pension benefits were strong incentives for a worker to remain a member of the group.

For example, the Carpenters Union was an amalgama-

| Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen | Death and disability ($1,000 in 1873 dollars) paid by active members. | 1873 founded; 1885 became union (could join simply for insurance). |
| Carpenters | Death and disability ($250 for six months membership in 1882 dollars); sickness and accident. | Scattered local unions, beginning 1798 in Canada; 1881 National forms; contains both protective and benevolent locals. |
| Cigar Makers | Death benefit 1867 ($550 for 15 yrs. membership in 1867 dollars); sick benefits 1880. | Organized 1864 as "protective union" (included because of strongly developed benevolent functions). |
| Granite Cutters Union | Sick benefits ($6/week paid through initiation fees in 1877 dollars) and death benefits ($50 in 1877 dollars). | Formed 1877, benefits central; 1888, membership absorbed into union (benevolent functions continued). |
| Iron Molders | Death benefits (variable; members assessed $.45 per death in 1870 dollars). | 1870 on, locals form; 1878 union constitution written. |
| Machinists | Death benefits ($50 for six months membership in 1892 dollars). | Locals organized 1888; 1892, International Association of Machinists; gradual transition to protective functions. |
| National Association of Letter Carriers | Old age (annuity plans) $100 annuity if one entered at age 30 required $1.68/mo. (1905 dollars). Also disability ($6/week, 1905 dollars). | Founded 1889; did not bargain until 1970s; founded as fraternal and mutual aid organization. |
| Railway Carmen | $1,350 life insurance in 1903 cost of insurance approximately $18 yearly. Also sick benefits. | Founded 1888; 1891-92 national begins to form and bargain. |
| Railway Switchmen | Death and disability. | 1866 locals in Chicago; 1887 national forms; contains benevolent and protective locals. |

tion of a variety of locals, many of which formed as benevolent associations. The Society of the Brotherhood of Carpenters, in Halifax, Canada, banded together in 1798 to provide sick, accident, and funeral and other death benefits, all paid out of initiation fees and dues money. The national union, which formed in 1881, contained both "benevolent" locals which offered insurance and benefits and "protective" locals which focused on bargaining to change work conditions. In 1883, the union journal, The Carpenter, noted that the benevolent locals with a sick benefit and 50-cent dues "have been successful [in organizing] . . . while the cheap locals have all, or nearly all fallen behind." (Brooks footnote) Because of the business cycles (characterized as "boom and bust") in the building industry, the locals which offered bargaining but no benefits had trouble keeping up their membership. Association-type functions, however, continued to be a draw for membership.

Similarly, in the Great Panic of 1893-1897, many unions lost a considerable number of members (sometimes upwards of 50 percent), but the Cigar Makers, a union with a highly developed system of benefits, lost only 1.5 percent of their members during this period. While probably not the only factor, the system of benefits was clearly important in maintaining the membership of the union. The reasons for being a union member and being represented in the collective bargaining process might diminish as the demand conditions faced by an industry weakened, fear of loss grew, and significantly, unemployment appeared, but participation in a benefit program would remain an incentive for a worker to retain membership in a union.

Mutual aid provisions could constitute a sort of permanency. The International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union was very unstable at its inception, for example. One of its officers described the change that instituting benefit provisions wrought:

> There was nothing to bind the garment worker to his union. He would join and drop out at frequent intervals. The turnover was tremendous. With the introduction of the benefit system, conditions changed radically. Today, the person who joins the ILGWU has every good reason to maintain his membership, even in slack periods. He no longer drops his membership at the end of the busy season as he did formerly, because today his membership is a form of security against illness, unemployment, accident and death . . . (Munts, p. 5)

Even though benefit provisions were not important in the founding of this union, they certainly seem to be instrumental in holding members.

Because mutual aid or insurance type functions constituted extremely useful services as well as creating relationships of a significant duration, workers joined early benevolent labor associations in their workplace or craft. Later, many of these associations became unions, and dialogue about wages, hours, and workplace occurred within the association structure, as well as collective bargaining.

After becoming unions, these organizations continued to find benevolent functions useful in stabilizing membership (especially in times of economic downturn) and in organizing workers. Mutual aid and insurance was useful to a worker even when bargaining might not be, and labor associations were thus able to succeed when collective bargaining alone might not have brought or kept union members.

The Role of Unions in the American Economy

By Ray Marshall & Brian Rungeling; Joint Council on Economic Education, 2 Park Ave., New York City. 172 pages, paperback, $8.50.

The Joint Council on Economic Education is a joint labor-business effort to improve the knowledge of high school teachers and high school students about how the U.S. economy operates.

As you would expect, therefore, the authors of this JCEE book on unions—now in its second edition—make heroic and even at times excessive efforts to achieve objectivity and balance.

Union views and union answers to the critics of unions are set forth with understanding and sympathy by Ray Marshall, Secretary of Labor under President Carter and now professor at the University of Texas, and Brian Rungeling, a professor at the University of Central Florida.

The authors try very hard to be objective and balanced. As a result, criticism of unions frequently gets more attention than it deserves.

Perhaps this is the price of establishing credibility with high school teachers and high school students who don't get enough solid, factual, objective, balanced information about unions.

"We are convinced," Marshall and Rungeling say, "that unions and other labor organizations are necessary to the effective workings of a democratic society. Labor organizations provide workers with the means to promote their interests in a democratic society. We do not believe impersonal labor markets, employers, governments, or any other organizations can or will effectively protect the interests of workers at the work place or in the larger society."

Marshall and Rungeling endorse the basic policy set by the nation's labor law, that workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing:

"Collective bargaining has demonstrated its effectiveness as a good way to make rules governing wages, hours, and working conditions in many circumstances. The rules so developed are compromises between the interests of employers and workers and, therefore, encourage observance by both sides."

An early chapter of this book sets a general framework for understanding the role of unions in industrial societies with a review of the now classic approach taken by Clark Kerr, John Dunlop, Frederick Harbison, and Charles Myers in their 1960 volume on Industrialism and Industrial Man.

In their final chapter looking to the future, Marshall and Rungeling see "a widespread belief in all parts of the political spectrum that there must be cooperation between labor and management and between the public and private sectors in order to maintain or regain America's competitive position in the world and to make fuller and more efficient use of our resources."

But the authors note that the anti-union effort to achieve a so-called union-free environment weakens unions' interest in such cooperation. Strong anti-union campaigns will continue throughout the 1980s, they say.

Unions will remain influential in the American economy, Marshall and Rungeling declare. "Indeed, we expect the political influence of unions to increase as the nation's economic problems intensify and workers see the need to ensure that their interests are represented in national policymaking."

Furthermore, they note, "A democratic society will continue to strengthen the workers' right to choose whether or not to bargain collectively. Collective bargaining procedures and outcomes will alter to reflect changing technology and international economic realities, but the basic structure of the American industrial relations system is likely to remain the same."

Unions in the future will continue to stress both "bread and butter" issues of collective bargaining and also broad economic and social improvements through political and legislative action, according to Marshall and Rungeling.

The authors are impressed by "the continuing influence of the pragmatic economic goals established by Samuel Gompers in 1886, goals which profoundly affect the American labor movement to this day."

A short history of the American labor movement in this book includes discussion of the principles of union "autonomy" and "exclusive jurisdiction" and key decisions to work within the capitalist system to advance workers' interests through collective bargaining and legal, binding contracts between employers and unions.

Marshall and Rungeling point out that unions have a big interest also in fair income distribution, including anti-inflation wage and price controls.

"Unions in the United States object to these policies since unions perceive them as a restriction on the institution of collective bargaining. Not only do unions abhor such government regulations, but unions also see that governments tend to be more successful in controlling wages than prices."

Many other issues are discussed in this book, including union membership trends, the job impact of increased imports, occupational safety and health legislation, worker participation in productivity and job satisfaction projects, and the effects of changes in the American economy on jobs, job security, and wage structure.

This book is dedicated to the late Walter G. Davis, a long-time labor leader and strong supporter of economic education for high school teachers and high school students. He was a member of the JCEE board of trustees for almost 25 years. At the time of his death, he was director of community services for the AFL-CIO.

Mike Quill—Himself.

By Shirley Quill. Devin-Adair Publishers, 6 North Water St., Greenwich, Conn. 06830. 326 pages. $17.95.

Mike Quill, the Irish rebel who built a union in the New York subway system, was president of the Transport Workers Union of America from its founding in 1934 until his death in 1966.

Shirley Quill, first a close associate, then his wife, and always his working partner, has written an admirable—and admiring—biography. The reader will learn what it was like to work 12 hours a day, seven days a week, under the most primitive of conditions in the dungeon that was the New York subway system. And the reader will learn also of the loyalties that bound the Irish rebels who emigrated to America. Those ties, knotted an ocean away, contributed significantly to the formation of the TWU.

The words "colorful" and "controversial" often were used to describe Mike Quill during his lifetime, and not without reason. He was both.

Here is Mike, himself, first in uneasy alliance with the communists in the turbulent Thirties, then a stern foe. And just as he never lost his Irish brogue, he never abandoned his commitment to social justice.

Neither history nor his contemporaries are likely to agree with his assessment of many of the labor and political figures of the era. But the biography is titled "Mike Quill—Himself," and it is as close to an autobiography as if Himself had written it.

Three new publications on issues currently facing workers and their unions are available from the presses of the International Labor Organization, the specialized United Nations agency charged with promoting productive employment and improving working conditions and living standards throughout the world.

The Reduction of Working Time

By Rolande Cuvillier, 150 pp., $10, paper.

This study deals with the economic and social effects of a possible reduction in working time in the industrialized market economy countries, where unions are seeking to establish a 35-hour workweek as the standard.

More leisure time for workers is a principal aim of the trade union movement. The idea that technical and economic progress should lead to a gradual reduction in working time derives from the idea that the benefits of increased productivity should be shared.

Safety in the Use of Asbestos

116 pp., $14.25, paper.

There are three main health dangers associated with exposure to airborne asbestos: asbestosis, or thickening and scarring of the lung tissue; lung cancer, and mesothelioma, cancer of the pleura or peritoneum.

This handbook spells out a code of practice on safety in the use of asbestos put together at the ILO's behest by experts in the field. The book's practical recommendations range from the proper labeling of asbestos-containing products to the disposal of asbestos waste.

The code is not intended to replace national laws or regulations, but to provide guidance to those in the public and private sectors who have responsibility for safety and health in the use of asbestos.

Occupational Hazards from Non-Ionizing Electromagnetic Radiation

133 pages, $10, paper.

This is an overview of the potential health hazards to workers through the uncontrolled use of, or excessive exposure to, electromagnetic radiation.

The rapidly expanding scientific, medical, industrial, and home use of devices such as video display terminals and microwave ovens is leading to a steady increase in the amount of such radiation in man's living and working environment. The book explores at length the adverse health effects.

All three publications may be obtained in the United States by writing ILO Publications Dept., 1750 New York Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Public employees win California strike case

Sacramento—California public employees may strike over wages and working conditions provided the work stoppage does not pose "an imminent threat to public health or safety," the state supreme court ruled.

In one of three concurring opinions in the court's 6-1 decision, Justice Allen Broussard wrote, "The right to strike, as an important symbol of a free society, should not be denied unless such a strike would substantially injure paramount interests of the larger community."

The ruling, which was immediately attacked by state Republican leaders, came on a 1976 case involving Service Employees Local 660 and the Los Angeles County Sanitation District 2. It reversed lower court rulings and voided a $335,000 damage award to the sanitary district.

SEIU Local 660 Manager Phil Giarrizzo hailed the decision as a "remarkable victory for public service employees."

Giarrizzo added, "This ruling brings equality to bargaining and it comes at the most critical time for us." Contracts between Los Angeles County and the 11 unions representing its 60,000 employees expire Sept. 1.

California state laws do not specify whether strikes by public workers are legal, other than to rule out strikes by fire fighters, the court noted.

On July 5, 1976, most of the sanitary district's 500 workers struck after negotiations for a new agreement reached an impasse. After 11 days, the workers accepted the management offer that had been made prior to the strike. The sanitary district then sued the local for damages. The trial court ruled that the strike was unlawful and awarded damages. This ruling was later upheld by the appellate court.

Outdated theory

The state's high court, however, found fault with the basic arguments used to justify a ban on public employee strikes. The traditional justification—that such a strike is tantamount to a denial of governmental authority—is "a vague and outdated theory based on the assumption that 'the King can do no wrong,'" the court said.

In shooting down the argument that strikes by public workers will give them too much bargaining power, the court said other factors serve to temper the potential bargaining power of striking public employees, such as lost wages, public opinion, economic constraints and the availability of subcontracting.

The justices found little evidence that governments "capitulate to unreasonable demands by public employees in order to resolve strikes." They pointed to the SEIU case as an example of the opposite.

The court also noted that governments often provide services comparable to those found in the private sector and "we tolerate strikes by private employees in many of the same areas in which the government is engaged."

Gov. George Deukmejian and other Republican leaders denounced the court's decision as "outrageous." Conservatives on the County Board of Supervisors said they will seek a statewide initiative, and Assembly Republican Leader Pat Nolan said he will introduce a constitutional amendment to overturn the court's ruling.

California AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John Henning said he viewed the GOP efforts as "part of a continuing struggle of the labor movement when it tries to protect workers' rights." He said organized labor will oppose the measures with a "high profile" campaign.

Purchasing power of workers down for month, year

Workers' buying power dropped three-tenths of 1 percent in April, reflecting a decline in hours worked and a rise in consumer prices, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The April drop in real, or inflation-adjusted, weekly earnings resulted from a three-tenths of 1 percent decrease in average weekly hours and a four-tenths of 1 percent jump in prices, as measured by BLS's Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W.).

Over the year, real average weekly earnings were down by 2.1 percent. A typical nonfarm production worker grossed $300.11 a week in current dollars last month, but after allowing for inflation the figure was only $171.88. A year earlier, the same worker drew an average $175.41.

BLS said real average weekly earnings were down over the year in all eight industry groups that it keeps records on.

More than half the rise in last month's consumer price index was due to increases in petroleum-based energy costs as both gasoline and fuel oil prices jumped sharply, BLS said. On the other hand, food prices fell, after registering no change in March.

The increase in the CPI brought the inflation rate so far this year to 4.1 percent when figured on an annual basis. A separate, Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U) also rose four-tenths of 1 percent in April. CPI-W is used to escalate negotiated contracts and for indexing social security and some other federal programs.

Gas prices soar

Gasoline prices increased by a sharp 3.1 percent while heating oil prices rose 3 percent. Gas and electricity edged up only two-tenths of 1 percent, however.

Food prices declined two-tenths of 1 percent in April, influenced largely by a 1.1-percent drop in prices for meat, poultry, fish, and eggs.

Shelter costs, measured by rents and rental equivalence in the case of homeowners, rose five-tenths of 1 percent over the month and were 6.9 percent higher than a year earlier.

New car prices were unchanged in April and used car prices were down four-tenths of 1 percent. Auto finance charges, which fell six-tenths of 1 percent last month, posted their fifth straight monthly decline.

Medical care charges rose five-tenths of 1 percent and were 5.9 percent ahead of the year-earlier level.

Case against double-breasted contractors is made at House hearings by Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, left, and Building & Construction Trades President Robert A. Georgine.

Building Trades seek curbs on 'double-breasted' firms

Building trades unions are looking to Congress to close a loophole in federal labor law that—at least under the NLRB's interpretation—allows contractors to set up non-union subsidiaries to evade compliance with pre-hire agreements.

Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine charged at House hearings that a proliferation of so-called "double-breasted" operations is undermining collective bargaining and the stability of labor relations in the construction industry.

Georgine and Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner strongly endorsed the Construction Industry Contract Security bill introduced by Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), the subcommittee chairman, and numerous cosponsors.

The legislation would require contractors who enter into a collective bargaining agreement to apply its provisions to all parts of their operations. It would make clear that where there is common ownership, management or control of business engaged in similar construction industry work, all of these entities would be considered a single employer within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act.

That's what Congress intended when it authorized prehire agreements, Georgine insisted. Pre-hire agreements, he noted, were established to meet the construction industry's need for a dependable source of skilled workers for jobs that frequently are of short duration.

Turner told the panel of the experience of the Operating Engineers Local 312 in Birmingham, Ala., with McDowell Contractors, Inc., a firm with which it has had collective bargaining agreements since 1964, at first separately and then as part of a multiemployer unit.

Both sides benefited from the agreement, Turner noted. "But in 1980, all that changed."

Name game

At that point, he testified, the company advised the union that it had undergone a corporate reorganization and that a new company called McDowell Materials Corp. would carry out an airport construction contract that had been awarded to McDowell Contractors, Inc. Since the "new firm" was non-union, it wouldn't be bound by the terms of the former pre-hire agreement.

"This was a classic case of double-breasting," Turner noted. The courts upheld its legality on the basis of previous NLRB and court decisions. But even in upholding the company's manipulations, Turner noted, a concurring opinion in a federal appellate decision noted that the construction workers were left "without the effective protections of collective bargaining," and deprived of the ability to exercise rights supposedly guaranteed under the National Labor Relations Act.

It is clearly up to Congress to remedy the injustice, Turner urged.

Sluggish economy threatens jobs

forced a consensus that is rapidly forming among both private and public economists that a recession is in the making. A survey of members of the National Association of Business Economists (NABE) found that 58 percent expect a recession next year as a result of large trade and budget deficits.

The NABE report suggested that the downturn could add as much as $100 billion to the already huge federal budget deficit and push the jobless rate to about 8 percent by the end of the year.

The government's report on real GNP contained other troublesome statistics:

- Actual final sales of goods and services rose only one-tenth of 1 percent in the first-quarter. Almost all the increased production went into business inventories.
- Business investment rose at an annual rate of only 2.6 percent, providing little momentum for economic growth. The figure compared with an 8.5-percent rise in the final quarter of 1984 and a 19.8-percent increase in all of 1984.
- Inflation, as measured by what the government calls its GNP "implicit price deflator," jumped to an annual rate of 5.6 percent, up from 2.8 percent in the fourth quarter of last year. The measure is considered by economists as the broadest, most accurate gauge of inflation.

The report also showed that the four-year rise in the value of the American dollar, which has made it difficult for U.S. goods to compete with foreign products, has worked severe damage to domestic manufacturing industries.

"It is one more example that the Reagan Administration policies are driving U.S. manufacturers out of business," Oswald said.

Corporate profits drop

A Wall Street Journal survey of 566 major firms found that after-tax profits were down 8 percent from a year earlier, due largely to stiff import competition.

The Journal survey found auto and truck companies performed well over the quarter, but steelmakers and oil companies reported red ink. Also doing poorly were industries such as broadcasting, entertainment, chemicals, construction and engineering, industrial and farm equipment, mining, and textiles.

Other indications of a flagging economy:

- Factory output declined two-tenths of 1 percent in April, pointing up once again the inroads made by foreign competition on the industrial sector.

At the same time, the Federal Reserve Board reported that capacity utilization of American factories declined a half point, to 80.6 percent, over the month.

- To pump up the soggy economy, the Fed cut its key discount lending rate a half point to 7.5 percent, the lowest level in nearly seven years. The central bank said it took the action "against the background of relatively unchanged output for some time in the industrial sector of the economy, stemming heavily from rising imports and a strong dollar."

Major banks immediately lowered their prime lending rate from 10.5 to 10 percent. The Fed's discount rate is its charge on loans to financial institutions. The prime rate is the interest banks charge their most creditworthy customers.

- Big-ticket factory orders grew only 1 percent in April, not enough to make up for declines in the previous two months.
- New housing construction fell 13 percent in the first three months of the year compared with a year earlier, the F. W. Dodge division of McGraw-Hill Information Systems Co. reported.
- Retail sales in April were disappointing, with big retailers such as Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Montgomery Ward & Co. reporting sales virtually unchanged.

House, Senate face conflicts over budget

low an estimated $15 billion increase in military outlays.

The House rejected, however, an amendment supported by the Democratic leadership that would have endorsed the concept of a more effective minimum tax on corporations and wealthy individuals, but putting off until later a decision on how the added revenues should be applied.

The AFL-CIO had strongly endorsed a corporate minimum tax—both to make fairer a system under which billions of dollars in corporate profits go untaxed and to provide revenue needed for federal programs and debt reduction. But the House voted 283-142 not to make the minimum tax endorsement part of the budget resolution.

All other changes in the Budget Committee resolution were likewise rejected by big margins. Before final passage, the House turned down a Republican substitute that would have left the social security COLA intact but would have sharply reduced domestic spending and increased the military budget. It was beaten, 329-102.

Both the House and Senate budget resolutions would reduce federal spending by an estimated $56 billion from the amount needed to fully fund existing programs.

Defense spending

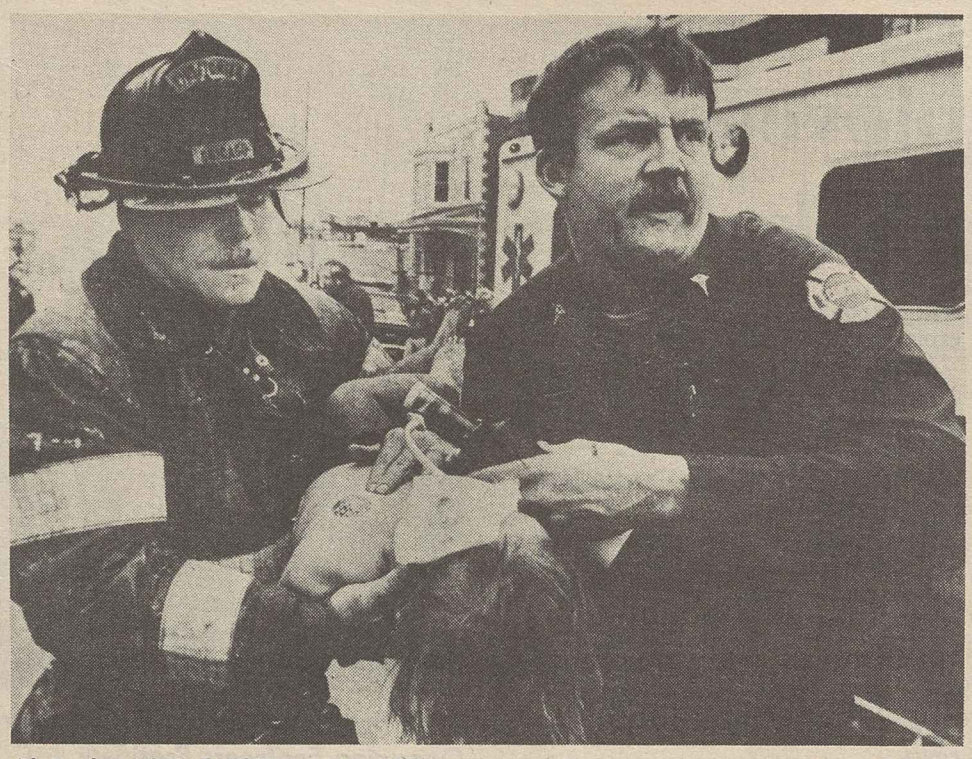
In the national defense category—by far the biggest expenditure—the Senate would allow spending commitments to rise to $302.5 billion in fiscal 1986, while the House would hold the amount to this year's figure of $292.6 billion.

While social security is the next biggest outlay in the budget, the money paid out is less than the revenue that is collected for the program from the payroll tax paid by workers and their employers.

Both bills would end general revenue-sharing to states and localities in fiscal 1987, but the House cut more deeply into next year's funding than did the Senate—one of the few instances where labor preferred the Senate version.



In some other areas of comparison:

- The Senate voted heavy cuts in urban mass transit programs while the House would freeze spending at present levels.
- The Senate budget would reduce funding for the Job Corps, guaranteed loans for college students, job training and employment services, community service block grants to local governments, food stamps, nutrition and public housing programs. The House would continue these programs with increases to cover inflation and any anticipated growth in caseload.
- The House allowed funding for Medicaid—the health program for low-income families—at current service levels, with allowances for inflation. The Senate budget assumes "savings" in the program costs.
- Both the House and Senate would limit Medicare payments to doctors and hospitals. But the Senate, unlike the House, would impose added costs on the elderly.
- The Senate would make deeper cuts in Amtrak subsidies for railroad passenger service than the House approved.
- The Senate cut substantially more from rural housing assistance than the House version.

Former UAW economist Nat Weinberg dies at 71

Nat Weinberg, retired director of economic analysis, for the Auto Workers, died of heart failure at Sibley Memorial Hospital in Washington May 19. He was 71.

Weinberg began his union career in the research department of the Ladies' Garment Workers. He joined the UAW in 1947 as director of research and engineering.

Al Podgorski of Chicago Sun-Times won a top award in the Fire Fighters 1985 media contest with this photo on a tragic fire that killed six persons.

Fire Fighters' awards honor outstanding media coverage

The Fire Fighters presented awards to 32 entries in the Union's 1985 Media Awards Contest to honor outstanding journalistic achievement in portraying the professionalism of its members and the hazards they face on the job.

IAFF President John A. Gannon noted the high quality of the hundreds of entries, saying they reflect the media's concern with the profession's hazards.

Fire fighters "continually face death or injury when they respond to an alarm," Gannon said. "They are gratified by the accuracy of the reporting and the sympathy their work receives from the media."

The top awards in the best news or feature story category went to Shirley Matthews of the Stamford (Conn.) Advocate and to Kate Phillips of the Rochester (N.Y.) Times-Union for newspapers below and above 100,000 circulation respectively. Matthews's story gave an account of the hazards of modern-day flammable materials and the effects of a major fire on the victims, fire fighters and the community. The report was instrumental in winning passage of a state "right-to-know" law. Phillips's story concerned the motivation of some children to set fires.

Photo winners

Michael Delaney of the Miami News captured the top photo award for newspapers under 100,000 circulation for a dramatic picture of a rescue attempt that failed. In newspapers of more than 100,000 circulation, the photo competition produced a tie between two photographers for coverage of the same tragic fire. Michael Fryer of the Chicago Tribune and Al Podgorski of the Chicago Sun-Times won for their photos of a tenement fire in which six died.

The top television news award went to Judith Ann Burgess of KHTV in Houston for a profile of the professional fire fighter, showing the human costs and commitment required of the career professional. The award for the best radio editorial comment went to David B. Weiss of WRJN in Racine, Wis., for a series of five-minute broadcasts on the value of the rescue squad and fire fighters to the community.

The Seattle Fire Fighter, published by IAFF Local 27, captured the award for the best union publication, and the Los Angeles Fire Fighter, produced by IAFF Local 112, came in second. Honorable mentions went to The Baltimore City Fire Fighter of IAFF Local 734 and Relay Line of IAFF Local 48 in Cincinnati.

Series award

A special award went to Local 1897 members John Wason, John Stanko and Ross Gardiner of the Canton, Ill., Daily Ledger for a series in observance of National Fire Prevention Week.

Another special award cited Robert A. Fabrich of Hampton, N.H., Local 2664 and Steve Haberman of the Atlantic News & Advertiser for a special edition honoring more than 150 years of service by the local fire department.

Judges for competition were John M. Barry of the AFL-CIO News; James F. Casey, retired editor of Fire Engineering magazine, and Jeff Sheler of U.S. News & World Report.

Striking pilots halt 85% of United flights

only about 200 were getting off the ground.

More significantly, only four of the 570 pre-hired pilots—those trained by United to replace ALPA members in the walkout—crossed the union picket lines at 60 sites around the country.

In addition, 92 percent of the 10,000 flight attendants stayed away from their jobs in response to a call from the Flight Attendants union.

ALPA and company negotiators met throughout the week with a federal mediator for marathon sessions near Chicago.

"We remain optimistic for a negotiated settlement that takes into consideration our concerns, and we are proud and gratified by the solidarity of the United pilots and those unions that have pledged their support," ALPA President Henry Duffy said.

The strike began May 17 at the end of a 30 day "cooling-off" period mandated under the Railway Labor Act.

Preparing for a protracted walkout, ALPA's five-member executive committee backed the United pilots by unanimously approving strike benefits of $1,000 to each striker beginning in June.

Strike support

"Our membership is prepared to go deep into its pocket to help the United pilots get a fair contract," Duffy said. "The issue in their strike is critical to all airline pilots, and we support them 100 percent."

Duffy said he will call a special meeting of the union's 300-member board of directors within the next three weeks to confirm the committee's action.

Under United's demand for a two-tier pay scale, wages of new pilots would be slashed up to 57 percent from the level pilots hired under the existing contract, the union observed. United wants to maintain those separate scales for about 20 years. Aside from the fairness question, ALPA contends that the two-tier system would discourage the most qualified pilots from joining United.

The airline insisted that it needs the two-tiered system to remain cost-competitive. The union, which has made some $360 million in concessions to help the carrier since 1981, pointed out that in 1984 United posted a record operating profit of $564 million, the highest operating profit in its history.

Mime Troupe on labor's unfair list

San Francisco's Mime Troupe has been placed on the AFL-CIO's Unfair List at the request of Actors' Equity which has been trying to organize the troupe since 1980.

The San Francisco Mime Troupe has been operating since 1959 as a live theatrical performing company. It claims to operate as a "collective," said Alan Eisenberg, executive secretary of Equity.

Eisenberg said the group claims to be "pro-union" and "pro-labor," yet it has refused to negotiate an agreement with the union "despite our good faith efforts to organize them since 1980."

The troupe was placed on the "Do Not Patronize" list of the San Francisco AFL-CIO after it approached that body for financial assistance and patronage, Eisenberg said.

The troupe performs at various theaters and auditoriums throughout the United States.

The Equity executive council initiated a boycott against the San Francisco Mime Troupe in April.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer six labor studies institutes and workshops during June and July. The schedule:

Advanced Leadership Skills, June 2-7—A workshop on improving reading, speaking and writing skills, and more effective ways to conduct meetings.

Occupational Health & Safety, June 2-7—A program focusing on health and safety hazards, worker and union rights under OSHA, and safety issues in negotiating and administering contracts.

Fact Finding & Interest Arbitration, June 16-21—An institute to examine the forms of interest arbitration and the use of fact finding to settle public employee contract impasses.

TV: The Cool Medium, June 30-July 3—A three-day workshop to coach officers of local central bodies on working with TV reporters. Participants will have three exercises facing the video camera: A hostile confrontation, a panel discussion and a studio interview.

Corporate Finance & Investment Practice, July 9-12—An institute to explore investment banking, corporate acquisitions, mergers, leveraged buyouts, and the general financial behavior of U.S. corporations.

Some Difference

DONALD L. DOTSON, the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, complains that he is a much misunderstood person. He sees himself as the victim of a misconception, spread by unions, the media and the academic community, that he is anti-union and that the NLRB under his leadership has tipped the scales heavily to the employer side.

Dotson couldn't have chosen a friendlier audience to air his grievances. His host, the Central Piedmont Employers Association, could be counted upon to be perfectly in tune with the Dotson labor board. Any union organizer who has worked in North Carolina can testify to that.

It's not easy to leave private life and enter government service determined to "make a difference," Dotson complained. As he sees it, too many people who go into government choose to go along with the current and then are praised as "moderates."

But, he warns, "if you want to make a difference in the labor relations area, you will run afoul of . . . three groups bound together by ties of interest and ideology."

The villains, Dotson explains, are "institutional labor, the working press and a large segment of the academic community."

Thus, an attack on the Reagan-appointed NLRB in The New Republic magazine is followed up by articles in Newsweek and Business Week "which faithfully echoed the contents." And the Wall Street Journal uses "inflammatory" language such as describing an NLRB policy reversal as "controversial." As for academia, Dotson dismisses one of his critics, a UCLA professor who wrote an article for the Los Angeles Times, as "Marxist-oriented." He goes on to complain that similar "Board-bashing" criticism has come from "more conventional labor scholars."

DOTSON IS especially upset by what he views as a distortion of the views he expressed in a letter to the American Bar Association Journal shortly before he joined the Reagan Administration. The quotes used in the Los Angeles Times article, Dotson complained, omitted words so as to make it appear that he opposed collective bargaining and thought unions destroyed individual freedom.

Dotson did not bother to quote the paragraph that he contends would put the phrases in context, so we will do so for him:

"In both the public and private sectors, the strike has come to mean not merely a concerted withholding of labor but a concerted effort employing violence, intimidation and political intervention to prevent people who want to work from working. In other words, collective bargaining frequently means labor monopoly, the destruction of individual freedom, and the destruction of the marketplace as the mechanism for determining the value of labor. An employer's right to replace strikers has been rendered meaningless in most major industries."

Dotson attributes this state of affairs to the NLRB's "tendency to act as a legal aid society and organizing arm for unions."

The words speak for themselves. Even the most paranoiac NLRB chairman can't make a case that they are out of context. Mr. Dotson, himself, has provided the smoking-gun evidence of his unfitness for the post he holds. Deplorably, many of the opinions he helped shape as NLRB chairman faithfully reflect the bias he brought with him.

The Wrong Way

THE YOUTH subminimum wage is the wrong way to deal with the real problems of young people in terms of their needs for education, training and employment.

Its benefits accrue to predatory employers and not to workers.

The right approach must include improvement and expansion of education, training, work experience and employment opportunities for young people, with special emphasis on stay-in-school programs.

The existing minimum wage is already a subminimum in terms of purchasing power.

Needless plant closings hurt more than workers

By Press Associates, Inc.

In June 1983, the 130 workers at the Ferro Manufacturing Corp. plant in Mount Pleasant, Mich., went on a two-week layoff for the annual inventory-taking. Or so they thought.

When they returned to work, the workers found that the plant had been stripped of most of its machinery. Under the cover of darkness, movers had loaded the equipment onto flatbed trucks and headed for parts unknown.

To avoid attracting the attention of workers living nearby, the company had asked the movers to work with as little light as possible and to cover the plant's windows with canvas.

But alert workers had smelled a fish and notified their local union representatives about the unusual nightime activity at the plant. Company officials repeatedly denied what had become obvious—that the plant was being closed down.

The denials continued even after workers returned July 5 to a largely empty factory. After continued questioning and legal action by the union, management finally admitted that the plant would close on Aug. 31, 1983. The company then agreed to negotiate a plant-closing agreement.

Legislative need

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber related this story at a joint hearing of two House Education & Labor subcommittees which are considering a bill that would require employers to give a 90-day notice of a plant closing or a permanent layoff of 50 or more workers. Employers also would be required to discuss alternatives with the union. In addition, the bill would establish a bipartisan national commission to develop policies and programs to prevent shutdowns and assist dislocated workers.

Between 1979 and 1984, more than 5 million experienced workers lost their jobs because of plant closings and permanent layoffs. Every state and region was affected—the Sunbelt along with the "Rustbelt." Forty percent of these dislocated workers were still jobless when contacted in 1984. Many of the 60 percent who found jobs suffered substantial declines in living standards.

As in the case of the Ferro plant, most of the shutdowns occur with little or no advance notice. "The hardship of a plant closing is often intensified because of the suddenness," noted Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), a sponsor of the legislation.

As Bieber told the House panels, "Few decisions in our society have a more profound impact than decisions to close or move a plant."

Two examples

If workers and communities are given adequate warning, plant closings often can be averted. Bieber offered two examples. In 1982, General Motors announced it would close its Rochester Products Division in Tuscaloosa, Ala. GM said the plant was no longer profitable.

However, the UAW local, joined by the University of Alabama and state officials, began working on ways to keep the plant by lowering its operating costs. A plan was drawn up and an agreement with GM was reached. Just eight months into the project, the cost savings target was achieved. GM then announced plans to invest $14 million in new equipment for the plant.

The other example involved Chrysler's Detroit Forge plant, which had been set for closing in 1982 unless large physical conversions could be made. UAW skilled trades workers initiated and developed a renovation plan which they proposed doing themselves.

Chrysler agreed and the workers proceeded to modify forge presses, re-build scavenged machinery, and renovate buildings. The plant was saved.

However, as Bieber noted, without "a public policy requiring advance notice and consultation, the opportunity to save troubled but potentially viable plants is available only in a small minority of cases."

The plant shutdown bill represents a minimum, first step toward preventing and cushioning the devastation wrought by shutdowns on workers, families and communities.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

AFL-CIO Testifies Against Youth Subminimum

Wage Bill Would Exploit Young People, Senate Told, While Putting Many Older Americans Out Of Work

Senator Orrin G. Hatch (R-UT) has begun anew his campaign to lower the wages of America's working young people and last week presided over Senate Labor Committee hearings to promote the Reagan Administration's Youth Subminimum Wage Bill, S. 797.

Called the Youth Opportunity Wage Act of 1985, the bill was quickly renamed the Youth Discrimination and Disemployment Act by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison who testified before the Committee May 22, on behalf of the Federation.

Denison pointed out that the bill does many things, none of them good for workers or young people. "Its an unfair and ineffective deception hiding behind the noble purpose of creating jobs for young Americans," he said.

The present minimum wage is $3.35 an hour. Hatch's bill would reduce it to $2.50 per hour during the months of May to October for youths between 16 and 20 years of age.

The Federation is strongly opposed to the bill because it discriminates against young workers based on their age and at the same time displaces older workers. In addition it has been shown that subminimum wage laws do not create new jobs or alleviate youth unemployment. What it will do is serve up hundreds of thousands of disadvantaged young and poor workers to employers most willing to take the rather minimal risk of exploiting them.

"The minimum wage in America was established as a national statement that employers would not be allowed to exploit their employees by paying subminimum wages," Denison pointed out. "Congress established a floor -- a minimum that was to be the absolute lowest wage considered appropriate in American society. Now we are urged to undermine that floor by exploiting our children. Is there no shame?"

Any sincere approach to solving the problem of high youth unemployment in this country "must include improvement and expansion of education, training, work experience and employment opportunities for young people, with special emphasis on stay-in-school programs," Denison said.

A companion bill H.R. 1811 has been introduced in the House of Representatives, but action is not considered likely at this time.

Supporting the subminimum wage are Labor Secretary William Brock, the Black Mayors and the Chamber of Commerce. Joining the AFL-CIO in opposition are the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Labor Commissioners of the 50 States and the Youth Coalition for Jobs and Fair Wages.

How You Can Tell The Special Interests From The Peoples' Interests

In Washington there are special interests and then there are people interests. During recent congressional testimony of AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer Thomas R. Donahue on South Africa, Congressman Howard Berman (D-CA) took time to explain the difference to his colleagues:

"When I see Secretary-Treasurer Donahue of the AFL-CIO here, it gives me a chance to say what I've been thinking for some months now...The fact is that if this is a special interest, it's been an interest that historically...has been invariably and repeatedly involved in lobbying in behalf of proposals that do not have direct economic benefits to its own membership -- the issue of South Africa being a very good case in point.

"The fact is that there is probably no civil rights bill that has passed this Congress that would have passed were it not for the lobbying force of the AFL-CIO. And the fact that they are on board on this, I think enhances dramatically the chances of its successful conclusion."

Momentum Growing For Stronger Trade Enforcement Laws

Pressure is mounting for Congress to take action to protect the U.S. textile and apparel industry from unfair competition from abroad. At stake is a vital American industry and the jobs of thousands of workers.

H.R. 1562 and S. 680 have been introduced to establish new import levels for textiles and textile products. Exporting countries would be permitted to expand their exports to the U.S., but limits would be placed on the rate of increase.

The bill already has 273 cosponsors in the House and 45 cosponsors in the Senate. The next step for this important bill is a hearing scheduled in the House Ways and Means Committee.

What you can do: Contact your senators and representative and urge them to cosponsor H.R. 1562 or S. 680, to save jobs and to begin congressional action this year!

Poll Shows Americans Worried About Japanese Competition

A new Harris poll published May 11 shows that Americans are very concerned about competition from foreign countries and the jobs it takes away. The poll shows that Americans on the whole were opposed to President Reagan's recent lifting of voluntary import restrictions against Japanese auto makers. They also have doubts as well about Japanese companies coming into this country to invest.

Below are the pollster's questions and the response from a sampling of Americans:

Should the United States encourage Japanese investment here, discourage it or not do much either way?

|---|---|
| Discourage It | 50% |
| Encourage Investment | 15% |
| Not Do Much Either Way | 30% |

How serious do you feel it is that Japan is selling so much more to the United States than the United States is selling to Japan?

|---|---|
| Very Serious | 55% |
| Somewhat Serious | 31% |
| Not Very Serious | 7% |
| Not Serious At All | 4% |

President Reagan ended the restrictions on Japanese auto imports to this county which had been limited to a 22 percent share of the market. Do you think it was a good or bad idea to end all restrictions on Japanese autos coming into the U.S.?

Postcards Arriving By The Bundle

AFL-CIO Associate Director of Legislation Robert McGlotten and office worker Marge Tracey sort some of the 10,000 postcards the Federation has received during the campaign against the proposed tax on life support benefits. For each card received, three more were sent to congressmen and senators, telling them to put a halt to the proposed tax scheme.

NLRB tilts sharply against unions, study finds

Workers and their unions are up against a stacked deck in dealings with the National Labor Relations Board.

That's the conclusion of a study by the AFL-CIO Lawyers Coordinating Committee of NLRB decisions since September 1983, when President Reagan's appointees first made up a majority of the five-member labor board.

The study is most detailed for the first year of the Reagan takeover, but a 1985 update shows the pro-employer tilt has become even worse.

The first-year of a Reagan majority saw 60 percent of contested unfair labor practice and representation cases decided in favor of the employer. For the first three months of this year, 65 percent of all such cases—nearly two out of three—were decided for the employer.

Perhaps not entirely by coincidence, the increase in the already pronounced employer advantage came after the term of the last holdover NLRB member had expired and all three board members were Reagan appointees. Two other Reagan appointees nominated this March, have just been confirmed by the Senate.

The lawyers' committee, made up of attorneys representing AFL-CIO affiliates, compared the first 12 months of a Reagan-appointed NLRB majority with the pattern of comparable periods in the two previous presidential administrations.

Chosen for comparison were the Murphy Board, when Republican Betty Murphy chaired the NLRB during President Ford's Administration, and the Fanning Board, under Democrat John Fanning during the Carter Administration. Their records were compared with that of the Dotson Board, under Reagan-appointed Donald Dotson.

The Dotson Board's record from September 1983 through August 1984—the first year of a Reagan-appointed majority—showed 60 percent of all contested unfair labor practice and representation cases decided in the employer's favor.

That contrasts sharply with the 27 per-

Lane Kirkland joins the ALPA picket line against United Airlines in San Francisco with Flight Attendants' Council 11 chairperson Nancy Williams.

Striking pilots hit United on union-busting tactics

A United Airlines threat to hire strikebreakers as permanent replacements for 5,000 striking Air Line Pilots has turned the two-week walkout into a battle against union-busting, ALPA said.

"This is no longer an economic strike," the union stressed. "We are on strike against the union-busting stance the company has taken."

Although the union and the airline reached a tentative accord May 24 on economic issues that triggered the strike, they could not resolve differences on a back-to-work agreement. Talks broke off the next day and United subsequently announced its intentions to hire scabs in an attempt to resume full operations.

Despite its union-busting threats, 86 percent of the United flights stayed grounded as the 5,000 pilots have remained on the picket lines since the strike began May 17.

The walkout resulted from the company's insistence on a two-tier pay formula that would sharply reduce wages of newly hired pilots. Details of the agreement on a revised two-tier arrangement were not released.

United has prolonged the strike by refusing to agree to normal back-to-work measures, ALPA charged.

The airline is demanding that 200 strikebreakers be given seniority rights

Reagan's tax plan offers key reforms but loopholes stay

The AFL-CIO welcomed elements of President Reagan's tax reform proposals but expressed disappointment that they fall short of the "major overhaul" needed to restore fairness to the federal tax structure.

Federation President Lane Kirkland said organized labor will support the parts of Reagan's program that further the goal of tax fairness, "such as those that remove additional numbers of the poor from the tax rolls." But he expressed regret that Reagan's tax message failed to fulfill the expectations the President had previously raised.

"While our initial examination indicates that a number of features of the President's program have merit," Kirkland observed, "his proposals fall well short of the major overhaul needed to end the unfair preferential treatment given stock and real estate speculators, oil and gas developers, banks and corporations.

"No one has a larger stake in ending the tax avoidance schemes used by those who seek to escape their fair share of government costs than the wage and salary earners who meet their full tax obligations with each paycheck."

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO will carefully review the President's entire tax package "with the goal of making constructive and practical suggestions that would assure that the system is as understandable and enforceable as possible, that tax expenditures are limited to those that clearly meet the tests of public interest and regional equity, and that the present abuses that place unfair burdens on working Americans are eliminated."

Reagan's tax package was billed as a tax simplification program which is supposed to be roughly neutral in its effect on tax revenues. It would raise corporate taxes by about $25 billion while lowering individual income taxes by a similar amount. However, the Administration's projections show an actual revenue loss of about $11 billion over the five-year 1986-90 period.

Key provisions

The major provisions of the program that affect workers are:

- Consolidation of personal income tax rates into three rates—15 percent, 25 percent and 35 percent.
- An increase in the personal exemption from the $1,090 projected for next year to $2,000.
- An increase in the standard deduction to $2,900 for individuals, $3,600 for single heads of household and $4,000 for families. These represent increases from the current $2,480 for individuals and single heads of households and $3,670 for families.
- Elimination of the deduction for charitable contributions for taxpayers who use the standard deduction.
- Repeal of the second-earner deduction for married couples.
- Taxation as income of part of employer-paid health insurance premiums.

Victory for workers

Wider toxic hazard rule ordered

Philadelphia—In a sweeping appellate court ruling, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has been ordered to extend the protections of its hazard communication rule to all workers under OSHA jurisdiction. The court also said workers and their unions must have access to information on toxic substances that manufacturers claimed were trade secrets.

The AFL-CIO termed the decision by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "a major victory for American workers." The federation noted that "the court agreed with the AFL-CIO that all workers, not just those in the manufacturing sector, should have the right to know the chemicals they are exposed to on the job."

The court told OSHA to develop a less restrictive trade secret definition. This means that "companies will no longer be able to hide behind trade secret claims to withhold chemical information from workers or their collective bargaining representatives," the federation pointed out.

A key issue of the case was the limitation of the federal rule's preemption of state laws to just the manufacturing sector. "The decision does not limit the state's right to regulate other jobsites where the OSHA standard does not apply, nor the state's right to issue protection for the general public," the AFL-CIO said.

New opportunity

The federation expressed hope that OSHA will now do "what it should have done years ago—to issue a comprehensive federal standard that truly provides all workers the right to know" the toxic hazards they're exposed to on the job.

Petitioners for the court review included the AFL-CIO, Steelworkers, Public Citizen Litigation Group and the states of New York, Illinois, Connecticut, Massachusetts and New Jersey. The federation's general counsel, Laurence Gold, argued the case for the Steelworkers and the AFL-CIO.

Circuit Judge John J. Gibbons wrote the opinion supported by Chief Judge Clarkson S. Fisher of the U.S. District Court for New Jersey, and Judge James M. Kelly of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

The federal hazard communication standard, issued in November 1983, is a watered down version of an earlier proposal. The court noted the most significant difference was the inclusion of a trade secret exception.

Judge Gobbons's opinion held that "there

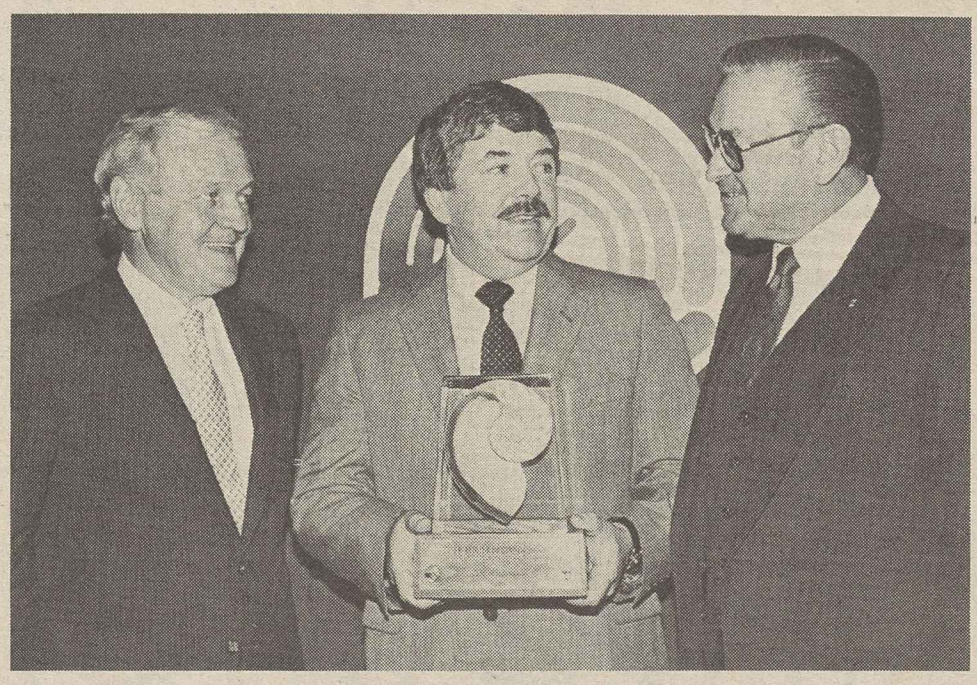
Senate panel urged to block line-item veto

The AFL-CIO expressed its "vigorous opposition" to a Senate bill that would give the President authority for a two-year period to veto individual appropriation items.

Federation President Lane Kirkland spelled out labor's stand against the so-called line-item veto in a letter to Sen. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.), chairman of the Senate Rules & Administration Committee, which recently completed hearings on the proposed legislation.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent spring meeting attacked the line-item veto concept as "unsound," Kirkland noted, and charged that it would permit the President to use the veto capriciously as "a weapon of political punishment" or to eliminate provisions he considers "ideologically distasteful." The council specifically condemned proposals for a constitutional amendment to grant the President line-item veto authority.

The measure before the Senate committee is worse, Kirkland wrote Mathias, because it "disparages" the Constitution by seeking to avoid the amendment process and gain the line-item veto by "sleight-of-hand." Under its terms, each item of an appropriation bill would be enrolled as if enacted as a separate piece of legislation, even where all items had been considered by Congress in a single bill.



Kirkland called this "a transparent attempt to make a change of constitutional magnitude in our system of government without following the procedures established by the framers for amending the Constitution."

He pointed out that the line-item veto cannot be justified as a budget-balancing measure, because discretionary spending represents only a relatively small part of the overall budget. He said budget reductions could be equally well achieved through existing processes.

Transfer of power

Kirkland said the real impact of the measure would be a transfer of power from Congress to the President. Under current law, the President needs approval of both Houses of Congress to rescind a specific appropriation item. With the line-item veto power that would be vested in him by the Senate measure, the President could reject any individual appropriation item and it would take a two-thirds vote in each House to override that action.

"We know of no justification for shifting such additional power from the Congress to the Executive," Kirkland wrote Mathias. "Certainly, recent experience demonstrates that the President has ample ability to influence—indeed determine—both the overall fiscal policy of the federal government and the budgetary priorities and direction of the government."

For community service

United Way's national award for distinguished public service is presented to Thomas D. Kiddy, center, by President William Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers and Metal Trades Dept. President Paul Burnsky, right. Kiddy was honored in Los Angeles for his work with the AFL-CIO Union Counseling program. He is president of Plumbers & Pipefitters Local 620 and heads the New London, Conn., Metal Trades Council. The award is the United Way's highest labor honor and commemorates the late CWA President Joseph A. Beirne, who championed voluntarism and community service.

Hillman citations presented for journalistic achievement

New York — The annual Sidney Hillman Foundation Awards for excellence in communications were presented by Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley at a luncheon here.

The annual awards are a memorial to Sidney Hillman, first president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. They recognize outstanding journalistic achievement which advances the human condition and social responsibility among print and electronic journalists, producers, authors and commentators, as well as programs and publications.

This year's winners are:

- The Jackson Daily News and the Clarion Ledger in Jackson, Miss., for a report on the civil rights struggles during the summer of 1964 in Mississippi and their impact a generation later.
- KMOL-TV in San Antonio, Tex., for its report, "Valley in the Shadow of Life," a gripping account of the struggles of the small towns along the Mexican-American border.
- KMOX radio in St. Louis for an in-depth series on problems facing America's children.
- Jacqueline Sharkey, an assistant journalism professor at the University of Arizona, for an article in Common Cause on the build-up of American military bases in Honduras.
- Strobe Talbott, Washington bureau chief for Time magazine, for his book, Deadly Gambits, on the effect of bureaucratic rivalries on U.S. security policies.

A special award was given to Harrison E. Salisbury for his article, "The Strange Correspondence of Morris Ernst and J. Edgar Hoover, 1939-1964," in The Nation magazine. As a judge for the competition, Salisbury was ineligible for a regular award.

Other judges were Sara Fritz, Washington correspondent for the Los Angeles Times, and Edward P. Morgan, journalist and broadcaster.

Union-industry group favors court review on cargo quotas

Maritime unions and ship owners called on Congress to hold off considering any changes in legislation concerning shipment of certain American farm exports until court proceedings regarding the matter are completed.

They also urged Agriculture Sec. John Block to reinstate a suspended export program pending a court ruling.

The maritime coalition won a major victory in February when a federal judge ruled that the government's $1.5-billion Blended Credit program must abide by the nation's cargo preference laws. The ruling meant that at least 50 percent of the cargo generated under the program must sail on U.S.-flag ships.

Goods shipped under the Blended Credit program are financed through a combination of interest-free government credit and government-guaranteed private loans.

After the February decision, Block suspended Blended Credit shipments. Some farm state lawmakers then introduced legislation to eliminate the cargo preference requirement.

"We are confident that the appeals court will uphold the district court opinion that Congress intended such government-assisted shipments to be subject to the cargo preference laws," the coalition said.

The coalition includes the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades and Metal Trades Departments, Seafarers, National Maritime Union, Marine Engineers and the Masters, Mates & Pilots.

College youths staff HERE drive

The Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees kicked off an ambitious organizing drive concentrating on four key metropolitan areas—Boston, Chicago, Washington and Orange County, Calif.—and staffed largely by teams of young, college-educated trainees.

HERE Organizing Director Vincent J. Sirabella told reporters at a Washington news conference that the campaign will build on the experiences gained in a successful organizing effort in New Haven, Conn. Since that program was initiated in 1973, HERE has posted a net gain of about 5,100 members in the New Haven area, including some 2,600 white-collar workers at Yale University, he reported.

He noted that HERE President Edward T. Hanley had pledged to expand the effort to the national scene if the New Haven experiment proved successful. Mini-versions already are in operation in Nevada and California.

"Based on our experiences in Connecticut," Sirabella said, "it is our considered judgment that unorganized workers will respond to dedicated, intelligent, hard-working and well-trained organizers in whom they can have trust and confidence."

He said the union actively recruited such organizers among recent college graduates who showed special concern about the exploitation of workers in the hotel and restaurant industries. They responded to newspaper classified ads like the following:

"Labor Organizer Trainee — College grad, good verbal & writing skills. Long hours & hard work, modest wages. Must be mobile. One who seeks a career in the labor movement. Future growth depends on you."

10-member teams

Sirabella said four teams of 10 organizers each will operate in the target areas. Each group will be a blend of experienced organizers from the New Haven, Nevada and California campaigns and recently recruited trainees.

The teams are now completing intensive training before starting their projects June 10. They recently met with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who praised the HERE program and the spirit the young organizers are bringing to their assignments.

The trainees were selected from among some 500 applicants. Most are recent graduates of such colleges and universities as Yale, Georgetown, Howard, California, Minnesota, Maryland, and Mt. Holyoke. Several trainees and one project coordinator are rank-and-file members who have "demonstrated leadership capacity and have been active in their locals."

The newly hired organizers will be paid $300 a week, Sirabella said, and while no budget has been established, the first-year cost is estimated at "close to $2 million." He said the union has not set any numerical goals, but is committed to spend "whatever it takes to do the job." Hanley intends to duplicate the project in four other cities every two years, Sirabella reported.

"We are absolutely convinced that many workers want to be organized . . . and we think we can have national impact" in demonstrating the ability of unions to sign up new members, Sirabella declared.

Pilots score union-busting bid by United

over all other pilots when the strike ends. United allowed its scab pilots to "rebid" or apply for more favorable positions and aircraft during the strike. ALPA is sticking to its position that the regular seniority list remain intact.

The union also wants the pilots hired during the strike moved to the bottom of the seniority list.

ALPA is getting strong support from the Flight Attendants, whose members have refused to cross the picket lines. More than 90 percent of the Flight Attendants and 94 percent of the pilots have honored the picket lines.

A federal judge in Washington denied a request by the Machinists to release the union from a no-strike clause with United to allow IAM members to honor the ALPA picket lines. United has threatened to fire all IAM mechanics who do not report for work.

Over the last several months United trained 574 new pilots. When the ALPA members struck, United asked the new pilots to cross the picket lines. Only four accepted the offer.

United said it would not hire any of the 570 new pilots who are siding with the union. ALPA, as part of the back-to-work package, wants the new pilots protected from company retaliation.

"These people passed up the career opportunity of a lifetime to stick with the union, so we aren't going to turn our backs on them," the union said.

"For a company that claims it needs to control costs to stay competitive and has major expansion plans for after the strike, they are shooting themselves in the foot by throwing these 570 pilots on the street," ALPA said. "It will cost the company millions of dollars to get their pound of flesh."

ALPA is also seeking protection from retaliation for some 40 flight instructors who are honoring the picket lines.

New editor announced by Marine Engineers

Stephen R. Chapman has been named editor of the American Marine Engineer, the monthly newspaper of the Marine Engineers. He succeeds Victor Rollo, who retired after 16 years as editor.

Chapman has been a writer for the Communications Workers and Machinists. Rollo, who also has edited the Italian edition of the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union News, will continue as a consultant for various publications.

Case comparisons show Reagan's Labor Board tilted against workers

cent of cases decided for the employer by the Fanning Board in 1979-80 and the 29 percent for the employer by the Murphy Board, in 1975-76. All of the members of the Murphy Board were either appointed or reappointed by Republican presidents. Three of its members, in fact, had been or subsequently became management attorneys.

The AFL-CIO lawyers' group noted that the decision-making pattern of the NLRB did not change significantly during the two previous changes of administration.

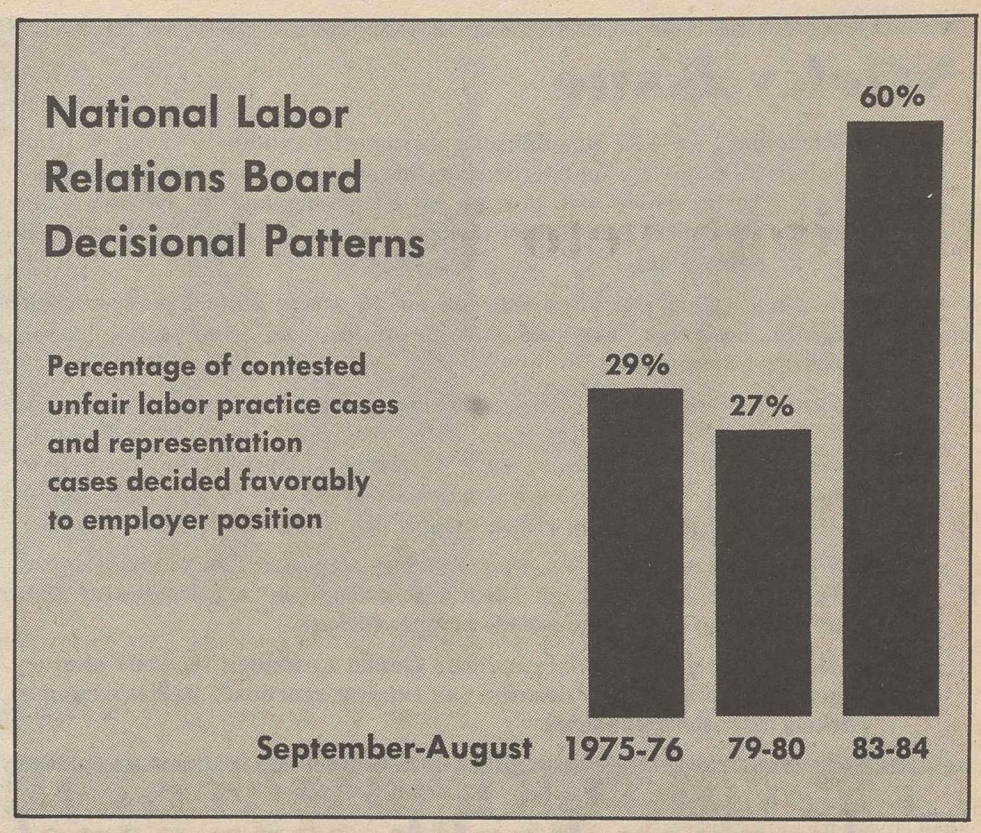
"It is only since the Reagan appointees attained a majority that the ideological biases of the board members have resulted in a major shift in the board's rulings," the report stressed.

The pro-employer tilt in the case-by-case decisions that come before the NLRB was matched over the period of the Reagan majority by policy reversals that overturned established precedents—in virtually every case to the disadvantage of unions.

AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel David M. Silberman observed in a recent speech that the findings of the study show the changes in board policy are not merely "a cyclical swing to the right" following four years of Democratic control.

"To the contrary, the current board is radically different from its predecessors, Republican and Democratic alike, in the anti-union bias it brings to even the run-of-the-mill cases," Silberman told a labor-management conference at Northern Kentucky University. He cited a comment of the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations in its report last year that "these tendencies lead to results as devastating in their impact on the individual employees whose rights are at issue—and as potentially chilling in their effect on those employees' co-workers—as any of the more widely reported decisions overruling established board doctrines."

Silberman warned that in the long run the current board's approach will prove harmful to employers and the public at large as well as to workers and their unions. If union members and their leaders lose confidence in the NLRB and in the rule of law, he said, they will look to economic force as their only recourse.



"Indeed," he noted, "most union lawyers already are advising their clients that it is futile to seek the aid of the NLRB and that they are better served by seeking other means of redress. This is precisely what the Wagner Act was designed to prevent."

The management tilt of the NLRB hasn't been confined to the board's policy-making side.

Other posts

Dotson installed a former staff attorney for the anti-union National Right to Work organization as the NLRB's solicitor. And Reagan chose an attorney from a law firm representing management for the independent post of NLRB general counsel, who heads the agency's field staff and is responsible for prosecuting violations of labor law.

The byproduct of the NLRB's increasing affection for management has been a reluctance by unions to use the machinery of the NLRB to seek recognition or remedy unfair labor practices. Even before the Dotson Board, unions had found the National Labor Relations Act too weak to effectively protect workers seeking to organize and remedies available to even a well-intentioned labor board too mild to deter hostile employers.

Johansen, Babson confirmed to fill NLRB vacancies

The Senate voted confirmation of Wilford Johansen and Marshall Babson as members of the National Labor Relations Board to fill two vacancies and bring the board to its full complement of five members.

When Johansen and Babson are sworn in, the board will reach full strength for the first time since Howard Jenkins, Jr., left in August 1983. Johansen, 56, will move into the seat vacated by Jenkins for a term expiring Aug. 27, 1988. Babson, 39, will succeed Don A. Zimmerman for a term ending Dec. 16, 1989.

Johansen has spent 27 years as an attorney with the labor board and since 1971 has been a regional director based in Los Angeles. Babson's only experience has been as a management attorney and, for that reason, his nomination was sharply criticized by the AFL-CIO. Two other NLRB members—Chairman Donald Dotson and Patricia Diaz Dennis—also were management attorneys before joining the board. The remaining member, Robert Hunter, was chief counsel of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee under its current chairman, Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah).

Wynn prods business leaders on need to respect labor law

President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers called on the leaders of American industry to help "change the current mindset in the business community that cracking down on violators of workers' rights is being a 'traitor' to business."

Wynn, an AFL-CIO vice president, issued the challenge in an address to the Labor Relations Committee of the National Association of Manufacturers.

"There are thousands of businesses—probably still a majority—that respect the law and the rights of their workers," Wynn said. "But they know—and I as a trade unionist know—that the only effective penalties for labor law violators are those administered by the marketplace."

He warned that respect for the law and the National Labor Relations Board that administers it is "breaking down" at a time that "cries out for improved labor-management cooperation and understanding."

"Workers' rights are being violated daily," he charged. "Vindication of those rights is haphazard at best, and even that can take years. It doesn't surprise me that more and more companies are engaging in these practices. Competition is competition."

Wynn said his own union, the UFCW, is tackling the problem by avoiding NLRB procedures whenever possible. He said the union will not hesitate if necessary to settle disputes with employers "in the streets—with picket lines or with the economic guerrilla tactics commonly called corporate campaigns." He said the results of such tactics are "quicker and often better" than waiting for years for an NLRB ruling even longer for appeals.

"The beginning of the process to restore respect for the law," he said, "is a recognition that we cannot exist as an economically viable nation with labor and management in a constant state of warfare." What is needed, rather than a totally new law or no law at all, he said, is "respect for the current law and a commitment by both labor and management that it is not right for violators of that law to have a competitive advantage over those who abide by the law."

Failure to develop that respect, Wynn suggested, could result in labor becoming "increasingly bitter about a system that only pays lip service to its rights."

Steelworkers salute Bruce Springsteen

Syracuse, N.Y.—The Steelworkers gave a big "thank you" to Bruce Springsteen as the rock star wrapped up his marathon U.S. tour at the 45,000-seat Carrier Dome here.

USWA District 4 Director Lou Thomas presented Springsteen with a plaque, a USWA hard hat bearing his name, and an honorary membership card in the union for his huge personal contributions to Steelworker food banks and assistance centers around the country and his pitches for audience donations during his concerts.

Tax reform proposals draw mixed reception

- Taxation of the full amount of unemployment compensation, workers' compensation and black lung benefits.
- Repeal of the deduction for state and local taxes.
- Limitations on the deduction of interest, except for mortgage interest on a principal residence.
- Repeal of the additional personal exemption for the blind and the elderly.

These and other changes in taxes on individual income will mean a net reduction in taxes for 58 percent of families, an increase for 21 percent and no change for 21 percent, according to the Administration's figures.

On the business side, the major elements of the program include repeal of the investment tax credit and a reduction in the maximum corporate rate to 33 percent, provisions that almost cancel each other out.

Among individuals, the major benefit would apply at both ends of the economic scale. The average tax reduction would be 36 percent for families with incomes below $10,000 and 23 percent for those in the $10-15,000 range. The reduction for families in the $15-20,000 range would be 14 percent and would continue to decline as income rose in the middle brackets. However, the average reduction would swing back up to 11 percent for families with incomes of $200,000 a year or more.

The average tax cut would be only 7 percent, however, across the broad $30-$50,000 range.

Zero bracket raised

The increase in the zero bracket to $2,900 for individuals and $4,000 for families along with the increase in the personal exemption to $2,000 are the key elements in reducing the taxes of those in the lower income brackets.

On the other hand, the taxation of health insurance premiums would have the effect of increasing a family's taxable income by $300 a year. And lower-income families (below $18,000 a year) that suffered unemployment also would be substantially affected by the taxation of unemployment insurance.

The AFL-CIO has registered its strong opposition to any move to tax workers' life support benefits provided through their employment, such as health insurance. The federation has been pressing a major grass-roots campaign and petition drive since the first of the year to make Congress aware of workers' views on the issue, which has been a central topic at this year's regional AFL-CIO conferences.

In the middle-income brackets, despite Reagan's pro-family claims for his proposals, adverse effects would be felt by many families in the $25-$30,000 range who are buying homes and thus would tend to itemize deductions for state and local taxes.

An AFL-CIO analysis notes that at all levels of income within the broad $25-$50,000 range, two-earner families that itemize deductions would tend to pay more in taxes than they do now. This is true even for families with two children who would thus be entitled to four of the higher exemptions.

If only one spouse works, a married couple that itemizes its tax return generally would receive a tax cut under the Reagan plan. However, couples with no children who live in high-tax states would tend to pay more in taxes than they do now. With two children, the increased personal exemption would give the one-earner family a tax cut even in high tax states.

Reagan's plan also changes the current child care credit to a deduction, and this could mean a tax increase for single heads of household at lower income levels.

Hearings under way

The President's program drew mixed reviews on Capitol Hill, and the praise and criticism was not necessarily divided along party lines.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) opened hearings on the plan May 30, two days after Reagan outlined its main features in a televised address to the nation. Rostenkowski called the President's proposals "a starting point," but he acknowledged that it may not be possible to enact any major tax legislation before the current session of Congress runs out.

Sticky issue

Richmond, Va.—If Republican gubernatorial candidate Wyatt B. Durrette rejects campaign bumper stickers because they carry the union label, then maybe he should also give up his telephones and his car, suggested Virginia AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Daniel LeBlanc. "They're union-made, too," he pointed out.

LeBlanc called Durrette's decision not to accept 20,000 bumper stickers with the union "bug" an example of the "old labor-baiting, labor-bashing syndrome."

Durrette refused the bumper stickers, printed in Missouri, saying he would not accept products from states that don't have "right-to-work" laws. Missouri permits union shop agreements, Durrette said in a news release. "I have always defended the rights of citizens to join labor unions in the private sector or to refuse to join unions, if that is their wish."

Don Harrison, Durrette's press secretary, reported that union members have barraged the campaign office with calls since they learned of Durrette's rejection of the union-made bumper stickers.

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Gerald L. Baliles, the state attorney general, called Durrette's decision "an extreme reaction." Baliles's bumper stickers carry the union label.

Federation health care panel spells out coverage priorities

Labor's agenda for quality health care coverage puts high priority on meeting the challenge of containing costs and preserving union-won benefits for workers and their families.

The long-range plan was drafted by the AFL-CIO Ad Hoc Committee on Health Care and outlined at a press briefing by Federation Vice President John J. Sweeney.

Sweeney said an immediate priority will be helping educate unions on cost containment issues, surveying health care coverage and expenses in union contracts, developing model cost containment legislation and continuing cooperation with management in controlling health care expenditures.

'New crisis'

Today, the problem of rising costs in the health system is generating a "new crisis in coverage and access," Sweeney said.

He pointed out that labor has taken the initiative in developing health care cost containment programs and has been active for some time in efforts to restrain unnecessary outlays for hospital and medical care.

Joining in the briefing were Director Bert Seidman and Assistant Director Karen Ignagni of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security.

The 11-member committee, comprising presidents of major industrial and service sector unions, was established in February by the Executive Council to coordinate labor's various health care activities and to spearhead the campaign to preserve the coverage built up in years of bargaining.

Over three decades, labor made steady progress toward "the goal of providing decent, affordable and accessible health care for all Americans," Sweeney said. Since 1980, however, "labor's campaign for quality care has been more a damage control effort than anything else."

"Labor's worst fears about the health care costs that America could not muster the will to control in the '70s have been coming true in the '80s," Sweeney said. Employers have been demanding workers either pick up a significant portion of the health insurance premiums or sacrifice coverage.

To combat employer attempts to shift the costs to workers, unions have been involved in innovative and successful initiatives at managing health care costs, Sweeney pointed out.

Educational effort

Labor's educational effort is a key ingredient on the committee's agenda, Sweeney said. The federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security conducted its first health cost containment conference about 18 months ago. The department followed up with a union-wide conference at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies last October. The next session will be July 23-24 at the Meany Center and will focus on basic health care program design, administration and payment issues, bargaining techniques and financial analysis.

A comprehensive survey of health coverage and expenses among AFL-CIO unions will be conducted by Seidman's staff. Ignagni is developing the survey in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Economic Research. Sweeney said the survey will provide "invaluable data for tracking and assessing health care coverage in the country."

Model law

Development of model legislation aimed at controlling rising medical costs will be drafted for introduction in 1986 state legislative sessions.

The committee is exploring ways for unions to deliver their message on health costs and coverage. The Labor Institute of Public Affairs is also working on a video tape to dramatize efforts for unions and employers to protect health benefits, Sweeney said.

Dale Good retires, assistant to Kirkland

Dale E. Good, an assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland for international affairs, retired May 24.

Good, 65, joined the federation in 1980 after leaving the State Dept., where he served as coordinator of international labor affairs and as a labor attache in the Foreign Service.

Before joining the government in the early 1950s, Good was an international representative with the Allied Industrial Workers.

Unions shed no tears on Rowland farewell

By Arlee C. Green

Robert A. Rowland's resignation as the head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration was welcomed by organized labor as an opportunity to put the agency back on track toward fulfilling its mandate to regulate workplace hazards.
